Cecil was still silent—could he do it? The advantages to everyone were plain, the disadvantages would only affect himself. Besides, why shouldn't he love her? He knew nothing of her, under her plain exterior she might possess noble qualities of heart and mind, at least she had never said anything that jarred on him, and as to her dress—well, she dressed at present to please her father, perhaps in future she would do it to please him, and anyhow, with a good dressmaker one could not go far wrong. Heaps of men married for money with far less provocation, why should not he? He would accept the old man's offer, determined that if it were possible that he would find reason to love the girl, but if that were not possible to treat her with every tenderness and attention, never ceasing to be grateful for what she had done for him. His was not the nature that could alone find happiness in love; ambition stood for much to him. The old man's tone, the terms he had used, all grated on him, but he had schooled himself to that long ago, and had ceased to let his employer's views or ways of expressing himself have any effect on his own mind or temper. Cecil was a man of character admirably suited to the career he had planned for himself years ago, namely, politics. Therefore he at last replied with dignity:

Digitized by Google

"I thank you for your very kind and flattering offer, and I shall be pleased to call on Miss Lawson to learn whether she is willing to accept me as a husband."

Old Sam heaved a sigh of relief. He had intended to impress upon the penniless young man the great advantages that would accrue to him by this marriage, but he found instead he was only delighted that Cecil had accepted.

"Thank you!" he cried fervently, wringing his hand. "Come to dinner to-morrow night, and fix it up with my girl afterwards."

Cecil accepted the invitation rather stiffly.

That evening Ruth was surprised at her father's jovial mood, but still more astonished was she at what he said to her in the library (so-called) after dinner.

"Ruth, my girl, would you like to get married?"

Ruth's pale face flushed all over as she replied shrinking: "Oh, no, father, why should I?"

He looked at her for a moment, and then laughed.

"Now, I warrant you think I'm going to propose young Moss, or Dan Lewison—proper enough young men, too—but not your sort, eh?"

He seemed almost to be enjoying her confusion.

"What would you say, now, to that young aristocrat, Cecil Lane-Fox?" His tone was triumphant.

"Mr. Lane-Fox?" she stammered, going as pale as she had before been red. "Did he—did he——"

"No, he didn't exactly," replied her father. "I saw how it was with you, and I've never yet seen you want anything that I didn't try to get for you, so I just suggested, you know, and he is coming to-morrow evening to ask you himself."

"Oh, father," she murmured, white to the lips, "did he say that he loved me?"

"I can't say that he did," replied her father ruefully, "but then I didn't think to ask him. I put it to him as a business proposition, and he accepted."

Now Ruth appeared in a new light, with her eyes blazing; she said bitterly:

"You bought him as you would have bought me a diamond necklace, I suppose."

"Why, Ruth, girl!" cried her father, looking at her in astonishment. "What's come over you? I thought you'd be so pleased and happy."

In Ruth's gentle nature, resentment had no fast hold. Whatever her father had done, it was from love for her, so, kissing him, she said:

"You are a dear, kind father, and no one will ever love me as you do," and then she fled from the room.

Poor Ruth probed her wound to its depth.

"Have I worn my heart on my sleeve so openly?" And then as she remembered the many evenings when she had (so adroitly, as she thought) led the conversation to the subject of the young secretary, she confessed to herself that she ought to have known that her father, who owed his success to his ability to guess what people were trying to conceal, would soon penetrate that secret she had thought so safely hidden at the bottom of her heart.

Never for one moment did she imagine that Cecil loved her. Did she blame him that he was willing to sell himself? No, "the king could do no wrong." She knew he would bring to the marriage more than enough to equalise her one advantage of money.

Would he through her deep and tender love learn to love her also? Or would the strain become intolerable?

Should she aim at this dazzling happiness knowing that if she failed it would be the direst misery?

What answer should she give him on the morrow?

L. Hughes.

A Golden Guinea Offered.

Would you like to win a guinea in a most simple way? No doubt you would, and you have your opportunity to do so now.

This is the way by which you can try to make yourself one guinea the richer. On the previous page appears a story, entitled "The Test of Ruth Lawson." Read the story, and you will find that at its conclusion the lady in the piece is confronted with a problem which she finds very difficult to solve.

Imagine yourself in her shoes. What would you do? What course do you think Ruth Lawson should decide upon?

I offer a prize of one guinea to the reader who sends me what I consider to be the most sensible advice to her under the circumstances.

Replies must not exceed one hundred words, and should be written on one side of the paper only.

My decision as to the winner will be final. Envelopes should be addressed to "The Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.," with "Twelfth Love Problem" marked in the top left-hand corner.

All replies must reach these offices by first post Friday morning, May 6th. None arriving after this time will be considered.

A Love Problem and a Parallel Case.

"E. M." writes me as follows:

"Dear Sir,—Your Unsolved Love Problem, 'Brian Cresswell's Choice,' particularly appeals to me by reason of its being so like my own case some years ago. In my case, however, my wife was then a nurse (and not a ward) of the scoundrel who wanted to marry her, and who persuaded me to become his patient when there was nothing the matter with me, and who told me I should never get away from him alive, unless I resigned all thoughts of winning his young nurse. Other doctors have since told me that it was a wonder that both of us ever got away from him alive, for not long afterwards he was proved to be insane, and was sent to an asylum where he is likely to remain for the rest of his days."

I am glad to hear that "E. M." got out of his dilemma successfully, and that he and the bride he had such a difficulty to win are perfectly happy. Perhaps some of my other readers may have also found that the course of true love does not run smoothly. If so, I should be glad to hear of their experiences, for I have always a ready ear for the personal stories of my subscribers.

An Appeal for the Little Ones.

Perhaps you do not know the history of the Fresh Air Fund, of the good it is striving successfully to do, of the manner in which thousands of poor little slum-bred children are being afforded a day of heavenly bliss. If you do not, turn to page 556, and read what thereon is written. It cannot fail to interest you; it cannot fail to touch your heart.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

YOU CAN START THIS SPLENDID SERIAL TO-DAY.

A Story of Love and Crime.

By ARNOLD BENNETT.

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters.

Mr. Theodore Racksole, American multi-millionaire, arrives at the Grand Babylon Hotel, and in consequence of an altercation with Jules, the all-important head waiter, he purchases the hotel for £400,000, with the intention of dismissing Jules from the staff.

Reginald Dimmock, English companion to Prince Aribert of Posen, dines the same evening with Racksole, who suspects that there is some sort of secret understanding between the young equerry and Jules.

The millionaire that night retires to bed very late, and is greatly surprised to see the waiter emerge from a room which he believes to be occupied by his daughter Nella.

Investigating the matter, Racksole finds that Dimmock is inhabiting the rooms, he having volunteered to change apartments with Nella, as a window of those she had intended to occupy had been broken by a stone flung from the outside. The millionaire accepts the explanation, although the circumstances of the case worry him considerably.

The next morning he learns that Miss Spencer, the bureau clerk, has left the hotel during the night, without giving any warning whatsoever.

Racksole dismisses Jules the first thing in the morning, forbidding him to enter the hotel again. Prince Aribert of Posen arrives, and Nella recognises him as a gentleman she has met in Paris as "Count Steenbock."

Dimmock is seen to drop dead in the quadrangle of the hotel. The cause of death is mysterious. More mysterious still is the way in which Dimmock's dead body disappears during the night—a coincidence being that Racksole discovers Jules in the hotel precincts.

The affair is kept very quiet, and does not leak out into the newspapers.

Prince Aribert is in great grief, and tells Nella that he has been informed that his nephew, Prince Eugen, the hereditary Grand Duke of Posen, who is almost of an age with himself, has disappeared in Ostend or the neighbourhood. Aribert imagines that Eugen is the victim of a plot, and decides to return to the Continent at once.

On the morning following the Prince's departure, Miss Spencer comes to the Grand Babylon disguised as the Baroness Zerlinski. Nella, suspicious of the woman's manner, watches her, and sees her take a note out of a cream puff that is served to her at lunch.

Suddenly the identity of the Baroness as Miss Spencer strikes Nella. Discovering that she has set out for Ostend, Nella decides to follow her, and tracks her to a house in that town. Boldly confronting Miss Spencer with a revolver, she learns various important facts about the Dimmock mystery; but by a trick, Miss Spencer eventually bests Nella.

The latter faints, and, awakening, finds herself on board a yacht.

Jules, otherwise Mr. Tom Jackson, is approaching her.

The erstwhile waiter tells Nella that he has her in his power, but that he will release her if she consents to marry him.

Nella boldly refuses, and suddenly a figure springs out of a dinghy a few feet away and knocks Jules down. It is Prince Aribert!

A Mr. Sampson Levi, stockbroker, seeks an interview with Theodore Racksole at the Grand Babylon. The two men are attracted to one another, and exchange confidences. Racksole tells the stockbroker of the occurrences at the hotel, and Mr. Sampson Levi explains how he had an appointment with Prince Eugen in order to arrange the terms of a State loan. The Prince was wishing to marry Princess Anna of Eckstein-Schwartzburg, but could not do so until he had paid off his debts, amounting to one million pounds.

The disappearance of the Prince had complicated matters considerably, for the day had arrived when the money was to be paid over. If Prince Eugen did not appear he could not have the money.

Suddenly an idea strikes Racksole. Another pauper prince might be wishing to marry Princess Anna, and therefore it would be to his interests to stop the loan. Hence, perhaps, the solution to the disappearance of Prince Eugen.

That night Racksole discovers Rocco engaged in a mysterious operation in the State bathroom on—the body of Reginald Dimmock!

Digitized by Google

THIS WEEK'S INSTALMENT.

FOURTEENTH CHAPTER.
Rocco Answers Some Questions.

Rocco turned round with the swiftness of a startled tiger, and gave Theodore Racksole one long, piercing glance.

"You!" said Rocco, with as pure an Anglo-Saxon accent and intonation as Racksole himself could have accomplished.

The most extraordinary thing about the situation was that at this juncture Theodore Racksole did not know what to say. He was so dumfounded by the affair, and especially by Rocco's absolute and sublime calm, that both speech and thought failed him.

"I give in," said Rocco. "From the moment you entered this hotel I was afraid of you. I told Jules I was afraid of you. I knew there would be trouble with a man of your kidney, and I was right; confound it! I tell you I give in. I know when I'm beaten. I've got no revolver and no weapon of any kind. I surrender. Do what you like."

And with that Rocco sat down on a chair. It was magnificently done. Only a truly great man could have done it. Rocco actually kept his dignity.

For answer, Racksole walked slowly into the vast apartment, seized a chair, and, dragging it up to Rocco's chair, sat down opposite to him. Thus they faced each other, their knees almost touching, both in evening dress. On Rocco's right hand was the bed, with the body of Reginald Dimmock. On Racksole's right hand, and a little behind him, was the marble washstand, still littered with Rocco's implements. The electric light shone on Rocco's left cheek, leaving the other side of his face in shadow. Racksole tapped him on the knee twice.

"So you're another Englishman masquerading as a foreigner in my hotel," Racksole remarked, by way of commencing the interrogation.

"I'm not," answered Rocco quietly. "I'm a citizen of the United States."

"The dickens you are!" Racksole exclaimed.

"Yes, I was born at West Orange, New Jersey State. I call myself an Italian because it was in Italy that I first made a name as a chef—at Rome. It is better for a great chef like me to be a foreigner. Imagine a great chef named Elihu P. Rucker. You can't imagine it, Mr. Racksole. I defy you to imagine it. I changed my nationality for the same reason that my friend and colleague, Jules, otherwise Mr. Jackson, changed his."

"So Jules is your friend and colleague, is he?"

"He was, but from this moment he is no longer. I began to disapprove of his methods no less than a week ago, and my disapproval will now take an active form."

"Will it?" said Racksole. "I calculate it just won't, Mr. Elihu P. Rucker, citizen of the United States. Before you are very much older you'll be in the kind hands of the police, and your activities, in no matter what direction, will come to an abrupt conclusion."

"It is possible," sighed Rocco.

"In the meantime, I'll ask you one or two questions for my own private satisfaction. You've acknowledged that the game is up, and so you may as well answer them with as much candour as you feel yourself capable of. See?"

"I see," replied Rocco calmly, "but I guess I can't answer all questions. I'll do what I can."

"Well," said Racksole, clearing his throat, "what's the scheme all about? Tell me in a word."

"Not in a thousand words. It isn't my secret, you know."

"Why was poor little Dimmock poisoned?" The millionaire's voice softened as he looked for an instant at the remains of the unfortunate young man.

"I don't know," said Rocco. "I don't mind informing you that I objected to that part of the business. I wasn't made aware of it till after it was done, and then I tell you it got my dander up considerable."

"You mean to say you don't know why Dimmock was done to death?"

"I mean to say I couldn't see the sense of it. Of course he—er—died, because he sort of cried off the scheme, having previously taken a share in it. I don't mind saying that much, because you probably guessed if for yourself. But I solemnly state that I have a conscientious objection to murder."

"Then it was murder?"

"It was a kind of murder," Rocco admitted.

"Who did it?"

"Unfair question," said Rocco.

"Who else is in this precious scheme besides Jules and yourself?"

"Don't know, on my honour."

"Well, then, tell me this. What have you been doing to Dimmock's body?"

"How long were you in that bath-room?" Rocco parried, with sublime impudence.

"Don't question me, Mr. Rucker," said Theodore Racksole. "I feel very much inclined to break your back across my knee. Therefore I advise you not to irritate me. What have you been doing to Dimmock's body?"

"I've been embalming it."

"Em—balming it."

"Certainly; Richardson's system of arterial fluid injection, as improved by myself. You weren't aware that I included the art of embalming among my accomplishments. Nevertheless, it is so."

"But why?" asked Racksole, more mystified than ever. "Why should you trouble to embalm the poor chap?"

"Can't you see? Doesn't it strike you? That body has to be taken care of. It contains, or, rather, it did contain, very serious evidence against some person or persons unknown to the police. It may be necessary to move it about from place to place. A body can't be hidden for long; it betrays itself. One couldn't throw it into the Thames, for it would have been found inside twelve hours. One couldn't bury it—it wasn't safe. The only thing was to keep it handy and movable, ready for emergencies. I needn't inform you that, without embalming, you can't keep a dead body handy and movable for more than four or five days. It's the kind of thing that won't keep. And so it was suggested that I should embalm it, and I did. Mind you, I still objected to the murder, but I couldn't go back on a colleague, you understand. You do understand that, don't you? Well, here you are, and here it is, and that's all."

Rocco leant back in his chair as though he had said everything that ought to be said. He closed his eyes to indicate that so far as he was concerned the conversation was also closed. Theodore Racksole stood up.

"I hope," said Rocco, suddenly opening his eyes, "I hope you'll call in the police without any delay. It's getting late, and I don't like going without my night's rest."

"Where do you suppose you'll get your night's rest?" Racksole asked.

"In the cells, of course. Haven't I told you I know when I'm beaten. I'm not so blind as not to be able to see that there's at any rate a prima facie case against me. I expect I shall get off with a year or two's imprisonment as accessory after the fact—I think that's what they call it. Anyhow, I shall be in a position to prove that I am not implicated in the murder of this unfortunate nincompoop." He pointed, with a strange, scornful gesture of his elbow, to the bed. "And now, shall we go? Everyone is asleep, but there will be a policeman within call of the watchman in the portico. I am at your service. Let us go down together, Mr. Racksole. I give you my word to go quietly."

"Stay a moment," said Theodore Racksole curtly; "there is no hurry. It won't do you any harm to forego another hour's sleep, especially as you will have no work to do to-morrow. I have one or two more questions to put to you."

"Well?" Rocco murmured, with an air of tired resignation, as if to say, "What must be must be."

Digitized by Google

"Where has Dimmock's body been during the last three or four days, since he —died?"

"Oh!" answered Rocco, apparently surprised at the simplicity of the question. "It's been in my room, and one night it was on the roof; once it went out of the hotel as luggage, but it came back the next day as a case of Demerara sugar. I forget where else it has been, but it's been kept perfectly safe and treated with every consideration."

"And who contrived all these manœuvres?" asked Racksole as calmly as he could.

"I did. That is to say, I invented them and I saw that they were carried out. You see, the suspicions of your police obliged me to be particularly spry."

"And who carried them out?"

"Ah! that would be telling tales. But I don't mind assuring you that my accomplices were innocent accomplices. It is absurdly easy for a man like me to impose on underlings — absurdly easy."

"What did you intend to do with the body ultimately?"

Racksole pursued his inquiry with immovable countenance.

"Who knows?" said Rocco, twisting his beautiful moustache. "That would have depended on several things—on your police, for instance. But probably in the end we should have restored this mortal clay"—again he jerked his elbow—"to the man's sorrowing relatives."

"Do you know who the relatives are?"

"Certainly. Don't you? If you don't I need only hint that Dimmock had a Prince for his father."

"It seems to me," said Racksole, with cold sarcasm, "that you behaved rather clumsily in choosing this bedroom as the scene of your operations."

"Not at all," said Rocco. "There was no other apartment so suitable in the whole hotel. Who would have guessed that anything was going on here? It was the very place for me."

"I guessed," said Racksole succinctly.

"Yes, you guessed, Mr. Racksole. But I had not counted on you. You are the only smart man in the business. You are an American citizen, and I hadn't reckoned to have to deal with that class of person."

"Apparently I frightened you this afternoon?"

"Not in the least."

"You were not afraid of a search?"

"I knew that no search was intended. I knew that you were trying to frighten me. You must really credit me with a little sagacity and insight, Mr. Racksole. Immediately you began to talk to me in the kitchen this afternoon I felt you were on the track. But I was not frightened. I merely decided that there was no time to be lost—that I must act quickly. I did act quickly, but, it seems, not quickly enough. I grant that your rapidity exceeded mine. Let us go downstairs, I beg."

Rocco rose and moved towards the door. With an instinctive action Racksole rushed forward and seized him by the shoulder.

"No tricks!" said Racksole. "You're in my custody, and don't forget it."

Rocco turned on his employer a look of gentle, dignified scorn.

"Have I not informed you," he said, "that I have the intention of going quietly?"

Racksole felt almost ashamed for the moment. It flashed across him that a man can be great, even in crime.

"What an ineffable fool you were," said Racksole, stopping him at the threshold, "with your talents, your unique talents, to get yourself mixed up in an affair of this kind. You are ruined. And, by Jove! you were a great man in your own line."

"Mr. Racksole," said Rocco very quickly, "that is the truest word you have spoken this night. I was a great man in my own line. And I am an ineffable fool. Alas!" He brought his long arms to his sides with a thud.

"Why did you do it?"

"I was fascinated—fascinated by Jules. He, too, is a great man. We had great opportunities, here in the Grand Babylon. It was a great game. It was worth the candle. The prizes were enormous. You would admit these things yourself if you knew the facts. Perhaps some day you will know them, for you are a fairly clever person at getting to the root of a matter. Yes, I was blinded, hypnotised."

"And now you are ruined."

"Not ruined, not ruined. Afterwards, in a few years, I shall come up again. A man of genius like me is never ruined till he is dead. Genius is always forgiven. Suppose I am sent to prison. When I emerge I shall be no gaol-bird. I shall be Rocco—the great Rocco. And half the hotels in Europe will invite me to join them."

With the swiftness of lightning Rocco shut the iron screen. Theodore Racksole was a prisoner!

Digitized by Google

"Let me tell you, as man to man, that you have achieved your own degradation. There is no excuse."

"I know it," said Rocco. "Let us go."

Racksole was distinctly and notably impressed by this man—by this master spirit to whom he was to have paid a salary at the rate of three thousand pounds a year. He even felt very sorry for him. And so, side by side, the captor and the captured, they passed into the vast deserted corridor of the hotel. Rocco stopped at the grating of the first lift.

"It will be locked," said Racksole. "We must use the stairs to-night."

"But I have a key. I always carry one," said Rocco, and he pulled one out of his pocket, and, unfastening the iron screen, pushed it open. Racksole smiled at his readiness and aplomb.

"After you," said Rocco, bowing in his finest manner, and Racksole stepped into the lift.

With the swiftness of lightning Rocco pushed forward the iron screen, which locked itself automatically. Theodore Racksole was hopelessly a prisoner within the lift, while Rocco stood free in the corridor.

"Good-bye, Mr. Racksole," he remarked suavely, bowing again, lower than before. "Good-bye; I hate to take a mean advantage of you in this fashion, but really you must allow that you have been very simple. You are a clever man, as I have already said, up to a certain point. It is past that point that my own cleverness comes in. Again, good-bye. After all, I shall have no rest to-night, but perhaps even that will be better than sleeping in a police cell. If you make a great noise you may wake someone and ultimately get released from this lift. But I advise you to compose yourself, and wait till morning. It will be more dignified. For the third time, good-bye."

And with that Rocco, without hastening, walked down the corridor and so out of sight.

Racksole said never a word. He was too disgusted with himself to speak. He clenched his fists, and put his teeth together, and held his breath. In the silence he could hear the dwindling sound of Rocco's footsteps on the thick carpet.

It was the greatest blow of Racksole's life.

The next morning the high-born guests of the Grand Babylon were aroused by a rumour that by some accident the millionaire proprietor of the hotel had remained all night locked up in the lift. It was also stated that Rocco had quarrelled with his new master and incontinently left the place. A duchess said that Rocco's departure would mean the ruin of the hotel, whereupon her husband advised her not to talk nonsense.

As for Racksole, he sent a message for the detective in charge of the Dimmock affair, and bravely told him the happenings of the previous night. The narration was a decided ordeal to a man of Racksole's temperament.

"A strange story!" commented Detective Marshall, and he could not avoid a smile. "The climax was unfortunate, but you have certainly got some valuable facts."

Racksole said nothing.

"I myself have a clue," added the detective. "When your message arrived I was just coming up to see you. I want you to accompany me to a certain spot not far from here. Will you come, now, at once?"

"With pleasure," said Racksole.

At that moment a page entered with a telegram. Racksole opened it and read: "Please come instantly. Nella. Hotel Wellington, Ostend."

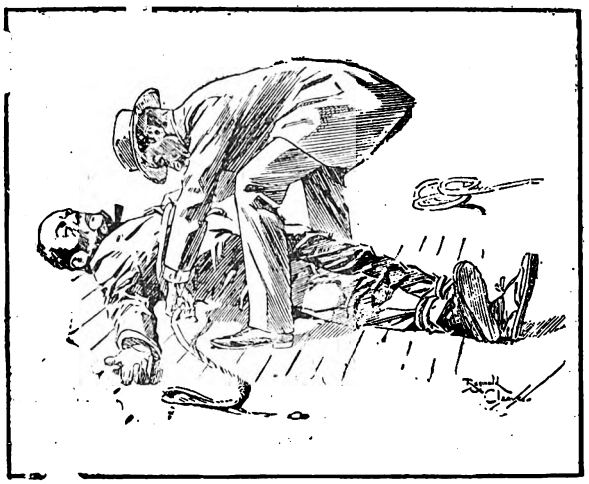
He looked at his watch.

"I can't come," he said to the detective. "I'm going to Ostend."

"But, really, Mr. Racksole," protested the detective. "My business is urgent."

"So's mine," said Racksole.

In ten minutes he was on his way to Victoria Station.



The Prince made Jules secure.

FIFTEENTH CHAPTER.

End of the Yacht Adventure.

We must now return to Nella Racksole and Prince Aribert of Posen on board the yacht without a name. The Prince's first business was to make Jules, otherwise Mr. Tom Jackson, perfectly secure by means of several pieces of rope. Although Mr. Jackson had been stunned into a complete unconsciousness, and there was a contused wound under his ear, no one could say how soon he might not come to himself and get very violent. So the Prince, having tied his arms and legs, made him fast to a stanchion.

"I hope he won't die," said Nella.

"The Mr. Jacksons of this world," said Prince Aribert sententiously, "never die till they are hanged. By-the-way, I wonder how it is that no one has interfered with us. Perhaps they are discreetly afraid of my revolver—of your revolver, I mean."

Both he and Nella glanced up at the imperturbable steersman, who kept the yacht's head straight out to sea. By this time they were about two miles from the Belgian shore.

Addressing him in French, the Prince ordered the sailor to put the yacht about, and make again for Ostend Harbour. but the fellow took no notice whatever of the summons. The Prince raised the revolver, with the idea of frightening the steersman, and then the man began to talk rapidly in a mixture of French and Flemish. He said that he had received Jules' strict orders not to interfere in any way, no matter what might happen on the deck of the yacht. He was the captain of the yacht, and he had to make for a certain English port, the name of which he could not divulge: he was to keep the vessel at full steam ahead under any and all circumstances. He seemed to be a very big, a very strong, and a very determined man, and the Prince was at a loss what course of action to pursue. He asked several more questions, but the only effect of them was to render the man taciturn and ill-humoured. In vain Prince Aribert explained that Miss Nella Racksole, daughter of millionaire Racksole, had been abducted by Mr. Tom Jackson; in vain he flourished the revolver threateningly; the surly, but courageous, captain said merely that that had nothing to do with him; he had instructions, and he should carry them out. He sarcastically begged to remind his interlocutor that he was the captain of the yacht.

"It won't do to shoot him, I suppose," said the Prince to Nella. "I might bore a hole into his leg, or something of that kind."

"It's rather risky, and rather hard on the poor captain, with his extraordinary sense of duty," said Nella. "And, besides, the whole crew might turn on us. No, we must think of something else."

"I wonder where the crew is?" said the Prince.

Just then Mr. Jackson, prone and bound on the deck, showed signs of recovering from his swoon. His eyes opened, and he gazed vacantly around. At length he caught sight of the Prince, who approached him with the revolver well in view.

Digitized by Google

"It's you, is it?" he murmured faintly. "What are you doing on board? Who's tied me up like this?"

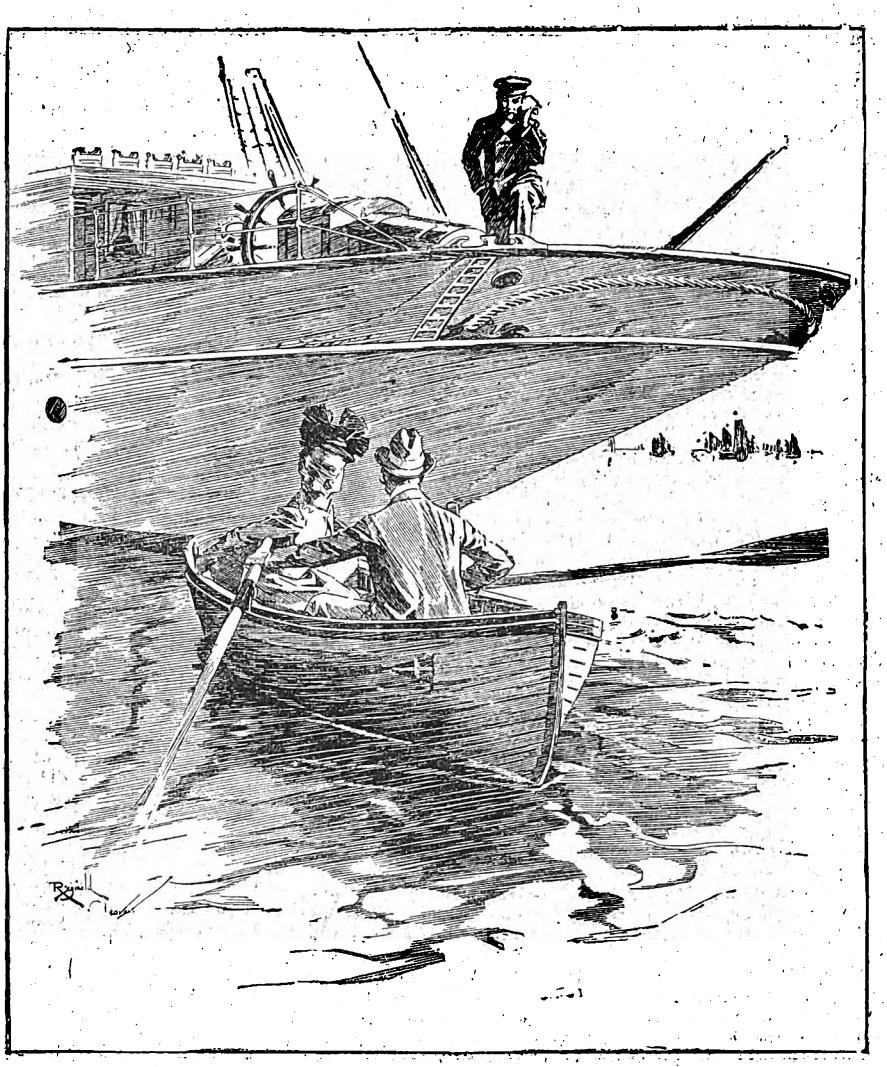
"See here!" replied the Prince, "I don't want to have any arguments, but this yacht must return to Ostend at once, where you will be given up to the authorities."

"Really!" snarled Mr. Tom Jackson. "Shall I!" Then he called out in French to the man in the wheel, "Hi, André! let these two be put off in the dinghy."

It was a peculiar situation. Certain of nothing but the possession of Nella's revolver, the Prince scarcely knew whether to carry the argument further, and with stronger measures, or to accept the situation with as much dignity as the circumstances would permit.

"Let us take the dinghy," said Nella; "we can row ashore in an hour."

He felt that she was right. To leave the yacht in such a manner seemed somewhat ignominious, and it certainly involved the escape of that profound villain, Mr. Thomas Jackson. But what else could be done? The Prince and Nella constituted one party on the vessel; they knew their own strength, but they did not know the strength of their opponents. They held the hostile ringleader bound and captive, but this man had proved himself capable of giving orders, and even to gag him would not help them if the captain of the yacht persisted in his obstinate course. Moreover, there was a distinct objection to promiscuous shooting; the Prince felt that; there was no knowing how promiscuous shooting might end.



As the dinghy receded, a figure appeared on the stern of the yacht. It was Mr. Thomas Jackson, free once more.

"We will take the dinghy," said the Prince quickly, to the captain.

A bell rang below, and a sailor and the negro boy appeared on deck. The pulsations of the screw grew less rapid. The yacht stopped. The dinghy was lowered. As the Prince and Nella prepared to descend into the little cockboat Mr. Tom Jackson addressed Nella, all bound as he lay.

"Good-bye," he said, "I shall see you again, never fear."

In another moment they were in the dinghy, and the dinghy was adrift. The yacht's screw churned the water, and the beautiful vessel slipped away from them. As it receded a figure appeared at the stern. It was Mr. Thomas Jackson. He had been released by his minions. He held a white handkerchief to his ear, and offered a calm, enigmatic smile to the two forlorn but victorious occupants of the dinghy. Jules had been defeated for once in his life; or perhaps it would be more just to say that he had been out-manœuvred. Men like Jules are incapable of being defeated. It was characteristic of his luck that now, in the very hour when he had been caught red-handed in a serious crime against society, he should be effecting a leisurely escape—an escape which left no clue behind.

The sea was utterly calm and blue in the morning sun. The dinghy rocked itself lazily in the swell of the yacht's departure. As the mist cleared away the outline of the shore became more distinct, and it appeared as if Ostend was distant scarcely a cable's length. The white dome of the great Kursaal glittered in the pale turquoise sky, and the smoke of steamers in the harbour could be plainly distinguished. In the offing was a crowd of brown-sailed fishing luggers returning with the night's catch. The many-hued bathing-vans could be counted on the distant beach. Everything seemed perfectly normal. It was difficult for either Nella or her companion to realise that anything extraordinary had happened within the last hour. Yet there was the yacht, not a mile off, to prove to them that something very extraordinary had, in fact, happened. The yacht was no vision, nor was that sinister, watching figure at its stern a vision, either.

Digitized by Google

"I suppose Jules was too surprised and too feeble to inquire how I came to be on board his yacht," said the Prince, taking the oars.

"Oh! How did you?" asked Nella, her face lighting up. "Really, I had almost forgotten that part of the affair."

"I must begin at the beginning, and it will take some time," answered the Prince. "Had we not better postpone the recital till we get ashore?"

"I will row and you shall talk," said Nella. "I want to know now."

He smiled happily at her, but gently declined to yield up the oars.

"Is it not sufficient that I am here?" he said.

"It is sufficient, yes," she replied; "but I want to know."

With a long, easy stroke he was pulling the dinghy shorewards. She sat in the stern-sheets.

"There is no rudder," he remarked, "so you must direct me. Keep the boat's head on the lighthouse. The tide seems to be running in strongly; that will help us. The people on shore will think that we have only been for a little early morning excursion."

"Will you kindly tell me how it came about that you were able to save my life, Prince?" she said.

"Save your life, Miss Racksole? I didn't save your life; I merely knocked a man down."

"You saved my life," she repeated. "That villain would have stopped at nothing. I saw it in his eye."

"Then you were a brave woman, for you showed no fear of death." His admiring gaze rested full on her. For a moment the oars ceased to move.

She gave a gesture of impatience.

"It happened that I saw you last night in your carriage," he said. "The fact is, I had not had the audacity to go to Berlin with my story. I stopped in Ostend to see whether I could do a little detective work on my own account. It was a piece of good luck that I saw you. I followed the carriage as quickly as I could, and I just caught a glimpse of you as you entered that awful house. I knew that Jules had something to do with that house. I guessed what you were doing. I was afraid for you. Fortunately I had surveyed the house pretty thoroughly. There is an entrance to it at the back, from a narrow lane. I made my way there. I got into the yard at the back, and I stood under the window of the room where you had the interview with Miss Spencer. I heard everything that was said. It was a courageous enterprise on your part to follow Miss Spencer from the Grand Babylon to Ostend. Well, I dared not force an entrance, lest I might precipitate matters too suddenly, and involve both of us in a difficulty. I merely kept watch. Ah, Miss Racksole! you were magnificent with Miss Spencer; as I say, I could hear every word, for the window was slightly open. I felt that you needed no assistance from me. And then she cheated you with a trick, and the revolver came flying through the window. I picked it up; I thought it would probably be useful. There was a silence. I did not guess at first that you had fainted. I thought that you had escaped. When I found out the truth it was too late for me to intervene. There were two men, both desperate, besides Miss Spencer——"

"Who was the other man?" asked Nella.

"I do not know. It was dark. They drove away with you to the harbour. Again I followed. I saw them carry you on board. Before the yacht weighed anchor I managed to climb unobserved into the dinghy. I lay down full length in it, and no one suspected that I was there. I think you know the rest."

"Was the yacht all ready for sea?"

"The yacht was all ready for sea. The captain fellow was on the bridge, and steam was up."

"Then they expected me! How could that be?"

"They expected someone. I do not think they expected you."

"Did the second man go on board?"

"He helped to carry you along the gangway, but he came back again to the carriage. He was the driver."

"And no one else saw the business?"

"The quay was deserted. You see, the last steamer had arrived for the night."

There was a brief silence, and then Nella ejaculated, under her breath, "Truly, it is a wonderful world!"

And it was a wonderful world for them, though scarcely, perhaps, in the sense which Nella Racksole had intended. They had but just emerged from a highly-disconcerting experience. Among other minor inconveniences, they had had no breakfast. They were out in the sea in a tiny boat. Neither of them knew what the day might bring forth. The man, at least, had the most serious anxieties for the safety of his Royal nephew. And yet—and yet—neither of them wished that that voyage of the little boat on the summer tide should come to an end. Each, perhaps unconsciously, had a vague desire that it might last for ever, he lazily pulling, she directing his course at intervals by a movement of her distractingly pretty head. How was this condition of affairs to be explained? Well, they were both young; they both had superb health, and all the ardour of youth; and—they were together. The boat was very small indeed; her face was scarcely a yard from his. She, in his eyes, surrounded by the glamour of beauty and vast wealth; he, in her eyes, surrounded by the glamour of masculine intrepidity and the brilliance of a throne.

But all voyages come to an end, either at the shore or at the bottom of the sea, and at length the dinghy passed between the stone jetties of the harbour. The Prince rowed to the nearest steps, tied up the boat, and they landed. It was six o'clock in the morning, and a day of gorgeous sunlight had opened. Few people were about at that early hour.

"And now, what next?" said the Prince. "I must take you to a hotel."

"I am in your hands," she acquiesced, with a smile which sent the blood racing through his veins. He perceived now that she was tired and overcome, suffering from a sudden and natural reaction.

At the Hotel Wellington the Prince told the sleepy doorkeeper that they had come by the early train from Bruges, and wanted breakfast at once. It was absurdly early, but a common English sovereign will work wonders in any Belgian hotel, and in a very brief time Nella and the Prince were breakfasting on the verandah of the hotel upon chocolate that had been specially and hastily brewed for them.

"I never tasted such excellent chocolate," exclaimed the Prince.

The statement was wildly untrue, for the Hotel Wellington is not celebrated for its chocolate. Nevertheless, Nella replied enthusiastically, "Nor I." Then there was a silence, and Nella, feeling possibly that she had been too ecstatic, remarked in a very matter-of-fact tone: "I must telegraph to papa instantly."

Thus it was that Theodore Racksole received the telegram which drew him away from Detective Marshall.

SIXTEENTH CHAPTER.

The Woman with the Red Hat.

"There is one thing, Prince, that we have just got to settle straight off," said Theodore Racksole.

They were all three seated—Racksole, his daughter, and Prince Aribert—round a dinner-table in a private room at the Hotel Wellington. Racksole had duly arrived by the afternoon boat, and had been met on the quay by the other two. They had dined early, and Racksole had heard the full story of the adventures by sea and land of Nella and the Prince. As to his own adventure of the previous night he said very little, merely explaining, with as little detail as possible, that Dimmock's body had come to light.

Digitized by Google

"What is that?" asked the Prince, in answer to Racksole's remark.

"We have got to settle whether we shall tell the police at once all that has occurred, or whether we shall proceed on our own responsibility. There can be no doubt as to which course we ought to pursue. Every consideration of prudence points to the advisability of taking the police into our confidence, and leaving the matter entirely in their hands."

"Oh, papa!" Nella burst out in her pouting, impulsive way. "You surely can't think of such a thing. Why, the fun has only just begun."

"Do you call last night fun?" questioned Racksole, gazing at her solemnly.

"Yes, I do," she said promptly. "Now."

"Well, I don't," was the millionaire's laconic response; but perhaps he was thinking of his own situation in the lift.

"Do you not think we might investigate a little further," said the Prince judiciously, as he cracked a walnut, "just a little further—and then, if we fail to accomplish anything, there would still be ample opportunity to consult the police?"

"How do you suggest we should begin?" asked Racksole.

"Well, there is the house which Miss Racksole so intrepidly entered last evening"—he gave her the homage of an admiring glance; "you and I, Mr. Racksole, might examine that abode in detail."

"To-night?"

"Certainly. We might do something."

"We might do too much."

"For example."

"We might shoot someone, or get ourselves mistaken for burglars. If we outstepped the law, it would be no excuse for us that we had been acting in a good cause."

"True," said the Prince. "Nevertheless——" He stopped.

"Nevertheless you have a distaste for bringing the police into the business. You want the hunt all to yourself. You are on fire with the ardour of the chase. Is not that it? Accept the advice of an older man, Prince, and sleep on this affair. I have little fancy for nocturnal escapades two nights together. As for you, Nella, off with you to bed. The Prince and I will have a yarn over such fluids as can be obtained in this hole."

"Papa," she said, "you are perfectly horrid to-night."

"Perhaps I am," he said. "Decidedly I am very cross with you for coming over here all alone. It was monstrous. If I didn't happen to be the most foolish of parents—There! Good-night. It's nine o'clock. The Prince, I am sure, will excuse you."

If Nella had not really been very tired Prince Aribert might have been the witness of a good-natured but stubborn conflict between the millionaire and his spirited offspring. As it was, Nella departed with surprising docility, and the two men were left alone.

"Now," said Racksole suddenly, changing his tone, "I fancy that after all I'm your man for a little amateur investigation to-night. And, if I must speak the exact truth, I think that to sleep on this affair would be about the very worst thing we could do. But I was anxious to keep Nella out of harm's way, at any rate till to-morrow. She is a very difficult creature to manage, Prince, and I may warn you," he laughed grimly, "that if we do succeed in doing anything to-night we shall catch it from her ladyship in the morning. Are you ready to take that risk?"

"I am," the Prince smiled. "But Miss Racksole is a young lady of quite remarkable nerve."

"She is," said Racksole drily. "I wish sometimes she had less."

"I have the highest admiration for Miss Racksole," said the Prince, and he looked Miss Racksole's father full in the face.

"You honour us, Prince," Racksole observed. "Let us come to business. Am I right in assuming that you have a reason for keeping the police out of this business, if it can possibly be done?"

"Yes," said the Prince, and his brow clouded. "I am very much afraid that my poor nephew has involved himself in some scrape that he would wish not to be divulged."

"Then you don't believe he is the victim of foul play?"

"No! Mr. Racksole, we speak in confidence—is it not so? Some years ago my foolish nephew had an affair—an affair with a feminine star of the Berlin stage. For anything I know, the lady may have been the very pattern of her sex, but where a reigning Prince is concerned scandal cannot be avoided in such a matter. I had thought that the affair was quite at an end, since my nephew's betrothal to Princess Anna is shortly to be announced. But yesterday I saw the lady to whom I have referred driving on the Digue. The coincidence of her presence here with my nephew's disappearance is too extraordinary to be disregarded."

(Another long instalment next week.)

"Come out, you villain!" Theodore Racksole cried, in low, almost vicious tones. He dragged up the cowering figure. It was his daughter Nella! This dramatic episode is described in a future instalment of "Phantom Shadows."

Digitized by Google

Symbolical!

Molly: "What flower is that Lord Brokeleigh always wears in his buttonhole?" Dolly: "Marigold."

A Guaranteed Preventive.

Wife (finding a grey hair): "I do so hate to grow old." Husband: "You can avoid that, my dear." Wife: "How?" Husband: "Dye young."

An Awful Tragedy.

The Groom: "I can't see that cheque your father placed among the wedding presents." The Bride: "Papa is so absent-minded. He lit his cigar with it."

The Retort Gallant.

She "Why do you toy so nervously with that fan? Are you afraid of it?" He (gallantly): "I'm afraid of anything that could produce a coolness between us."

Why She Thought.

Cora: "You have a fine sense of the ridiculous." Dick (rather flattered): "Why do you think so?" Cora: "I noticed you smiling at yourself in the mirror."

It Would be Useless.

Clara (after a tiff): "I presume you would like your ring back?" George: "Never mind; keep it. No other girl I know could use that ring unless she wore it on her thumb."

Worse and Worse.

Ethel: "That detestable Mrs. Brown said that I looked thirty." Maud: "How perfectly absurd!" Ethel (elated): "Frankly, now, how old do you really think I look?" Maud: "About forty."

She Knew the Feeling.

Gracie: "See, dear, a diamond! I don't believe any other girl was ever half so happy over an engagement ring!" Madge: "Pooh, darling! I was just as foolish when Bob gave that same ring to me."

A Terrible Punishment.

Fannie: "That hideous old Mr. Jones had the impudence to propose to me." Jennie: "You refused him, of course?" Fannie: "No, I did not. Just to punish him I accepted his offer, he's worth half a million."

Business Before Pleasure.

Cissie: "Going into the drawing-room, Jack? Ethel's in there with Mr. Spooner, and you promised to have a game with me. How long will you be?" Jack: "Only until I get my sixpence to go out, Cissie!"

He Would Not be Selfish.

"It is only right that I should tell you," she said, "that father has lost all." "Not all," he exclaimed. "Yes, all," she asserted. "No," he said, firmly; "not all. You are still left to him. I could not be so cruel as to add to his misfortunes. Tell him—tell him from me that my generosity impels me to leave him what little lies in my power."

Misconstrued!

He (pleadingly): "Why can't we be married at once?" She (coyly): "Oh, I can't bear to leave father alone just now." He (earnestly): "But, my darling, he has had you such a long time." She (freezingly): "Sir!"

When the Light Went Out.

Miss Coygirl: "Jack Softleigh told me last night that I ought to accept him because he was willing to prove his love for me." Her Friend: "What did you say?" Miss Coygirl: "I said I couldn't see it in that light." Her Friend: "Then what did he say?" Miss Coygirl: "Nothing. He just turned the light out."

A Comforting Explanation.

Dashaway: "You say your sister will be down in a minute, Willie? That's good news. I thought perhaps that she wanted to be excused as she did the other day." Willie: "Not this time. I played a trick on her." Dashaway: "What did you do?" "I said you were another fellow!" exclaimed Willie, triumphantly.

She Was Alarmed.

She (gently): "I am afraid I do not love you enough to be your wife, but I shall always be your friend, and sincerely wish for your happiness." He (moodily): "I know what I'll do." She (anxiously): "You surely will not do yourself an injury?" He (calmly): "No, I will find happiness. I will marry someone else." She: "Goodness gracious! Give me another day to consider, dear."

Very Handy.

Dobson: "I tell you what, there's nothing like a bicycle for a man with a nervous, irritable disposition. My wife says I'm a much more agreeable man than I was before I got a machine." Jenkins: "Why's that—because it takes you outdoors so much?" Dobson: "Not only that, but whenever I feel like blowing somebody up, I go down and blow up my tyres, and then I feel better."

Changed His Tone.

George Hard-Up: "We shall have to be very economical this year, Mary." Mrs. H. (enthusiastically): "Yes. I intend making my own hats, bonnets, and dresses and——" George (in rapture): "Mary, you are a prize! Yes; a perfect treasure!" Mary (continuing): "And your shirts and collars and cuffs." George (in abject terror): "Mary, I wasn't really in earnest. We shall not have to be so economical as all that!"

A Born Diplomatist.

Charley was caught napping. A pair of soft, little hands covered his eyes, and a sweet voice commanded: "Guess who it is." Nothing very dreadful for Charley in this, you think; but, then, you don't know that Charley was engaged to two girls, and, for the life of him, couldn't decide which voice it was, which made it a very embarrassing position for Charley. A wrong guess would lead to complications awful to think of. But a happy thought inspired Charley, and he announced: "It's the dearest, sweetest little girl in the world." "Oh, you lovely boy!" gurgled the satisfied one, as she removed her hands. And now Charley thinks of applying for a foreign ministry, feeling that his talents would be wasted in any other than a diplomatic field.

Poor Jollyboy.

"Maria," said Mr. Jollyboy, very solemnly, thinking to take a rise out of the wife of his bosom, "I heard of a dreadful operation which was undergone by a girl. She seemed in danger of losing her sight, and the clever ophthalmic surgeon who operated on her found——" "Yes," breathlessly interposed Mrs. Jollyboy, "found what?" "That the poor girl had a young man in her eye," rejoined her hubby, with a chuckle. Silence reigned supreme for the space of five minutes, at the end of which time Mrs. Jollyboy said quietly: "Well, of course, it would all depend on what kind of young man it was, as there are many men she would have been able to see through," and with a serene smile Mrs. Jollyboy resumed her knitting, leaving the enemy completely routed

Digitized by Google

WRONGLY JUDGED.

Relating How Margaret Ainsworth Made a Great Mistake, and the Manner in which she was Forgiven.

"AND you really mean it?"

"I certainly do."

"Well," he proceeded coolly, "you must let me tell you that I think you are making a very great mistake. Our tastes are congenial, I am rich enough for all practical purposes, and besides"—with a totally different tone of voice—"you will not be likely to find another man who loves you to the absurd degree that I do."

"Don't! We had better drop the subject, don't you think? I must go up to the hotel and meet a friend who is coming to-day."

"You are not going just now," the man asseverated decidedly. "If you are really going to refuse me, and my natural conceit makes it very difficult for me to comprehend that fact—you at least owe me the reason for the refusal. Why won't you marry me, dear?"

"Because I don't wish to do so. It seems hard for you to realise the fact that there may possibly be one woman in the world who has not succumbed to your charms."

"That is a very disagreeable tone, and I hardly believe that I am so egotistical as to merit such a vigorous snubbing." He was lounging on the beach by her side, and he suddenly turned so as to look straight into her eyes. His voice sounded harsh when he spoke again. "You have not yet given me the reason for my rejection. I don't believe that you can truthfully tell me you do not care for me at all."

"That will do. You are quite at liberty to believe whatever you wish; but I assure you that I can think of no inducement great enough to persuade me to marry you. Good morning."

"Wait." His hand was on her arm, and he looked at her with determination. "I shall keep you—forcibly if I must—but keep you I shall until you answer my question. Don't you know that I am entitled to that much, at least? Why will you not marry me?"

"Because I thoroughly despise you," she returned coldly. "Is that being explicit enough? You must pardon the rudeness as you insisted upon an answer."

"Why do you despise me?"

She looked at him disdainfully, but vouchsafed no remark. He caught her look and flushed hotly.

"You shall tell me exactly what you mean; even you dare not treat me so!"

"Well, you see," the woman said slowly, with a flash of unmistakable triumph in her eyes, "I know Phœbe Allison very intimately."

"Well?"

"I think that is quite sufficient for me to say. Or do you have so many such flirtations that your memory proves treacherous?"

"I have had no sort of flirtation, either with Miss Allison or with anyone else. I have been waiting all my life for one woman, who turns out to have no heart and no conscience."

"How dare you speak so to me!"

"Have I spoken as harshly to you as you have to me? Or do you imagine that I shall allow you a monopoly of that sort of thing? Do you consider it womanly to be as friendly and as lovable as you were all summer up to the last few days—to really lead me to expect a different answer from the one you have given me—and then to treat me as you are doing now?"

"Well, you see, the truth is that until last week I never imagined you to be the person you are; it was only when you spoke of being at Edgewater two seasons ago that I knew you were the man who broke Phœbe's heart and acted such a despicable part."

"Margaret, how dare you say such things? I met Miss Allison that summer, of course, but it was the merest acquaintance. After all this time don't you know me better than to bring such an accusation against me?"

"I have known Phœbe years where I have known you but months, and Phœbe"—with slow deliberation—"is quite incapable of telling me an untruth or distorting facts."

"The obvious inference being——"

"You can draw it for yourself. Why will you persist in keeping me here? It is neither gentlemanly nor courteous."

"My list of sins is already so long that a few more can hardly make any difference in your eyes. I am beginning to get some light on the subject at last, and I intend to have some more information before I release you. You can console yourself with the thought that this is the last time in all probability that I shall ever seek your society." He looked at her keenly a moment, but Margaret Ainsworth was gazing out across the ocean and refused to meet his glance. "As you seem to have been Miss Allison's confidante, suppose you tell me of what crime I stand accused."

"You did not monopolise her time, pay her every attention, make love to her, and then, after you had returned to London, write her that of course she was only having a little summer flirtation just as you were; that you understood she was not in earnest and that you had not been?"

The man looked at her with an anger in his eyes that he did not try to conceal.

"You are quite right. I did not do any of those things." Suddenly his indignation broke bounds. "I wonder how you dare to say such things to me? I certainly am fortunate to have escaped being accepted by you. I thank you very heartily for that. Life with a woman devoid of trust and faith would be nothing but Purgatory. One thing more and then I will not detain you longer. Give me Miss Allison's address. I intend to get to the bottom of this matter; then, when you know the truth, perhaps you will have womanliness enough to apologise for the gratuitous insults that you have given the man who said he loved you."

Digitized by Google

Margaret Ainsworth rose slowly to her feet.

"It will be an easy matter to give you Phœbe's address—much easier than you think—she is the friend I am expecting at the hotel. You did not dream of that, did you, when you indulged in your heroics?"

"You are making the list of apologies due to me very long." He sprang to his feet and stood beside her. "If Miss Allison is at the hotel we will go there now."

"Come, if you dare! Do not think she will shield you, or do you suppose that she has missed her train?"

"You are likely very soon to find out what I think, so it is hardly necessary for me to tell you."

The path was narrow, and Margaret swept on ahead of him. Duncan made no effort to keep abreast of her. They went on in silence. Suddenly there was a rush in front of them, and a slight feminine form precipitated itself into Margaret's arms.

"I simply couldn't wait any longer. I had to start out and hunt you up. Oh, Margaret, I've got such hosts to tell you! See." She held up her hand, on which gleamed an engagement-ring. "I'm ever so happy, Madge! I wonder how I ever imagined that I was in love two years ago."

Margaret threw her arm round her friend, and turned so as to face Duncan where he had halted in the path behind them.

"This is someone you know, Phœbe; an introduction will hardly be necessary, will it?"

Miss Allison looked uncertain for a moment, then held out her hand with frank cordiality.

"Just at first I didn't recognise you, Mr. Duncan, but I very glad to see you again."

Duncan smiled grimly as he glanced at Miss Ainsworth. That young woman was perplexed and annoyed. What did Phœbe mean?

"I thought," she commenced desperately, knowing that she must bring matters to a crisis, "that you did not entertain a very high opinion of Mr. Duncan, that——"

And there she stopped, hopelessly bewildered by the genuine astonishment which she saw in Phœbe's Allison's eyes.

"I always liked Mr. Duncan, but we were never very well acquainted. I don't understand"—then catching the look on Margaret's face she broke off—"Margaret, ou must be thinking of Fred Dunton." Phœbe flushed warmly as she pronounced the name. "You have certainly got Mr. Duncan and Mr. Dunton mixed up. If I were Mr. Duncan I should not forgive you for that. Will you be at the hotel soon? I must go and get off my travelling dress before lunch. Come up to my room, won't you?" And Phœbe darted off.

Margaret started to follow her, but Duncan barred her path.

"Have you nothing to say? I am ready to listen to any apology that you have to offer."

"I beg your pardon, of course. Now please let me go."

"A moment please. Do you retract all your charges regarding Miss Allison?"

"Of course." She hesitated an instant, then added with a palpable effort, "I am very sorry that I misjudged you."

Duncan stood before her, immovable and stern.

"Your words came readily enough when you wished to convict me of a dastardly act. You seem to have very few with which to make amends."

"What do you wish me to say more than I have?"

"I can hardly tell you that."

She looked at him distantly for an instant, then some sudden thought flushed her cheeks a burning scarlet.

Duncan smiled a little bitterly but made no movement to speak.

It seemed to Margaret Ainsworth that she was living centuries in those few seconds. Why was he so merciless? Why didn't he help her if—if he really cared? But then she supposed he was too angry to care any more for her as he had. Couldn't he see that it was all a wretched mistake and that she had suffered from it as much as he?

The silence grew unbearable. Duncan would not break it. Margaret felt that she could not—still almost anything was better than the present situation.

"Is it worth while for me to attempt anything? You may possibly remember saying that you were thankful I had said 'No.' Since you feel that way it is of no use for me to offer any explanations."

"That is for you decide, of course," he returned in a perfectly emotionless voice. "If you think you have satisfied your conscience and made honourable amends I have nothing to urge."

"Then do not keep me here—let me pass."

"With pleasure."

Duncan stepped aside and Margaret walked by—but only a few steps. She wheeled quickly and held out both hands.

"You do not mean to forgive and forget?" she asked questioningly.

"What am I to forget?"

"If—if—if—you would forget that I had said 'No,' and——"

Duncan's arms were round her and his eyes and lips were telling her that everything was all right between them. In her great relief she felt her anger rising against him once more.

"Why didn't you help me, Dick? You were positively cruel. You almost made me ask you to marry me."

Duncan laughed teasingly.

"I owed you something, dear, but that was not the real reason. You were sure enough of my love. There was no question about that in your heart—but there was a great question in my mind as to whether you cared more for your pride than you did for me. I wanted to have that matter settled for ever."

"And you are satisfied?"

"Perfectly," replied Duncan, with a look of supreme content.

Mabel C. Jones.

ARE YOU GENEROUS? ARE YOU MEAN?

ARE YOU CLEVER? ARE YOU DULL?

Whatever you are it is as well to know other things concerning yourself, so send a specimen of your handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope to Ranee, 23 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. A reliable delineation of your character will reach you in return—this will give you the required information.

How to Take and Fake Photographs

By CLIVE HOLLAND. Cloth, Price 1s.

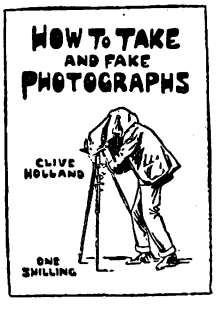
Some of the chapters are:



THE DARK ROOM. Its size—Fittings—Stock of Chemicals—Various uses. CAMERAS, PLATES, and FILMS. The choice of a Camera—Shutters—Plates and their varieties—The various merits of plates and films, etc. EXPOSURE. Testing speeds of plates—Tables of exposures—Plate speed table—Exposure hints—Don'ts, etc. DEVELOPMENT OF NEGATIVES. Developers—Normal Development—Development of over-exposed and under-exposed plates—Local development—Intensification and reduction of negatives—Re-touching—Varnishing, etc., etc.

At all Railway Bookstalls and Booksellers, or post free for 1s. 2d. from The Book Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THEIR ELOPEMENT.

Telling How it was Frustrated, Happily For All Concerned.

THE light was turned down in Rev. Mr. Hadley's study, and the man himself sat before the fire at one end of the room, but partly conscious, however, of the rollicking flames, for he was thinking over the line of his next sermon. A rap sounded at the study door. He had not heard the outer door open, and knew nothing of his caller until the knock came, and he turned to see a man standing in the doorway. He did not recognise him at first, but as he went towards him, turning up the lamp, he reached out his hand with the words:

"Ah, Thomas—good evening."

The man after the first greeting did not take the seat to which the minister invited him, but stood awkwardly fumbling with his hat. He wore a coarse suit and looked as if he did not feel at home in his present surroundings. Mr. Hadley saw his evident discomfort, and after waiting a moment for him to make known his errand, said kindly:

"Well, Thomas, what can I do for you?"

At this the other found his voice. "I—at first I didn't mean to say anything about it," he began, "and then—I thought you'd ought to know."

"What is it?" asked Mr. Hadley.

"It's—it's Miss Bess, sir."

"My daughter?"—in surprise.

"Yes—yes, sir," stammered the visitor. "She's planning to run off—elope, that is."

"What do you mean, man? Are you speaking of my daughter Elizabeth?" asked Mr. Hadley sternly.

"Yes, sir, and Ben Wilson. Him and her are planning to run off together."

The older man stood as if stunned; then rousing himself, he said slowly:

"I don't understand."

"Well, you see, it's like this," resumed the other. "I was going over to Brantwood this afternoon, and I took a short cut through the woods that's off to the left o' the bridge, you know, and all of a sudden I heard somebody talking. I hadn't made no noise, and so they didn't know anybody was near 'em, but what I heard 'em say made me stop and listen for more. I ain't given to listening to what's none o' my business, Mr. Hadley; but I thought at first that somebody was planning a robbery, and then—I soon see it wasn't no robbery after all, but an elopement, and I looked through the trees and see 'twas Ben Wilson and Miss Bess."

"Are—are you positive, Thomas, positive it was an elopement they were planning?" Mr. Hadley put the question calmly, but his face was white and drawn.

"Certain, sir, or I wouldn't have told you. It's to-night."

"To-night?"—with a start. "Are you sure they said to-night?"

"Yes, sir, at ten o'clock, and there ain't much time to lose if you want to catch 'em."

Mr. Hadley looked at the clock. It was nearly half-past nine. "Elizabeth went to her room an hour ago," he mused; "she said she had a headache."

"Very likely," nodded the other.

"Doubtless we had better start at once. I thank you, Thomas. Perhaps you will direct me to the place you speak of."

There was an appeal in the older man's words to which the other responded promptly.

"Pleased to go with you, sir. You'd better put on your overcoat," he said a moment later, when they reached the outer door; "these evenings is gittin' chilly."

Mr. Hadley paused to take a coat which was hanging in the hall, and the two went down the steps in silence. Little, indeed, was said during their half-mile walk. Thomas in a vague way felt the incongruity of his position, while the other was busy with his own thoughts. His little Elizabeth! Could it be possible that it was of her this man had spoken?

"My poor, motherless child," Mr. Hadley's thoughts ran; "how have I been remiss in my duty? Would that your mother had lived, she might have saved you from this folly. Would you, indeed, leave your father's house and go away with that—that boy? Ah, a little of the wisdom of the serpent is sometimes best. It may be—if I had not forbidden him to come to the house—forbidden fruit is always sweetest—I have erred, no doubt, and because I did not fancy the young man—it may be I have blamed him for the misdeeds of his father. It may be if I had taken pains to become better acquainted with him, I should have found him other than I judged him, might have seen him with Elizabeth's eyes, as it were. But now—is it too late to help the matter?"

Henry Hadley had married somewhat late in life, and a few years later his wife had died, leaving him a year-old daughter. But the child with her flying, yellow hair and dancing, dark eyes he had never quite understood, and during the sixteen years since his wife's death, he had watched her growing up before him, fair to look upon, no doubt, but, as he told himself, Elizabeth's child would have looked fair to him in any case, and having her mother's name, must she not develop something of her mother's character?

She had usually been ready enough to obey him, save for a momentary pout or flash of self-will, after which her subdued penitence was a charming thing to see. He had never dreamt her capable of deceit, and when to-night she had gone early to her room, he did not for a moment doubt she had the headache of which she spoke, yet when this man—this comparative stranger—had come to him with his strange story, he had not thought of questioning his truthfulness, had not given his daughter so much as the benefit of a doubt, had not even gone to her room to ascertain whether or not she had deceived him. For a moment the father blamed himself, yet he did not falter in the way he was going. He felt—something assured him—that the man spoke the truth, and coming soon to where a horse was harnessed to a light cart, it did not in the least surprise him.

Digitized by Google

Thomas grasped the minister's arm. "That's his horse," he said in a whisper.

"Hush," the other returned. "Let me go on alone."

A few steps and he came in sight of two figures dimly outlined; they were going towards the waiting carriage. There was a low murmur of voices and then one more distinct. "My daughter," it said.

The two figures paused suddenly as if rooted to the ground, and there was a dead silence.

"Elizabeth—Benjamin—come back to the house and be married; then you can go away if you wish."

The minister spoke firmly, there was no trace of anger in his voice; yet had a thunderbolt fallen from Heaven, the two young people could not have been more terrified. The girl grasped her companion's arm.

"Ben—oh, Ben, what shall we do?" she sobbed.

Ben himself, however, was equally at a loss.

"Come, my children; it grieves me that you should go away to have the marriage service performed when I can do it for you. You have a carriage, Benjamin; kindly take Elizabeth back to the house; you will find the door unlocked, and I will be there soon."

The young man hesitated, while Bess, with a hysterical laugh, said:

"We might as well go back."

They entered the carriage, turned in the direction of the vicarage, and had gone on for several moments in silence before it occurred to either of them that Mr. Hadley was walking, and the thought of the man, no longer young, trudging over the half mile of dark roadway while they rode, gave them a curious feeling; besides, how did he know that they would not go on to Brantwood as they had planned?

As Mr. Hadley and Thomas parted a little way from the house of the former, the clergyman reached out his hand.

"Good-night, Thomas," he said, with his air of simple dignity. "I shall not forget what you have done for my daughter and myself. For the present, I can only say that I thank you."

When he re-entered his study where the two young people were awaiting him, the fire had died down. He went towards the fireplace and put some fresh sticks of wood upon the coals, remarking as he did so:

"If I had known we were to have a wedding here this evening, I would have tried to have the room brightened up a bit."

Bess' pink cheeks grew carmine in the firelight and she looked up at her father questioningly, while Ben moved uneasily. Mr. Hadley sat down and covered his eyes with his hand for a moment, while the old clock in the hall ticked with painful distinctness—that and the crackling fire were the only sounds. Presently the clergyman looked up, and putting on his spectacles began:

"Other things aside, I presume you would as lief have me perform the marriage service as Mr. Robbins, of Brantwood?"

Bess and Ben exchanged a startled glance, but the latter found voice to answer:

"Certainly, sir."

"Therefore we may as well proceed. I—I suppose you have your marriage license?"—looking over his spectacles at the prospective bridegroom.

The young man glanced over at Bess, and then, with a feeling of foolishness quite evident in his looks, stammered:

"I—we—of course—that is—not yet!"

"Do I understand that you have not procured a license?"

"I have not—yet."

"How old are you, Benjamin?"

"Nineteen," answered the unfortunate owner of these years.

Mr. Hadley nodded gravely.

"Is it asking too much to request you to wait till to-morrow? We can probably arrange matters by that time."

The clergyman looked from one to the other over his spectacles, while Bess looked appealingly over at Benjamin. As for the young man, he just then felt no need of the bright wood fire; he was quite warm enough and equally uncomfortable; but, meeting the girl's glance, he asked:

"What do you say, Bess?"

"We'd better wait, I suppose," she answered slowly.

Another silence followed, broken at length by Mr. Hadley.

"My children," he hesitated, "it grieves me that you should have so little confidence in me. It grieves me that I should have fallen so far short of my duty as to make that confidence impossible.

"Elizabeth, you have chosen this man, and if your heart's love has gone out to him, God forbid that I should come between you. And my—my son, the love of a pure woman is a thing of which a man may well be proud. It is a thing not to be taken lightly, and when that love is returned by the man to whom it is given, marriage—which is, as it should be, a sacrament—gives to it a dignity which, alas, too many fail to comprehend. It is not for a day, a year, but for life. No greater blessing can come to you than such a love as I am constrained to believe Elizabeth has for you, and that you reciprocate her feeling, I, too, am bound to believe. Such a love her mother brought to me."

Mr. Hadley was silent for a little while, while Bess and Ben sat vaguely uncomfortable; they did not look at each other, and the bright colour had gone from the girl's cheeks.

"The years have gone so quickly," he went on again. "I had not realised that my little daughter was a woman, with a woman's heart and feeling. And yet, if your lives are spared, there are many years before you ere you reach middle life."

For some time longer he continued speaking, while the two before him listened in silence. When the young man rose to go, he looked from the girl to her father hesitatingly, and at length said somewhat clumsily:

"If—if you'd rather put it off, Bess—perhaps you'd rather—arrange things, you know."

The girl seemed to understand, for she replied:

"We might wait—a week."

"Good-night," said Mr. Hadley. He did not offer to go to the door with the young man, but with a bow, including both him and Bess, left the girl to see him out. Their adieux were brief, for a moment later she came back to her father. She stood a moment in silence, then with a burst of tears sank down beside him.

"Forgive me," she sobbed. "I didn't know how—how good you are."

"God knows your happiness is dearer to me than my own," the clergyman returned gently, adding: "It would have grieved your dear mother to have had you married elsewhere than in your own home."

Later, when they parted for the night, father and daughter understood each other as never before.

Ben came round the next day, looking rather foolish, it must be confessed; of this, however, Mr. Hadley did not seem to be aware, but greeted him in a friendly manner, and after conversing for a few minutes on impersonal subjects, invited him to call often, that they might become better acquainted, and went to call his daughter. He told her to make such preparations for the wedding as she thought best; really he understood such matters so little himself.

"We have decided to put it off till next month," Bess told him a day or two later.

"Indeed. You are sure it is your own wish, Elizabeth?"

"Yes," she answered, and gave him a glance which might have meant one of several different things.

Digitized by Google

For a while Ben called every day, then two or three days passed when he did not come in.

"I—I hope I do not keep him away," Mr. Hadley remarked, looking anxiously at his daughter.

"Not at all," she answered; "he comes once a week."

At this the father regarded his daughter with a glance as doubtful in meaning as hers had been a little before.

One evening, as father and daughter sat together in his study, he asked after a pause:

"By the way, Elizabeth, when is that wedding coming off?"

The girl's face flushed, paled, and flushed again before she answered:

"I think it isn't coming off."

"My dear, do you mean——"

But the girl's arms were round his neck.

"Shall you be dreadfully disappointed if you never have a chance to marry us at all?" she asked.

The man pushed the girl gently back where he could see her face. "Elizabeth," he said, "is it so?"

"Yes, it is so," she returned. "We find that—I don't want him, and he doesn't want me—so we've given it up; wouldn't you?"

"Are you sure you have ceased to care for him?"

"Dear me, yes. Do you know—I was really tired of the sight of him when he came so often. I don't think I ever cared much; I only thought I did, just because you didn't want him to come here, I suppose?"

"If that is so, then you are not sorry that I interrupted your plan?"

"Sorry!" The girl laughed and then grew suddenly sober. "Papa," she said, "if you hadn't, I'm sure I should have regretted it all my life."

When a few years later Mr. Hadley performed the marriage service at his daughter's wedding, the groom was a man of a very different type from Benjamin Wilson, and as for that person, he was married the year before that.

Edwin Matthews.

"Shall you marry him, Alice?"

"It's manners to wait to be asked," returned Alice.

"Hasn't he asked you?" persisted Will Cable.

"That would be telling," Alice Marsh replied.

Then she laughed up at the young giant leaning over the back of a high chair, and regarding her with a look at once quizzical and puzzled. He was just as gentle, as retiring, as shy as ever. And yet the world had great things to say of his wisdom, his indomitable pluck in the face of distressing obstacles, the lofty scientific value of his researches and discoveries. He had been interviewed and lauded. The critics were unanimous in his praise. And here he was—just the same delightful fellow of five years before.

Carriage wheels had stopped before the door. They could hear the servant crossing the hall. "Mr. Reginald Raymon," announced the man.

Mr. Raymon, bland and placid, round-faced, round-eyed, hat in hand and monocle in oye, made his appearance.

He had come to take her to the theatre. He intended to lay his heart and his vast fortune at her feet that very evening.

Later they were driving slowly homeward through the silence, the crispness, the blueness of a perfect February night.

His arm slipped confidently round her waist.

"The gods could give me nothing—unless you were theirs to give."

"Ah!" she said softly. She moved a little until she was free from his arm. "You—you are quite sure——"

That was just where Raymon's bad quarter of an hour began.

"Sure? Indeed, yes. I have not spoken hastily. I have given the matter—a weighty one, as you will admit—due consideration." He adjusted his monocle. He wished the coachman would drive more slowly. "I recollect what I owe to my family, to my position, to—if I may say so—to myself."

"Yes," sighed a tender voice. "Oh—yes."

"And I have made up my mind that you are the only woman I shall marry—you!"

He could feel again the tremor of the slender shape near. He put out a fat little hand. His touch was not tentative by any means. It was determined. There was no false modesty about Raymon. In the gloom of the carriage he almost forgot the charm, the beauty, the power of the girl. All these were engulfed in his own superb condescension—a condescension of which she was aware. Her choking voice when she spoke proved that.

"And I have decided it is you—you whom I have chosen for—my wife!"

"You have"—how overwhelmed she was—"not spoken rashly?"

"My mind is irrevocably made up!"

"You are sure you will not regret——"

He cut short the faltering voice. "Your timidity is uncalled for, dear. I never change my mind. When shall it be?"

The carriage door swung back. Raymon walked with Miss Marsh up the steps.

"Don't come in!" she intreated sweetly. "I have an engagement. And—I'm very sorry, you know—and very grateful for the honour, of course, but I couldn't care for you—that way. Thank you—ever so much."

Then, her cheeks scarlet, her lips apart, and breathing hard, she was in the library—was facing a man who had risen from his low chair in the light of the dying fire.

"Well?" he questioned hoarsely. He came slowly towards her. "Well? He proposed to-night. I knew he would. Get it over, for Heaven's sake! When is it to be? When are you to give yourself to any man's arms?"

She went straight towards him. Her colour had suddenly gone. She was as white as the roses she carried. And her cheeks were wet and shining in the firelight.

"Whenever you will take me!" she said.

Kate M. Cleary.

Digitized by Google

LOST AND WON.

Relating How Eva Carleton Lost a Race but Won a Heart.

THEY walk together, ride together, play lawn-tennis together, often as not dine together, and dance together; in fact, they are "good friends."

Yet the world throws many barbed shafts at them, questioning the perfect friendliness in which they have enveloped themselves as with a cloak. It is contrary to the world's sophistry that a man and woman fashioned in youth and beauty should live in daily and hourly intercourse with each other without some deeper, more tender sentiment being born of such companionship. This infatuated couple call it good fellowship. They do not heed the arrows of the world's cynicism.

An old mother, infirm, almost bedridden, and a lover, who is also her cousin, in Australia constitute the girl's domestic ties.

The man is alone in the world. A babe struggling lustily with his nurses, a boy measuring his will against his masters', a man running counter opinions, and adopting heretical doctrines in direct opposition to the world's cherished creed and code of laws. This is Ben Scarlett, late Captain of the 71st Lancers.

Eva Carleton lends a ready ear to his tales. She is engaged to be married, but the engagement does not prey heavily on her mind. She seldom hears from him, and never writes herself. So there are no obstacles in the way of the friendship which commenced three summers ago. They are leaning now upon the stone balustrade of the terrace, as goodly a couple as were ever created.

A young moon is shining in her pale innocence above their heads, looking down upon them from a bed of daffodil sky.

"It is going to be a lovely night," observes Captain Scarlett, blowing a cloud of smoke from between his lips. "Pity you do not smoke, Eva; it is the one pleasant thing we cannot enjoy in common."

"A pity you don't relinquish the pleasure then," the girl says, laughing. "I gave up needlework because you declared that it fretted you to see me indulging such a namby-pamby taste."

"You used to prick your fingers," is his laconic observation.

"Smoking makes your teeth black," she retorts quickly.

"What's the odds as long as you are happy? I am quite contented with the knowledge that my teeth are whiter than most people's."

The girl looks steadily at him. It is a glance perfectly innocent of coquetry; she is not to blame that her eyes are large and clear.

"Ben, are you conceited?" she asks, in a frank tone.

"Nothing so womanish," he replies, holding the cigar between his teeth while he speaks.

"It is hardly fair of you to sneer at my sex—hardly friendly, is it, Ben?" a touch of hurt pride jarring in her voice.

"Heavens! no, it is not!" Captain Scarlett admits warmly. "You cannot help your weakness any more than I can help my strength. Why did not the Fates ordain that you should be a man, Eva? Your firm will, courage, plucky principle, each and all are deserving of a better shrine than that of a woman's weakly body. I wish you had been a man, Eva."

The girl does not answer for a moment; and there falls a silence of human speech while summer sounds—the tinkling of a carter's bells, the lowing of cattle, the drowsy twittering of the feathered multitudes of songsters—follow quickly on each other.

At last a few words drop heavily on the human silence.

"We have been very happy as we are. My friendship has not failed to satisfy you because I am a woman, or at least you have given me no cause for believing so hitherto."

"I have not—I will not."

When they speak again it is in an entirely different strain.

"You should tell Berry to carefully uproot the weeds which I observed among the strawberry-beds; they are multiplying fast."

"I will remember."

"And now I must be off. I am dining at the Reddingleys'." Shall I meet you there?" he added, as an after-thought.

"No; they have not asked me to-night," she tells him in a slow, laboured fashion.

"No? Well, good-bye, then!"

And away he swings down the flight of stone steps. Arrived there he looks up. Eva is standing exactly as he left her, with her elbows resting on the balustrade; his eyes meet her downbent ones. There is a curiously soft expression in them—an expression strangely unfamiliar to Ben Scarlett; it must be the effect of the pale young moonlight.

"Remember, to-morrow—at ten sharp," he calls out, and before she can nod back in reply he is gone.

* * * * *

At ten sharp Miss Carleton is standing in the old-fashioned oak hall waiting for her horse to be brought round from the stables. At half-past ten she is cantering across country with Ben Scarlett, and a straggling groom in the rear.

"What did you do at the Reddingleys' last night?" Eva asks, breaking a long spell of silence.

"Ate a good dinner, drank plenty of dry champagne, discussed peaches and politics; then adjourned to the drawing-room, here I listened to indifferent music, talked and—and"—hestitating—"that is all."

"No, it is not," laughs the girl, flicking the mare's neck idly with the reins.

Ben Scarlett looks round sharply at her.

"Eh?"

"You forgot to wind up with your usual adjective," she reminded him.

"An omission on my part; but as it happens, I was not bored last night." Then, perhaps thinking that he has said enough, he sets off at a brisk canter.

Digitized by Google

The tower clock is striking twelve when they turn into the dusty high-road.

"Beastly clock! I will be bound that it is wrong," Captain Scarlett remarks. "It made me half an hour late for dinner last night."

"And so you owe it a grduge?" Eva says, with a strange questioning look.

Ben Scarlett does not answer. There is something amiss with the bridle of his smart, tall roan. He dismounts to attend to it.

"Here comes the Reddingleys' carriage," the girl informs him. "I always recognise it some distance off, on account of the coachman's brilliant red hair."

"Eh? Really!" laughs Ben, swinging himself up in his saddle again. "Yes, it is their carriage. 'Talk of an angel,' you know the rest."

The "angel" on this occasion is leaning back against the cushions of the carriage in solitary languor. A shot-blue silk sunshade protects the exquisite fairness of her face from the sun's inquisitive golden gaze. She moves it slightly to one side, perhaps to give better point to the sweeping bow with which she favours Ben.

"How—d'ye do, Captain Scarlett?" murmurs the sweet, drawling voice, and away rolls the carriage, leaving a cloud of dust behind it.

"Who—is—she?" inquires Eva.

"A Miss Barron. Cousin of the Reddingleys'. Met her there last night," Ben jerks out in short sentences.

Miss Carleton wastes no more words; she canters the mare the whole way home.

Arrived at the gate she holds out her hand to the Captain.

"Au revoir, Ben; you will come round this afternoon?"

"I think not—the fact is, I have promised the Reddingleys to turn in there for tennis."

"Oh, very well!" with studied indifference. "I shall take the mare round to the stable now. Don't let me detain you. Good-bye!"

* * * * *

A slight young figure, clothed in a brown-holland gown, with a bunch of purple heartsease pinned just under a very round, very white chin. This is the first human thing that Captain Scarlett's black eyes rest upon as he turns in at the wicket-gate leading from the fields to Miss Carleton's ancestral halls.

Now, Captain Scarlett's conscience smites him, in that he has not paid the girl even a flying visit for a week or more.

How will she receive him?"

He is not left long in doubt, for Eva holds out her hand as usual; and a moment later they are discussing the relative merits of the new litter of fox-terrier pups as though their intercourse had been unbroken.

"How is the mare?" inquires Captain Scarlett hastily, when the subject of the fox-terriers is getting somewhat threadbare.

"Lively."

"Have you ridden her lately?"

"Every morning."

It is not easy to carry on a conversation when one receives only monosyllabic replies. Ben desists; the effort is too stupendous. He falls to staring at Eva in silence, watching the sun play hide-and-seek in the gold of her hair. Pretty hair—pretty head, bright, burnished, sleek—the sort of head fitted to find a resting-place on some man's honest heart.

"I do not mind being stared at in reason; but that sort of thing can become an agony when too prolonged. Let me direct your attention to some other object."

The black eyes never flinched.

"Since when have you grown averse to being looked at?" inquires the owner of the offending orbs.

"Since you have grown so pertinacious," replies Eva with grave lips, but a smile sunning itself in her eyes.

"Remember, I have not seen you for a week," Ben says; and the next minute he repents him of the speech.

Miss Carleton regards him with an air of cold astonishment.

"Whose fault is that?"

"Mine; and I am prepared to state that I do not regret my voluntary absence. You have become all the lovelier in my eyes for the comparison with other women. Now, let us change the subject, as it seems to vex you."

"Come indoors; it is cooler there. I believe the sun is affecting your brain," Eva says pityingly.

Ben smiles provokingly.

"Thanks—no; I prefer remaining out here. With your permission, I will light up," producing a cigar from the region of his pocket. "Coming for a ride this afternoon, Eva?"

"Yes."

"How mighty stiff and cool you are, child?"

"Am I?"

"Yes. What is it?"

"Nothing!"—feebly.

Ben does not make another attempt to reinstate himself in her confidence, and, betaking himself off presently, leaves Miss Carleton to solitary meditation.

* * * * *

"Ben, have you ever contemplated the possibility of falling in love?"

This question is a distinct breaking through of the laws and habits of speech which have been set up between them.

Ben feels it to be so, and favours the girl with a long, cool gaze of astonishment. His answer, when it comes, is evasive.

"With whom?"

"Must I single out some person? Then I will choose. That cousin of the Reddingleys—Miss Barron."

The afternoon has been passed in silence. Alternately they have trotted and cantered beside one another, but spoken hardly once. This outburst on Eva's part is as unexpected as it is unwelcome to Captain Scarlett. He does not take any pains to conceal this.

"Heavens, Eva! what goose-chase have you started now? Why choose Miss Barron of all persons?"

"I could think of no likelier person;" then, with an awkward forced laugh: "You would not have me substitute myself."

"It would be less improbable," dryly from Ben.

"Nonsense! We are only friends. It is rather late in the day to begin to fall in love with each other," laughing.

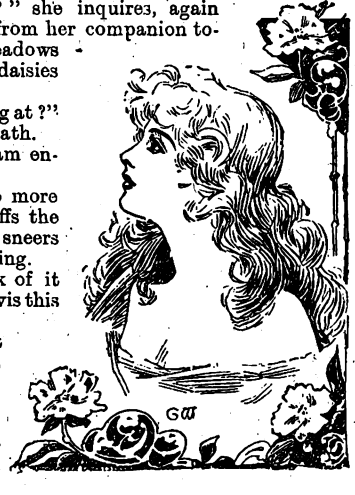
"Friends be hanged!" ejaculates Ben fervently.

It is a full minute before Miss Carleton recovers her breath after this sudden douche from her impetuous companion.

"Well, as you will not become interested in your future prospects, let us discuss mine."

"By all means," assents Ben.

"Have you ever contemplated the possibility of my being married?" she inquires, again turning her face away from her companion towards the fair green meadows with their harvest of daisies and buttercups.



"What are you driving at?" exclaims Ben in open wrath.

"You know that I am engaged?"

"Yes; and think no more of it than you do," scoffs the Captain, and when he sneers he looks almost forbidding.

"But we must think of it now. I heard from Davis this morning."

"Did you? You must send him about his business."

"After five years?"

"Look here, Eva," facing round upon her with a steadiness of resolve difficult to combat, "you do not love the man, and never have; you should not have permitted yourself to become engaged to him; luckily, it is never too late to mend the folly of our ways."

Digitized by Google

"Yes, it is. What reason could I give him for my broken faith?" pants the girl in excessive agitation.

"Why should you give him one at all?"

"Oh, Ben, is that how you would choose to be treated?" exclaims Eva reproachfully.

Captain Scarlett straightens his shoulders with an air of mighty superiority.

"How proud you are, Ben!"

And so the conversation ends.

"Come, let us race each other home," she cries presently. "If I win you shall present me with a pair of new stirrups. If I lose you shall become the happy possessor of the smallest and sweetest of the fox-terrier pups. Agreed? Then—one, two, three, and aw—ay—whoop! Halloa!"

The mare darts past the roan like a winged bird.

"A—race—by—road!" shouts Ben, after the girl.

But she never turns her head. Straight as a die, she gallops on for the length of a mile, then swerving suddenly, leaps a gate, and so turns on to the pasturage.

Scarlett follows, not too closely, for he wishes Eva to win her stirrups.

"Do you think Bonny will take that wall?" Eva calls out, pointing with her whip to the object in question.

"Better not try," returns Ben.

Disaster sometimes overtakes the wilful woman; it overtakes her this time in the midst of youth, beauty, and garish day.

When Ben Scarlett clears the wall he finds Eva and the mare huddled together on the green meadow-grass, among the buttercups and daisies. The mare's head is resting heavily on the breast of her mistress' blue habit, while Eva's head has found a harder, more hurtful resting-place.

It is Ben's wont to be cool and calm in the face of danger. He maintains his equanimity now. The first thing to be done is to relieve Eva from the pressure of the mare. This is not a simple task; but in less than five minutes Ben Scarlett has accomplished it.

Eva's head now rests upon the breast of his rough tweed coat; he strokes it tenderly with one big brown hand, the pretty shining head he was foolish enough to have romanced over that morning. The few hours which have since elapsed have not cured him of the folly.

"Poor little Eva—dear little woman!"

At this unfamiliar mode of address the great blue eyes open and gaze around in pitiful bewilderment.

"Where am I? What has happened?" and then lifting her voice in a sudden cry, she calls out: "Bonny, oh, tell me—she is not hurt!"

"I believe not; she is only too frightened to stir just at present," Ben answers gravely; "but you, Eva—forgive me if I am more interested in your injuries than Bonny's?"

A wave of scarlet rushes headlong into the girl's face as she listens to the exquisite tenderness of his voice.

"In me, Ben?" she repeats, moving her soft cheek uneasily against his rough coat.

"Yes, in you, my darling—my——"

But with a sudden movement she lays her hand upon his lips.

It is evident that whatever injuries she has sustained they are bodily, for she is in full possession of her senses.

"Do you think you can move, Eva? Are you in pain?"

"No—o," she answers slowly; "I feel no pain; but I am afraid to stir lest I might. There's a confession of cowardice for you!" laughing rather hysterically.

"You must try to be brave, Eva, for my sake," he adds, with a shade of red appearing through the bronze on his face.

For his sake! Why should he have said that?

And yet the suggestion has a marvellous effect, for the girl struggles out of his arms, and a minute later is standing before him, upright, tall, and beautiful.

"Ben, I have lost my stirrups!" with another attempt at a laugh.

"And I have lost something more valuable to me," observes Ben oracularly. "I wonder whether you would prize it if I offered it to you!"

"Offer what you have not got!" raising her brows in a feigned astonishment.

"Nay; because I have already bestowed it on you. Will you keep it, Eva?"

The girl's quick perception is not at fault. She understands; but for answer veils her face with her trembling fingers, and bursts into a passion of tears, while, unheeded, Bonny whinnies for assistance.

* * * * *

After all, nobody is invulnerable in this world, and Ben Scarlett was not destined to prove a brilliant exception.

He succumbs to Cupid's mesmeric influence, and Eva, being the weaker vessel, yields even more entirely, for she flings pride and her plighted troth to the four winds of Heaven, and marries the man who won her heart even while she fondly cherished the belief that they were only good friends.

J. Cameron.

Mrs. Hayseed: "Where did you learn that new piece?" Daughter: "It isn't a new piece. The piano has been tuned."

Miss Gossippe: "Do you pay much attention to what your husband says?" Mrs. Jealous: "Not unless he talks in his sleep."

Angry Wife (after a quarrel): "Seems to me we've been married about a hundred years. I can't even remember when or where we first met." Husband (emphatically): "I can. It was at a dinner-party, and there were thirteen at table."

"You are worth your weight in gold to me, darling!" he murmured. "Then do go home early, Percy, dear," she replied wearily. "I've lost ten pounds since we became engaged, just sitting up late with you. We can't afford such extravagance."

"So you are having your house re-decorated, Mr. Hawkins?" "Yes, the workmen began last week." "Are you making radical changes?" "Yes—very." "What is to be the main feature of the new house?" "You—if you'll consent!"

Jack: "I have a chance to marry a poor girl whom I love, or a rich woman whom I do not love. What would you advise?" George: "Love is the salt of life, my friend. Without it, all else is naught. Love, pure love, makes poverty wealth, pain a joy, earth a Heaven." Jack: "Enough. I will marry the poor girl whom I love." George: "Bravely spoken. By-the-way, would you—er—mind introducing me to the rich woman whom you do not love?"

Digitized by Google

NO ARGUMENT

is needed to prove that

Page Woodcock's Pills

are the safest, surest, and speediest remedy for Wind on the Stomach, Indigestion, Biliousness, and all other Stomach and Liver Troubles. 50 years' increasing British reputation proves that.

Of all Chemists, 1/1½ and 2/9.

SMITHS'.

TO CURE DRUNKARDS

with or without their knowledge. Send Stamp for FREE TRIAL PACKAGE of a wonderful remedy that has saved homes. Send no money. Address in confidence: WARD CHEMICAL Co., 51 Century House, Regent Street, London, W.

RIDER AGENTS WANTED

One in each district to ride and exhibit a sample 1904 Cycle.

Highest grade fully warranted

BRITISH MADE CYCLES

LATEST MODELS £2-10 to £6

New Departure Coaster Hubs, Best Makes Tyres, and best British made equipment throughout.

200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES all makes, good as new, £1 to £2-10

Great factory clearing sale at half factory prices. We send on approval and allow Ten Days' Free Trial on every cycle. Money with carriage charges refunded without question if you are not satisfied.

EARN A CYCLE taking orders from sample machine furnished by us. Our agents are making large profits. Write at once for free catalogues and our special offer. Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonos, half prices.

MEAD CYCLE CO., Dept. 44e, 85-97, Paradise Street, Liverpool, 19, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN.

Rustless Rims Hubs.

Complete with All Fittings and Carriage Paid.

CASH OR 12 MONTHLY PAYMENTS of

£8 0 0 „ 15/- ea.
8 8 0 „ 15/10 „
9 0 0 „ 16/8 „
9 10 0 „ 17/6 „

JUNO Motor Cycles, 3 H.P., £34, or Monthly Payments.

JUNO Two-Speed Gear Cycles, £12 12s., or 12 Payments of 23/4 each. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories; over 130 pages and Hundreds of Illustrations, sent post free.

Metropolitan Machinists' Co. Ld., S.S. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London E.C.; and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

TELL COOK

KEATING'S POWDER

KILLS

BLACK BEETLES

Tins Only 3½ 6½ 11½

BORAX STARCH GLAZE

Imparts enamel gloss and stiffness that lasts until the linen goes to the wash again. Prevents the iron sticking, and eases the work right through.

Sold in 1d. packets everywhere.

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham.

Write for free sample etc.

BORAX DRY SOAP

FOR WASHING EVERYTHING

From 6/- Monthly. Special Offer. 500 New Cycles £3 10s. 500 Genuine B.S.A. £6 10s. Sample Victory Motor Cycle £26. Sent carr. paid before payment. Agents Wanted

Dereham Rd. Cycle Co., Norwich

FREEMAN'S

TRADE MARK

THE ORIGINAL & ONLY TRUE

CHLORODYNE

Best Remedy for Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 6s., or postage free by the INVENTOR, R. FREEMAN, 70 KENNINGTON PARK ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

RECOMMENDED BY MEDICAL MEN.

N.B.—Lord Chancellor Selborne, Lord Justices James and Mellish, decided in favour of Freeman's Original Chlorodyne, and against Browne & Davenport, compelling them to pay all costs.
—"Times," 24-7-73.

5 YEARS' WARRANTY.

SOLID SILVER WATCH,

Lady's or Gent's.

Deposit, 2/6

Sent in Handsome Case.

After delivery of Watch, you send 1/6 each week for 1 weeks, making a total of 22/-. If you prefer to pay cash, within 7 days send balance of 16/- (making 18/6 in all).

Watch delivered only to responsible and bona fide applicants.

C. S. LAST & CO., 59 Oxford St., London, W

NOW APPEARING IN FORTNIGHTLY PARTS.

Price 7d. each net.

PEARSON'S

HOME MANAGEMENT.

Containing Contributions by all the leading authorities on Housekeeping and Domestic Economy.

Over 1,000 pages.
12 Beautifully Produced Coloured Illustrations.
64 Full Page Half Tone Illustrations.
Many Small Cuts in the Text.

COMPLETE IN 12 PARTS.

At all Newsagents and Railway Bookstalls.

If you have not seen the work send 7 stamps for a Specimen Part to the Publisher 17 Henrietta Street, W.C.

IF YOU WANT

to make your Old Blouse into a New Blouse for 4d

Buy a cake of

MAYPOLE SOAP

Dyes any Colour

No MESS — No TROUBLE

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Rejected—No Reason.

"JARO" is in an unpleasant position. He has been "keeping company" with a girl for three years. They had a little quarrel, and parted, but made it up and met again. During the parting, the girl's father was taken ill, and this served as an excuse for her not to meet him so frequently. Latterly, he was asked to cease correspondence with her until she asked him to resume. The next step was taken by her sister, who wrote asking him to cease correspondence altogether, as the girl is now keeping company with another young man, with the full consent of her parents. This young man is in a better position than "JARO," but my correspondent feels that he has been spurned in a most unjust manner, as he has done nothing wrong to deserve it.

* * * * *

I should write to the girl herself, or call and see her, asking whether it is by her own wish that you have been asked to cease relations with her. If so, then, of course, as there was no engagement, you must consider the affair at an end. I should not, however, accept the rejection at any other hands than her own. It seems clear that the quarrel you had, though it was made up, left an unpleasant feeling behind, and that she has ceased to care for you as a result,

A Queer Question.

SOME of my correspondents will forgive me if I tell them that they make me smile. "W. A." writes: "Can you inform me through your column of the etiquette regarding kissing? I am in the habit of visiting my fiancée at her home, and should be glad to know the correct number of times that I should kiss her."

* * * * *

What a question! As if, "W. A.," there were anything "correct" with regard to kissing. And as if any lover fixed the number of kisses by rules of etiquette! What I should say would be, don't kiss her more than a dozen times when there are a large number of people present, as they would wonder how many times you kissed her in private, and you should never let people wonder. As a matter of fact, it is not strictly correct to kiss your sweetheart at all in the presence of others, save when greeting and parting, as that is a thing to be done privately. As to the number of times you might kiss her in private I should say not more than ten thousand. You would not like her rosebud lips to be worn out, I am sure.

The Lover Who is Laughed At.

"I AM a very serious young man," writes "FIDO," "but my young lady always treats me as a huge joke. She laughs at the way I pronounce words, and never understands my thoughts when I express them. She does not see that this treatment makes me very unhappy. If, however, I show that I am annoyed she only laughs all the more. What ought I to do?"

If you are going to marry this young lady, I see that you have a lot of unhappiness in store unless you seriously cultivate a sense of humour. Perhaps it is not born in you, but you should try to acquire it. Try reading light books and papers, and drop that serious manner. Many men are very serious in their heart of hearts, but are most merry dogs in the society of others. The man that wears his seriousness openly has always been a laughing stock, especially with the fair sex.

Friendship With a Senior.

"I HAVE a great friendship," writes "NINETEEN," "with a lady ten years older than myself. At the same time, I do not feel that I love her. She always makes me see the best side of life, and I can tell her things which I would not confide to many others. Is this the kind of woman who would make a good wife for me? Are our ages too different?"

* * * * *

Yes, your ages are not suitable. It is quite natural for a youth to be attracted by a woman very much older than himself, but that is not the kind of attraction which we call love, or which makes for happy marriages. Keep her friendship as long as you can, but the girl for you to marry should be nearer your own age. Besides, I don't suppose for a moment your friend would hear of a proposal from you. Few women of thirty or thereabouts would allow themselves to look ridiculous by marrying so young a man as yourself.

Naming the Day.

"BETROTHED" writes: "My lover presses me to name the day for our wedding, which he wishes to be very soon. I don't like to tell him, but my parents are by no means well-to-do, and the cost of a wedding would be a great drain on my father's pocket. In another year, it may be better, but it would be most difficult at present. At the same time, I do not wish my lover to know that this is so, as my father would lose reputation if it were known that he is pressed for money. I should like your advice."

* * * * *

It is certainly an awkward position. Still, it is a sacred right of the girl and her parents to fix the date of a ceremony, and it is always understood that a man waits on the convenience of the girl's parents in the matter. You need not tell your lover the reason why the wedding cannot take place just yet. Just tell him that it is not convenient, for family reasons. If you cannot tell him this yourself, ask your father or your mother to convey it to him, as then he will have to abide by their decision.

A Stormy Sweetheart.

"MY lover," writes "M. R.," "is always telling me he loves me, and seems very devoted to me, but he has a most fearful temper, and if the least thing upsets him, he calls me some fearful names, and then his language is the reverse of nice. Do you think he can really be so fond of me as he professes? It worries me very much."

* * * * *

Perhaps, "M. R.," it is only his little way. After all, it is often better to have a sweetheart whose temper is short, and soon over, than one whose annoyance spreads over weeks, months, and perhaps years. He certainly ought not to use the language he does, but that is not such an important matter as the character which underlies it. If you really love him, and he loves you, you should condone his little outbursts, and hope that in time he will get over them.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

MISCELLANEOUS ADVERTISEMENTS.

Will be inserted in this column at the rate of 6d. per line of 8 words or part thereof. All advertisements should be addressed to Advertisement Manager, "Short Stories," 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., 11 days prior to date of appearance.

Rabbits.—The best book on the subject is "Rabbit Keeping for Pleasure and Profit," by George Gardner. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (R. Dept.) 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Swimming," by Montague Holbein, the celebrated Channel Swimmer, is a splendid book for those who wish to become good swimmers. Price 1/2 from the Publisher (S. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A Flower Garden for 1/-.—26 Threepenny Packets Expensive Annuals—Aster, Balsam, Canary Creeper, Columbine, Lobelia, Phlox, Everlasting Pea, Ten Weeks' Stock, &c., all different, post free, 1/1¼.

52 Penny Packets for 1/-.—52 different Packets of favourite flower seed, ample supply, post free, 1/1¼, all different from above. 26 packets, 7¼d.

Giant Sweet Peas.—20 Packets Giant Sweet Peas exhibition strains (gold medal); 800 Seeds, post free, 7¼d.

Monster Mignonette.—Sweet-scented Trees, 3ft. high, grown easily from our Pedigree Seed. Large Packets, post free 7¼d.—Imperial Supply Stores, 4 to 20 Crampton Street, Walworth, London.

Phonograph Records.—Edison Bell, &c., to clear; 12, 6/-, 6, 3/6; 8d. each.—D. Dinner, Camberley.

Baby's Long Clothes, complete set, 50 articles, very choice, unused; 21/-; approval.—Mrs. Max, The Chase, Nottingham.

Baldness Cured. Free Trial.—A French Specialist who has devoted his life to the study of Hair Diseases, having cured thousands of almost hopeless cases, will send a genuine inexpensive treatment to all who write enclosing 2 stamps. New Hair grows in 4 to 10 days.—K. Henri-Francis, Brixton Road London.

Beautiful Irish Hand-Embroidered Tray Cloth 1/-; ditto, Afternoon Tea Cloth, 1/9; pair Embroidered and Frilled Pillow Cases, 2/6; Pure Line Remnants in Parcels, 2/6 and 5/-.—E. Jeffers, Cromac Square, Belfast.

"Walking," by C. Lang Neil, is a thoroughly practical guide to pedestrianism, contains information as to how to train in order to become an expert walker, &c. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (W. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Small Gardens, and How to Make the Most of Them," by Violet Biddle, is just the book for those desirous of procuring the best possible results from their gardens. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (S. G. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Etiquette for Men.—A Book of Modern Manners and Customs, which should be in the possession of every reader of Short Stories; post free from 17 Henrietta St. for 1/2.

Typewriting.—Authors' M.S.S. accurately typewritten, 10d. 1,000. Circulars and general work cheap rate. —Mrs. Wells, Uppingham.

Photo Post-cards, yourself, 12 1/6; send photo, no money; pay afterwards.—May, Enfield Terr., Seacombe.

Lace Curtains.—Maker's Stock; thousands of pairs; beautiful designs; buy at 25 per cent. below shops; catalogue free.—Milner's, 28 Hyde Park, Leeds.

Drunkenness Cured.—It is now within the reach of every Woman to save the drunkard. A free trial package of a marvellous home remedy posted to all who write for it. Can be given in tea, coffee, or food, thus absolutely and secretly curing the patient in a short time with or without his knowledge.—Address, in confidence, Ward Chemical Co., 130 Century House, Regent Street, London, W.

"Cricket," Edited by G. L. Jessop, contains practical instructions as to how to play the game by K. S. Ranjitsinhji, C. B. Fry, G. L. Jessop, and others. Price 1/2, post free, from the Publisher (C. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Photography.—"How to Take and Fake Photographs," by Clive Holland, contains all information required by the beginner. Price 1/2, post free, from the Publisher (P. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Face Leathers, superfine quality, 1/- post free, in box. —K. Henre-Frances, Brixton Road, London.

Old Artificial Teeth Bought.—Call or forward by post; full value per return, or offer made.—Messrs. O. Browning, Manufacturing Dentists, 133 Oxford Street, London. (Established 100 years.)

Field Glasses.—Extremely fine pair Regulatio Glasses (Army pattern) very long (30 mile) range, purchased for officer's use in Transvaal, not now required; leather case and strap; worth 75/-; will sacrifice for 11/9; approval before payment proof of genuineness.—F. Barker (Quartermaster), "Durdans," Brixton, S.W.

Teeth Bought, Gold and Platinum. Banker's reference.—Apply, Teeth by Instalments Institute, 48 Edgware Road, W.

If you are Interested in Cage Birds send for my free Catalogue and Amateur's Guide; 250 Illustrations; sent on receipt of two stamps covering postage. Easy payments by joining my Bird Club.—W. Rudd, Bird Specialist, Norwich.

Dentofyxoline Powder.—Invaluable to all wearing Artificial Teeth. Old and loose plates made firm and safe by its use; tasteless and harmless; 1/- post free.—J. Trevor, 13 Union Street, Coventry.

"Poultry Keeping for Pleasure and Profit," by F. E. Wilson. A thoroughly reliable and practical handbook. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (P. K. Dept.) 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A Good Cycle

At a FAIR price is cheaper than a poor Cycle at ANY price. Buy the best and avoid risks.
"CENTAURS," "COVENTRY CHALLENGE," "HUMBERS," "PREMIERS," "ROVERS," "SWIFTS," "SINGERS," &c.
Their names guarantee their quality.

WITHIN YOUR REACH

FROM 8/- MONTHLY.

A HIGH-GRADE COVENTRY CYCLE FOR £6
On approval. Two Years' Warranty.
Write for Lists (Free).
EDWARD O'BRIEN Ltd. (Dept. S3),
World's Largest Cycle Dealers, COVENTRY.

An admirable Food of the

EPPS'S

Finest quality and flavour.

COCOA

Nutritious and Economical.

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

"No Better Food."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED

"Strongest and Best."
—Health

Cocoa

TRY ALSO FRY'S MALTED COCOA

A Combination of Fry's Pure Cocoa and Allen and Hanburys' Extract of Malt.

Strongly recommended by the "LANCET" and "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL."

Digitized by Google

"MENE"

A SAMPLE ½ DOZEN OF THESE FAMOUS SANITARY TOWELS IN ASSORTED SIZES, WILL BE SENT POST FREE FOR SIX STAMPS.

NONE EQUAL THEM FOR CLEANLINESS COMFORT & ECONOMY.

SOLD BY ALL UNDERCLOTHING HOUSES AND CHEMISTS.

LADIES SHOULD WRITE FOR A SAMPLE TO MISS HAYNES, 55, FANN ST. LONDON, E.C.

Your Food will do you more good when salted with . .

CEREBOS

Table Salt

BABY CARS.

Buy direct and save 5/- in the £. Easy Payments from 3/6 Monthly. Good discount for cash. Every Car sent carriage paid, on approval. Our Catalogue shows many lovely styles, send for it.

DIRECT PUBLIC SUPPLY CO., COVENTRY.

"OCEANIC" BOOTS

10/6 EVERYWHERE

THE REST NOWHERE!

Manufactory Northampton.

SCRIVEN

The MAGIC CIRCLE

THE WOOD-MILNE REVOLVING RUBBER HEELS.

NATURES CUSHION AGAINST THE SHOCKS AND JARS OF LIFE.

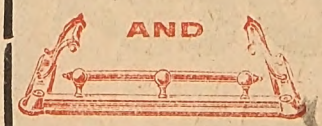
WHAT THE PNEUMATIC TYRE DOES FOR THE CYCLIST THE WOOD-MILNE HEEL PAD DOES FOR THE PEDESTRAIN

GET YOUR BOOTS FITTED WITH THEM & SEE NAME "WOOD-MILNE" STAMPED ON EVERY PAD.

Manufacturers: THE REVOLVING HEEL CO., PRESTON

SCRIVEN

FENDERS AND BEDSTEADS



of Every Description Direct from Works.

Also CURBS, FIRE IRONS, BRASSES, FIRE GUARDS, &c.

Send particulars of your requirements.

Sketches and Prices can be sent on at once.

SPARKHILL FENDER AND BEDSTEAD CO.,

B88 DURHAM ROAD, BIRMINGHAM.

WRITING COMPETITION

FOR CHILDREN UNDER 16

£6000 IN CASH AND 10,000 PRIZES

1. One Prize of £2000 | A. One Prize of £250
1 . . . £1000 | 5. 10 Prizes of £50 £500
1 . . . £ 400 | 6. 100 - £20 £2000
1 . . . £ 100
In all £6000

INSURED IN ONE OF THE BEST BRITISH ASSURANCE COMPANIES PAYABLE ON ARRIVING AT THE AGE OF 21

ASK FOR POULAIN'S CHOCOLATE AND COCOA

FOR FULL PARTICULARS OF APPLICATION FORMS &c. SEE WINDOWS

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 801. Week Ending May 7, 1904. Price One Penny.

The document was under the very paws of the vicious brute! Dare she get it?

(An Exciting Incident from "The Scheming of Basil Thornton." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

. . . You'll want a . . .

KODAK

. . . for your Holidays. . . .

Kodak N.C. (Non-Curling and Orthochromatic) Film

To put in it.

Kodak New Developing Machine

To develop your Exposures on the spot.

Kodak Self-Toning Paper

To Print your results on.

WITH THIS COMBINATION THERE IS NO CHANCE OF FAILURE.

Ask for the Kodak Catalogue Of any leading Dealer, or of

KODAK Ltd. 41-43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C., & Branches

J. G. GRAVES

THE LARGEST WATCH-SALES FIRM IN THE WORLD.

Send for Handsome Watch Catalogue showing hundreds of designs, post free.

The 'EXPRESS' (Reg.) ENGLISH LEVER, 50/-

is sent on receipt of a deposit of 5/- and your promise to complete the purchase in nine more monthly instalments of 5/-. Discount Advantages offered to Cash Purchasers.

Specification.—Keyless or Key-winding, first-grade English Lever, Capped and Jewelled, Safety Winding Pinion, Chronometer Balance, Massive Sterling Silver Cases, made entirely in England, Warranted Seven Years.

Agents Wanted in spare time. Write for Particulars. Good Pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 169 Division Street, Sheffield

SONGS COPIED

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page.

Mrs. CONYERS, Chagford, R.S.O., Devon.

Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY!

This Phenomenal Offer is made to the readers of "Short Stories," 7/5/1904. On receipt of Postal Order for 5/-, we will forward, Direct from our Looms to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in 30 different patterns and art colourings, to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for our goods below the actual cost of production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, thus saving the purchasers all middle profits.

OVER 200,000 SOLD DURING THE PAST 12 MONTHS.

GIVEN AWAY! GIVEN AWAY!

With every Carpet we shall Absolutely Give Away a very handsome Rug to match, or we will send 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs for 9/6.

Money Willingly Returned if Not Approved.

Thousands of Repeat Orders and Unsolicited Testimonials Received.

Illustrated Bargain Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Table Linen Curtains, &c., post free.

F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.) Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants.

WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Sale Price: 3/6 Postage 4d. extra.

Free Gifts. Sizes: 38, 40, 42.

F. HODGSON & SONS, City of Leeds, will Present Free to every reader of Short Stories, 7/5/1904, carriage paid, on receipt of postal order for 3/6, with stamps 4d. extra, for postage, for one of our Ladies' Beautiful Tailor Made Cloth Serge Dress Costume Skirts, in Black or Navy, richly trimmed with mercerised silkette strappings, and fitted with good linenette pocket. We shall include FREE with each Skirt a Massive 18-ct. Gold Pattern Curb Bracelet, with Heart Pendant, mounted with Pearls and Turquoise, and scented with Forget-me-Nots. Cased with Pure Gold.

Money willingly returned if not approved. Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Curtains, &c., post free.

Address: F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.), Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

ONE DOSE of Kaputine cures in Ten minutes the most violent Headache or Neuralgic Pain no matter what the cause of the attack.

KAPUTINE is not an aperient, but is for one purpose only—to cure Headache and Neuralgia.

KAPUTINE

Cures in Ten Minutes.

Kaputine goes right to the seat of the trouble—the Nerves—it puts the Nerves right, that is why it cures almost instantly

Headache or Neuralgia.

Refuse dangerous white Headache Powders, such as have been condemned by the press. Demand Kaputine, the remedy that is backed up by medical testimony—the Safe Remedy.

Packets of 18 doses 1s.; Samples 1d. each. Of all Medicine Dealers.

Samples Free from Proprietors: C. G. Kaputine, Huddersfield.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

BODLEIAN 4 MAY 1904

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 801.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending May 7th, 1904.

The Wife of Dudley Holland.

Telling the Terrible Story of Her Married Life.

DUDLEY HOLLAND was my chum at Oxford. Neither of us had a brother of our own, and I think two brothers were never dearer to each other than we were.

Two years after we graduated I was in town, partly for pleasure, partly on business, when I received a letter from Dudley, telling me that he had fallen in love.

His letter was full of adjectives and exclamation points. There never before was a woman so enchanting as this Edith Champney. She was transcendently beautiful, but that was her least charm. But there was one drawback. She was cold. Ice was not so hopeless, for ice melts under a warm sun, and it seemed that all the sunshine of adulation and adoration that surrounded Miss Champney could not melt her. He could not tell whether he had been able to produce the slightest impression on her. She listened to him very sweetly, but she listened just as patiently the ensuing five minutes to his next neighbour. There was a strange mystery in her bearing, and he meant to fathom it.

It was three weeks before I heard from him again. This is what he wrote:

I have solved the mystery, Ralph, and I love her more than ever. She is so cold to all because she fears to love anyone, or let anyone love her. Her mother was insane for many years before her death; died, in fact, in a lunatic asylum. Edith fears that she may inherit this malady; and is conscientiously resolved for that reason against marriage. I believe now that she could love me; nay, that she is already beginning to. She must! She shall! I will reason her out of her scruples. I believe I should marry her if I knew she would be mad in a year.

She must be my wife. I long for you to see her, Ralph. I know you will understand my heart's desire.

There was a page or two more of rhapsody about her charms, but I scarcely read it, so excited was I over the portion which I have quoted.

"Thinks he would marry her if he knew she would be insane in a year!" I muttered. "Why, he is as mad as a March hare himself! I must go to him."

I did not answer his letter. I thought any opposition of that kind would only strengthen his purpose; and I trusted to be with him in time to prevent any serious entanglement. I made all possible haste in settling up my affairs, and in two weeks I was in Bath. I went straight to his lodgings and found him putting the last touches to his toilet, for, like most men, young, rich, and idle, he dressed with almost as much care and taste as a woman.

It was just dusk when I opened his door. He came towards me with extended hands.

"Just in time, Ralph!" he cried joyously. "You shall go with me to see her to-night. I have over-ruled all her scruples. She loves me! We are engaged, and next month we shall be married. The day is fixed."

My heart failed me. I was too late, after all. I listened to him in sad silence. At length he noticed my manner.

"You don't like it, Ralph? I am sorry; but you will change your mind when you have seen her. She is the noblest, truest, tenderest woman—and she loves me so! She never allowed herself to think of marriage before; and I hold her first love, the full, passionate overflowing of her rich nature—the fountain sealed so long. Come, I am impatient till you see her!"

I went out with him, and he hurried me along the streets. We were always so—I, cool, patient, slow; he, quick, impulsive, passionate, hurrying me onward. Soon we stopped before a noble mansion. Dudley spoke to the servant who admitted us with the familiar air of a frequent visitor. He conducted me upstairs himself, and threw open the drawing-room door.

At one end of the room, between two long windows, stood a harp, and, beside it, Miss Champney. A chandelier near her was fully lighted, and, standing for an instant in comparative darkness at the door by which we entered, while my friend went forward to speak to her, I had space and opportunity to see what manner of woman she was.

Dudley had not overstated her attractions. Of lofty, commanding figure, her proportions were perfect. Her carriage was stately, as would have befitted the descendant of a line of princes. Her face was more nobly beautiful than any countenance I have ever seen. There was no trace of colour in it save in the lips, and they were bright as a scarlet geranium flower. But no colour could have rivalled the clear, grand whiteness of her complexion—marble, with the warm, palpitating softness of life. Her eyes were large, black, and languid, with a peculiar expression of passionate melancholy.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

She started forward when she saw my friend. Her eyes kindled. A sudden flush stained the clear whiteness of her cheek. She murmured a word or two of which I only caught the fond, caressing intonation of her voice. I forgave him for loving her; for the mad risk he was running. She was a woman worth living or dying for. Had I seen her before she was his, I believe, with my slow, persistent, intense nature, I should have loved her better and longer than he could.

Instantly, almost, he led her forward to speak to me. She welcomed me with graceful cordiality as his friend. We passed a pleasant evening—one which I can never forget. Before it was over she sang to us. Her snowy fingers flashed like a flock of white birds across the strings of the harp. Her voice was full and rich, and very sweet, but sad with a passionate, inexpressible longing, like the cry of a struggling soul. It thrilled me to pain.

"What do you think of her?" Dudley asked me, walking home beside me in the moonlight.

"I understand all you wrote me now," I said, meeting his eyes. "I tell you honestly that I hurried here in the hope of preventing this; but now that I have seen her, I cannot wonder that you had no power or will to struggle against your love. God grant that it may bring you only happiness! It seems as if she were a creature too noble for a destiny of suffering."

* * * * *

The next month, as had been planned, they were married.

When they had returned home, she went upstairs to change her bridal dress.

Half an hour afterwards, Dudley Holland went to seek his bride.

"She must be ready now," he said to me, as he went out; "perhaps she is waiting for me."

I don't think it was two minutes before I heard a shriek—a wild, maniacal shriek—which seemed to freeze the blood in my veins with icy terror. I stepped into the hall, and saw a white figure flying down the stairs—Edith, in her bridal robes still, except that her veil had been torn off, and her long, black hair, with an orange blossom still clinging to it here and there, was floating in heavy, dishevelled masses about her shoulders. Down she came, holding in her hand a dagger, its point stained with blood. Swifter than lightning she flashed by me into the empty drawing-room.

Sweeping her hand across the strings of her harp, till all its chords clashed together in one wild shriek of discord, she stood there, waving the dagger above her head, like some beautiful fiend, torn with madness.

Slowly, as one stricken in an unguarded hour with some terrible blow, her bridegroom came after her. From a wound in his shoulder the blood was oozing out. His eyes were set in a stony gaze of horror.

"Has she hurt you?" I cried, confronting him.

"Not much, I think. But, Ralph, it has come—all you feared. She is mad!"

His voice sank, as he spoke, into a husky, sepulchral whisper. He went into the drawing-room, I following him. He would have gone towards her—I believe he loved her so in that hour, he would rather have met his death at her hand, than live to have this awful chasm—this unbridged gulf of madness—between his heart and hers. She looked at him now with that curious gaze of cunning and defiance which everyone has seen who knows much of the insane.

"Keep away," she cried warningly, flashing the dagger before her—"you had better. I sha'n't kill you, for you don't fear that; but if you come one step nearer, I will let this pretty, shining toy lap the blood out of my heart."

There was a terrible earnestness in her eyes and we both stood still before her.

At this moment her father appeared on the scene. He comprehended all in an instant. His face turned white to his lips with an awful pallor. The cold sweat-drops of a deathly agony stood upon his forehead.

"Oh, Heaven!" he cried, "has it come so soon? I saw her mother look like that. Dudley, I warned you. You rushed upon your fate!"

"I believe I should have married her had I known this, even. At least she is my wife. I know that she has loved me!"

With that white pallor on his face, that look of anguish in his eyes, Richard Champney turned towards his child.

"Give me that dagger, Edith," he said in a tone of stern command, walking up to her suddenly. With a child-like instinct of obedience she put it into his hand. Then, as if repenting what she had done, she sprang wildly forward to seize it again.

He threw it quickly behind him, and caught her firmly in his arms as she came on. I took up the weapon and broke it, and threw the pieces out of the window. Still holding her, her father contrived to extract a key from his pocket, and threw it towards me.

"In my room—one over this—you will find, in the third drawer, a strait waistcoat. It was the one her mother wore. Bring it."

In five minutes more, with my help, he had put it on her, and it was out of her power to do any more mischief to herself or others.

Then I sent a servant for the family physician, and went myself for a surgeon. While the physician was alone with Richard Champney and his hapless child, the surgeon dressed the bridegroom's wound. It was a flesh-wound and not dangerous. But what a wedding-day! What a consummation to the blissful dreams of so many hopeful weeks!

Soon the doctor came out. Dudley looked at him in mute, helpless anguish, his lips refusing to frame the question he longed to ask. I asked it for him.

"Do you think there is any hope?"

"I do not like to pronounce so soon," he answered, with a kind reluctance to speak the bitter truth.

"It would be better," I said earnestly, "to tell him the very worst now, than to torture him with suspense, if there is no hope of her recovery."

He considered for a moment before he spoke again. "I believe you are right, and I will tell you exactly what I think. Where insanity comes on, as hers has, without any illness, or any apparent cause, so suddenly and so violently, especially where there was a suspicion that it might be hereditary, I have never known it to be cured."

* * * * *

I will not dwell on the next scenes of this terrible tragedy. Both Edith's father and her husband longed, if they could, to keep her at home, where they could care for and watch over her. For a while they thought this would be possible. After the doctor's visit her strait jacket was removed. She seemed calmer, and made no more attempts to injure anyone. They thought her madness was going to take a harmless turn—gentle and pitiful as poor Ophelia's.

She did not recognise either her husband or her father; but she seemed to like them both, and called them by a dozen fantastic titles.

It went on thus for a time, until the furious, malignant stage of her malady came on again. She would fly at whoever was in charge of her, and try to tear them with teeth and nails. She would beat her own beautiful head against the walls of her rooms, or gnash her teeth against her lips till the blood burst from them. At length it was determined to take her to an asylum. She could be restrained there, they thought, by those who understood such cases, more gently, more mercifully.

It was a summer's afternoon when they drove out with her in a closed carriage. It was in one of her intervals of comparative mildness, and the thought that she was going to see the friend who was in need of her made her content to drive readily enough. In the superintending physician she seemed to think she had found the one for whom she sought; and she parted with her father and husband without a regret.

"If life did not stretch out before me," Dudley Holland cried wretchedly, "so bitterly long—if only I could die! But to live on, for God only knows how many weary years—and to think of her suffering there, her helpless soul beating its struggling wings against the bars, crying out, in vain anguish, for a deliverance that never comes—to know that she is my own wife who loves me; and yet I can never hear her say so, or kiss her lips, or hold her close to the heart that worships her. Oh, Heaven, perhaps it would be a mercy if I could go mad too!"

Digitized by Google

What a fate it was to overtake a man just on the threshold of life, only twenty-five—a man with so many goodly gifts, wealth, talent, manly form, and handsome face.

* * * * *

Ten years passed in utter hopelessness. Richard Champney had grown weary of his life's sad burden, and laid it down. The heart so long and sorely tried had throbbed with the last pang of mortal anguish, and with the dead smile frozen upon his mouth, and a look of peace upon his face, they buried him by his dead wife's side.

But no such merciful release had come to the beautiful creature who was wearing away her life among the motley crowd of raving, jeering maniacs; or to the husband who waited without the bars in lonely, pining sorrow.

"Come one step nearer," she cried, "and I will plunge this dagger in my heart!"

On the tenth anniversary of that ill-omened wedding-day he came and intreated me to drive with him to Sagham. I put aside all other affairs for the time and went with him.

"How is she to-day?" he asked the superintendent anxiously.

"You will see her in her room. She is as mad as ever, but quieter. She is not so strong, I think. The warm weather, which has come so suddenly, overcomes her. She is always gentlest when she does not feel very well."

"Do you think she can possibly ever get well?"

It was I who asked this question. Dudley had asked it too many times, and received the same sad, hopeless "No!" It came again now.

"Well, no, I see no hope of it. Better at times she may be; and perhaps—I have seen such things in such cases sometimes—before her death there may be a lucid interval. But it will never be, I feel certain, until she is very near her end. Sometimes the torch of reason burns up again with the old brightness when life is expiring. It may be so in her case. It is but the shadow of a hope; but it is all I can give you."

We went together to her room. Dudley had brought her his customary offering—a basket of flowers, exquisitely arranged. She sat in a low chair, swaying herself to and fro. She was dressed in white, as when I had seen her first, for that was one of her old fancies which she retained. It seemed to me that she had grown no older during the ten years since she had been there. She was thinner and paler, but her aspect was still that of the beautiful girl, standing just on the threshold of womanhood. Her husband went across the room, and, kneeling beside her, set the basket of flowers in her lap.

"See what I have brought you, darling," he said, as tenderly as one would speak to a petted child.

She looked up then, and her great black eyes rested on his face without the faintest glimmer of recognition. She smiled, with the old, rare sweetness of expression, however, and passed her fingers caressingly over the flowers in her lap.

"They are very lovely," she said. "You were very kind to bring them. I had a lover once, and he used to bring me flowers every day."

"Did he look like me?" Dudley asked, in tones husky with emotion, and I could see the sudden hope that looked eagerly out of his eyes.

She smiled again—this time a sort of quizzical, mischievous smile. Then she shook her head.

"Like you? Oh, no! He was a son of the morning, all joy, and radiance, and delight. He always brought the sunshine in with him. But you—you look like the knight of the sorrowful countenance. Do you come here because it is such a merry house? They laugh here, night and day. Sometimes I hear them at midnight. The laughs sound ghostly then, as they gurgle along the corridors. Oh, it's a merry house! Should you like to live here?"

Dudley turned away—he could not bear it. She began to sing then, to a sort of tuneful rhapsody, with all the old passionate sweetness in her voice, a melody of wild, unconnected words.

We stayed with her till towards nightfall. Then we bade her good-bye. She took a rose from among her flowers, and gave it to Dudley.

"That is for you, sorrowful knight," she said. "Keep it to remember this merry house. And this for you," and she gave me a sprig of heliotrope.

We drove home in the late afternoon. For a long time Dudley did not speak. I was driving, and he held the rose she had given him, tenderly between his fingers. At length he said, looking round at me, with quivering lips and eyes dark with unspoken pain:

Digitized by Google

"I cannot bear it, Ralph. It kills me to see her, and to feel that I am as utterly shut out from her heart, her life, her knowledge, as if she were dead. I loved her too well."

* * * * *

My house was the only one at which Dudley ever visited. It was not very lively, for I lived alone with my mother and one middle-aged serving woman. But it was always cheerful, and he was sure of a kindly welcome. I think he regarded my mother, sweet saintly soul that she was, with something of the same tenderness which I felt for her myself, and it was most warmly returned. His sufferings and the life of loneliness to which he was doomed moved her profoundest sympathies. She always talked to him as to a son, and I think he showed her the depth of his heart, as he could not have shown it even to me.

I went home one night—it was late in the autumn succeeding our birthday visit to Edith, and my mother met me with the air of one who has something to communicate.

"Not now," she said, with a smile, meeting my look of interrogation. "I see you have guessed that I have something to tell you; but we will wait till after tea, and then we shall have a whole evening to talk it over."

"What is the 'it' we are to talk over, mother?" I asked, when I had drawn on my slippers, and established myself in my own especial chair for the evening.

"I received a letter to-day from your Cousin Fanny. Her Aunt Windsor is dead, and she is without a home."

"Luckily she has plenty of money to procure one with," I said, not very sympathisingly, I am afraid.

"Yes, but I think, though she does not say so, that she would like to come here. She speaks sadly of the unpleasantness of going to live among strangers. I confess that I should like to have her with us."

I thought the matter over for a moment before I answered. Fanny Carpenter was the only child of my mother's sister. Her father, on his death-bed, much to my mother's regret, had confided Fanny to the care of his own sister, Mrs. Windsor, the lady of whose death we had just been informed. I knew well enough what my mother's wishes were. She longed for Fanny to come and be to her in place of the daughter she had always coveted. I knew they would be company for each other during the long days when I was away; and I was not churlish enough to have no consideration for Fanny's preference for living with her own kith and kin rather than seeking a new home among strangers. Everything was in favour of her coming, except the one selfish feeling I had that I dreaded change of any sort in our quiet, comfortable life, and that I hated the trouble of making myself agreeable to a young lady. At length I said, with a sigh of melancholy:

"I know you are right, mother. She ought to come. I should not feel happy or satisfied without asking her; still, I must say, it's a bore. She'll want me to take her here and there. There'll be an end to all such quiet, lazy nights as this."

She smiled archly.

"That will be good for you. That is one reason I want her to come. You would grow presently, if you went on in this way, with me to indulge you, into a real, selfish, one-sided old bachelor. It will be the very best thing in the world for you—good discipline."

"My Discipline!" I persisted in talking of my Cousin Fanny by that title. I had not seen her for five years. She had visited us at fifteen. She was a nice girl then—a merry, romping, teasing hoyden, who made me infinite trouble and afforded me plenty of fun. But the five years since she had passed in London, where she had been educated at a fashionable school; and I looked forward in dismay to the advent of a really fine lady.

The next day my mother wrote, inviting her to make her future home with us. By return of post the invitation was accepted, and the next fortnight was devoted to making preparations for her.

I went home one night and found that she had arrived. She was in the drawing-room, so Judith said, hurrying into the hall to tell me as I went upstairs. I would not encounter "My Discipline" till I had brushed off the dust of business. I went to my own room and refreshed my toilet a little.

Then I went down and saw, standing by the window, a small, slight, very youthful-looking girl, clad in deep mourning. She was not handsome, but there was something very winning in her face. It was a good face—sweet and pure, with pale, delicate colouring, small features, blue, innocent-looking eyes, and an expression which seemed to appeal for tenderness and protection. Full, light curls lying loose and shining about face and head, added to the extreme youthfulness of her appearance. She came forward to meet me, and put her hand in mine with a shy grace, and said, in a voice as cheery as the chirp of a little woodland bird:

"Here I am, Ralph; come here in search of home and friends. Please say I am welcome."

I could say it honestly, and I did. From that moment I took her into my heart.

She had been with us three months, when one night my mother said to me:

"Ralph, I could find it in my heart to be sorry Fanny came. I am afraid Dudley Holland is falling in love with her."

We were sitting alone over the fire in the library, I and my mother. Dudley had been spending the evening with us, and had gone away, and Fanny had gone to her own room. My mother's words startled me for a moment into vague alarm. Soon I collected myself.

"Impossible, mother!" I said resolutely. "Dudley loved Edith as I never knew man to love woman. He could not love another; above all, one so different as Fanny."

"In that very difference is the danger. He does not dream of loving Fanny. He would think himself it was impossible to love one so different from his first ideal; so he is drifting into it helplessly, without even making a struggle."

"Impossible!" I said again, resolutely.

"I hope you may be right, Ralph, but I feel sure that I am. Edith has been worse than dead to him for more than ten years. I know that he would reject with horror the thought of ever giving her place to another in his heart, but I am very sure that he is doing it, unconsciously, nevertheless."

"And Fanny?" I asked the question with an anxiety that was little short of pain.

"About that I cannot tell so well. She pities him from the depth of her womanly heart, and they say pity is akin to love; but I do not think the thought of loving him has ever entered her mind. She would shudder at it, if it should. She could never forget that he is still Edith's husband."

After that I watched Dudley Holland and my cousin closely when they were together. I could see that he was happier in her presence. The gloom which had been settling over him for years seemed to lift, as the mists roll away from the hill-top and valley when the sunlight pierces them. He seemed to like to talk with her; to exchange ideas about art and literature; sometimes about the graver problems of life and death and duty. Still I saw nothing to warrant my mother in her conclusions.

Digitized by Google

I could fancy that if Dudley had been free, really free, Fanny was just the woman to heal all the wounds in his heart, and make the desert of his life blossom again with all the sweet roses of peace and love.

Just as I was leaving my office one night for home, a boy came in and inquired for me. I turned round, with my hat already on, and asked him his errand.

"Dr. Strong sent me, sir. I was to give this note into your own hands."

I took the piece of paper and read these words:

"DEAR SIR,—Your friend Mr. Holland is very ill—it promises to be a severe case of small-pox. He feared that you would become alarmed at not having seen him for some time, and come to seek him. He begged me to bid you keep away from him, for he said he would rather die, even without seeing you, than that you should run the risk of your own life, and that of two others almost as dear to him as to you. He will be well nursed.—

"CHARLES STRONG."

Dudley knelt beside her and put the flowers in her lap.

I went home with the note in my hand. Carrying it into the drawing-room, I read it to mother and Fanny. Then for the first time, I knew the secret of my cousin's heart. She did not faint. Weak-looking, delicate little creature as she was, there was a fibre of strength in her nature such as I had never dreamt of. I shall never see her face whiter when the coffin walls shut it in than it was at that moment. I can never describe that awful, ghastly pallor. Thrice she tried to speak before the words found utterance.

"Aunt Margaret, I want to go and take care of him; may I?"

"Child, do you think I could let you risk your life?"

"Life is not much, Auntie—my life. I have no one on earth to whom I am all the world—no such close, near tie, as would make it sinful for me to run great risks. Besides, I have been exposed before, since I was vaccinated, and I have really no fears. He is my friend; I cannot trust him to the care of a hired nurse. If he died, I should be haunted for ever by his voice crying for mercy, for comfort which there was none to give him. Permit me to go. Send me with your blessing if you can; but, with your consent or without it, go I must."

My mother put her kind arms round her and kissed her.

"Go to your room, darling," she said gently. "In a few moments I will tell you what you may do."

The poor child obeyed her. I think she was glad to be alone for a few moments. My mother looked at me, when she was gone, in blank consternation.

"I feared it," she said, "and now you can see it, too. Love will not go lightly with her. What can we do? I feel that we ought not to leave him alone. He has been too much like a son and brother in our household. If it were not for Fanny, I should go. If I could only persuade her to stay here and let me go in her stead!"

"I am the one to go," I said. "Dudley would do as much for me. He is my friend, and I will not fail him in his hour of need. But what if Fanny is resolute? I fear she will be. I never saw that look of steel in her eyes before."

"Then I should go, too. I could never trust her there alone; poor little stricken thing!"

It was Fanny, after all, who made all the arrangements. Her will, underneath her childish mask, was iron. She would take care of him—none but she. My mother was to remove, since she insisted on it, to the house, and superintend the domestics, who, in their panic, would need some recognised authority, but, unless the need were imminent, she was not to enter the sick-room. The same rule Fanny insisted, should apply to me. I was to spend my nights in the house, and to come there often during the day, but I was not to see Dudley unless he were given up to die, or her own strength failed her.

"It is my right," she said, with a look of solemn, heroic sweetness. "It is all that is left for me to do for him in this world, and I love him—I did not know it myself before—I love him so that to die for him, since I may not live for him, would be happiness."

She nursed him through that horrible illness, taking regular turns in her vigils with the nurse, a kind, willing, capable woman, whom Dr. Strong had provided. The doctor said that to the untiring care which watched over him he owed his life. Without it, he would have certainly succumbed.

As soon as it was safe to leave him—when his strength began to come back—Fanny came to my mother and me, as we sat together, with a look of immovable resolution in her face—a look which I had learnt to understand. She spoke in quiet, firm tones.

"He is better now, and I am going away. I cannot stay here now. I owe it to him, to myself, to you both, who have been so kind to me, to go away. Knowing what my heart holds for that man, I must never meet him again, now that he is able to do without me. He might, in time, say or feel something that would rest like a guilty burden on his soul for ever. I am not romantic. I have thought it all over, and this is my simple duty. I shall go back to Madame Chegary's, where I was at school. It was my home for three years, and Madame will gladly receive me again into her family."

We did not oppose her. Sad as the parting was for us, we knew that she was right. Oh, what measureless cause of thankfulness it was afterwards that she had been so noble through it all! The next day she went.

The first evening that Dudley was able to pass with us downstairs, he said:

"Dr. Strong says Miss Carpenter saved my life. Am I never to thank her? I was too ill to know what she was doing for me then."

My mother answered him. She never approved of mysteries which it was possible to avoid.

Digitized by Google

"Fanny went away rather suddenly," she said. "She had indeed devoted herself to you, and she was in need of change. She is gone to Madame Chegary's. It was her old home, and she is going to spend a little while there again."

The next day two letters came to Dudley.

One was from the superintending physician of the asylum where his wife was.

He wrote as follows:

"Dear Sir,—Having been made aware of the serious nature of your illness by your friends, I have refrained from writing to you, as I should otherwise have done, upon a subject of the deepest importance. The crisis to which I looked forward in Mrs. Holland's malady has arrived. Her bodily health is failing with fearful rapidity, but her mind is regaining its old clearness. She remembers the ties that bind her to you, and longs to see you. In order satisfactorily to account for your absence, it was necessary to inform her of your illness. She is impatient to go to you, and I should advise this step, as soon as you think it can be taken without fear of contagion for her, or risk to your own health. I inclose a letter from her."

Her letter I read afterwards, but I may not copy it here. It is too sacred. She could remember nothing since the moment she was pronounced his wife at the altar. Could it be, she asked him, that ten long, deadly, silent years had parted them since—years in which he must have felt her existence a burden instead of a blessing? And now they told her he was ill. Might she come to him? Had he any love left for her, after so much pain?

Oh, how full the letter was of passionate beseeching, of longing, overflowing love! It moved Dudley Holland's heart to the depths. Tears of thanksgiving rolled down his cheeks. He murmured an inaudible prayer. Then he cried, eagerly:

"Can you go for her, Ralph? Is it not safe? I must have her home—my Edith, my wife! Every hour she is not with me is so much wasted of what God sends to repay me for all these hopeless years. Perhaps she will live. If I can but save her alive—if I can but realise, after all this desolate blank, the old, fond dreams!"

My mother's eyes met mine. How thankful we both felt that Fanny was gone—poor Fanny! As usual, it was mother's clear judgment and kindly heart which came to our aid.

"Ralph shall go for her, to-morrow," she said, putting her soothing hand over his restless fingers. "This afternoon you shall be moved to our house. That will save her from any risk of infection. Besides, I must go home, and I want her where I can help you to nurse her; where I can have a little care of you both."

The plan relieved Dudley wonderfully. He said a little about the trouble it would be, and how wrong he was sure it was for him to consent; but his faint objections were overruled, and the plan was carried into execution.

The next morning I went for Edith. Singularly enough she recognised me and called me by name. Indeed, her recollection of everything up to the hour of her marriage was vivid and perfect. Beyond that she could not go.

She was evidently very feeble. She was in a state of extreme emaciation, and she could not walk without assistance, but her eyes were clear and her face serene. We took her in an easy-carriage, made almost like a bed with pillows and quilts. The superintending physician accompanied us, and helped me when we reached home to carry her upstairs. We laid her gently down in the room which was to be her own, and then sent Dudley in. I think neither of them could have borne any witness to their meeting, after all those bitter years of a living death.

When they had been together an hour he came out, his face radiant.

"She has dropped asleep now, doctor," he said to the waiting physician. "She was very tired. Will you go and look at her? She is better than I feared. It must be that there is hope. Love and happiness will restore her. She will be all to me that I ever dreamt."

I understood the look on the doctor's face. In his opinion there was no hope. For a few days, however, I was inclined to think with Dudley that she would yet recover. Under the spell of her happiness she seemed to revive so wonderfully. What is this man, I could not help asking myself as I watched them, that two women should love him with devotion so unutterable?

Her mind continued perfectly clear. She remembered all the days and hours of their love as vividly as did Dudley himself. She was profoundly happy.

At length she died. It was a summer sunset when she passed away—the eleventh anniversary of their marriage. They had been alone for several hours—hours full of sweet and tender communion, of such pledges as those make whose next meeting will be among the angels. At the very last it came suddenly. Raising herself in bed, she dropped her wasted arms round his neck and pressed her lips to his in a long, fervent kiss. "God bless you, my own!" she breathed, in a low, fond whisper; and then a faint, icy breath crossed his cheek—her last!

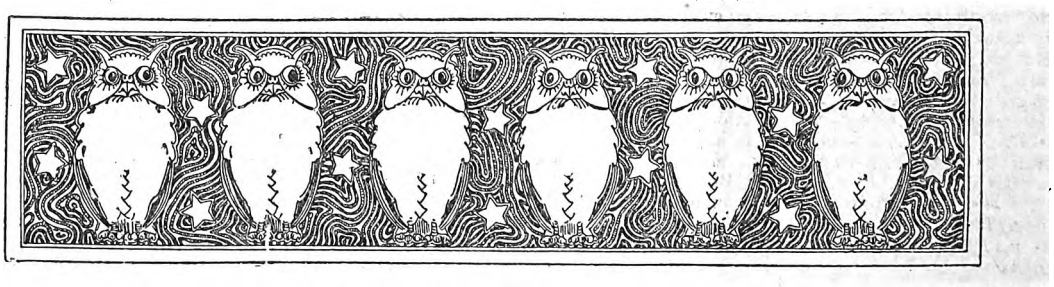
Dudley Holland mourned for her with a sorrow as deep as his love had been long and fervent. Yet, I know, he could think of her with a more resigned heart, at rest in the quiet land whither all our steps are tending, than he could in the years of her madness and misery.

She had been dead a year before he ever mentioned Fanny to me. Then, one day, he asked me, in direct words, if I thought she loved him. He had told Edith, he said, the whole story of their acquanitance, especially of the devotion with which she had nursed him through his terrible illness. Edith had read in it all the girl's heart; had begged him to marry her; had told him that she should be happier to know it, even in Heaven; to feel that his marriage with her had not blighted his whole life, condemned him to perpetual solitude. Did I think she was right?

I told him he must ask Fanny. It was all I could say. I had no right to betray her secret. The next day he went to town. When he came back he brought Fanny with him.

They are very happy. I do not think Dudley Holland does love, or can ever love, Fanny with the passion so fervent as that wild love of his youth, when he was willing to encounter all risks, however desperate, to cast the whole purpose and promise of his life at Edith Champney's feet. But she is very dear to him. She is his beloved as well as his honoured wife, and she is satisfied. I believe that to be allowed to care for his comfort, to minister to his happiness, is to her the crown and glory of life. May their days be long and their joys many!

Robert Harley.



Digitized by Google

The Scheming of Basil Thornton.

Relating How a Will was Stolen and Recovered.

(Containing the incident depicted on the cover.)

Old Richard Mayne, the crusty bachelor who owned half Woodcote, lived frugally there in the country. A distant connection of his, Muriel James, a pretty girl of twenty, kept house for him.

She found it hard at times to put up with his temper and his overbearing manners.

Old Mayne had long decided that his wealth should go to one of his two nephews, Basil Thornton and Jack Summers.

About his money he had talked to them quite plainly. He would leave it, he told them, to the one who worked best, who showed that he would reach success, and be fit to have control of his wealth.

Basil Thornton was a shifty, underhanded man, in some business in the City. Very few people liked him. Jack Summers had passed his examinations for the Bar, and was now diligently sitting in chambers, still studying, moving Heaven and earth in his attempt to get briefs.

Jack was a handsome, popular fellow, and he was certain he would get on all right if he once got a start. He did not like his cousin Thornton, but Thornton simply hated him, because he was an obstacle.

Thornton, at the time when this story begins, seemed to be making a good deal of money. In an offhand way he would mention the amount of his income to friends, an amount at which they would be surprised, and congratulate him wonderingly.

While poor Summers was living as closely as he could possibly manage, going straight home to his lodgings every evening from his dingy chambers, Thornton's circumstances appeared to be such that he could afford to spend money royally.

Some of his friends whispered among themselves that he could not go on long in this way.

Muriel did not like Basil Thornton. He was cad enough to speak contemptuously of women even in a woman's presence, and, while he was not exactly rude to her during his visits to Woodcote, she thought his manner hateful.

By-the-way, Muriel thought that Jack Summers was one of the nicest fellows she had ever known.

But Basil Thornton flattered himself that he got on well with every woman whom he met. One day, after a very extravagant week (the contemplation of the expenses of which had given him a rueful face), he had a brilliant idea.

His debts were accumulating fast.

Now, Richard Mayne, his uncle, had always given it to be understood that his money would go either to Jack Summers or to himself.

But old men like Richard Mayne, who were in a position to please themselves without considering anybody, often changed their minds. What about that little girl who kept house for him—only a distant relation, it was true, but still old Mayne might change his mind in her favour.

Basil Thornton crossed the room, and looked at himself in the glass for a long time. When Basil thought of himself, which was fairly often, he always imagined that he had a striking face.

It may have been striking. It was certainly not a handsome face.

Muriel James was rather a decent little girl, too, reflected Basil. Of course, she was by no means up to his style, but, then, think of the risk that he removed by marrying her. It would be a perfectly brilliant stroke. She would jump at him, said Basil to himself. Why, perhaps old Mayne would set them up at once. His bills were becoming a nuisance.

Having settled all this in his mind, Basil Thornton spent more money than ever on the strength of these rose-coloured thoughts. Then one summer's morning he went down to Woodcote.

Richard Mayne, his uncle, had gone out in the dogcart to the village on some business in connection with his property, which was widely scattered.

He found Muriel alone.

"Good-morning, Miss James," he said. She returned his greeting coldly.

"Will my uncle be long, do you think?"

"I don't expect so. I'll tell him you are here directly he comes in." Her hand was on the door, but Basil said, "Don't go, Miss James. I'm not such an ogre as all that, am I? Besides, I want a talk with you."

Wondering, she came back into the room. She was prettier than he had thought, said Basil to himself. The next moment he had started the business of his errand with more earnestness than he had intended. In other words, he had tried to kiss her. But he started back, a stinging blow across his face.

"How dare you touch me, Mr. Thornton!" she cried.

"I want you to marry me," said Basil feebly, recovering his self-satisfaction a little.

Muriel's laugh sent the angry blood to his face again, and he flew into a violent temper. "I would never think of marrying a man like you."

"I know what it is." Basil Thornton almost screamed the words. "That conceited cousin of mine has been down here."

"I won't hear a word against Mr. Summers," said Muriel with quiet dignity.

"You will!" said Basil Thornton. Chancing to turn his head slightly, he had caught sight of old Richard Mayne, standing grim and sardonic in the doorway, watching the development of the high words that had drawn him up the stairs.

It was a fine chance to run his hated cousin down, to injure him with his uncle. Richard Mayne did not know that Basil had noticed him.

"If you knew the way he has been going on in London," said Basil. "He does no work from the beginning of the week to the end."

"It's not true," said Muriel, bravely defending him.

"It is true, though. He never will get any briefs. He just lazes through day after day. I tell you he's just hanging on the chance of—well, you know what chance."

"I don't believe it!" said Muriel. "Jack—Mr. Summers, works very hard."

"Good-morning, Basil," said old Mayne's grim voice from the doorway.

Muriel started, but Basil turned easily. "Good morning,

Digitized by Google

sir," said he, as if he had just seen his uncle there for the first time.

Basil Thornton went away that evening from Woodcote on good terms with himself. By means of a lot of figures he had made his uncle think that his business was prospering greatly, and that he, Basil, had been working so hard and attentively at it that success in his business was certain. And he had persuaded old Mayne that Jack Summers was an idle fellow, good for nothing.

In fact, Richard Mayne had almost definitely decided to leave his money to Basil Thornton.

The next day, indeed, old Mayne drew up his will, which, with the exception of providing for Muriel, left everything to Basil Thornton.

Muriel was very unhappy, and tried repeatedly to change the determination of Richard Mayne.

"It's not true about Mr. Summers," she told him.

But Richard Mayne shook his old head.

"I don't know, my dear. But his cousin has worked up a business, and he tells me it's paying well. He's the man for me."

Muriel begged a few days of her uncle, and went to stay with some friends in London. In that time she learnt a good many things concerning Basil Thornton. But in spite of her sympathy with Jack Summers, she did not wish to be underhanded, and she said nothing to her uncle when she returned.

Soon afterwards old Mayne became seriously ill, and both his nephews came down to Woodcote. And Basil Thornton came to her smiling with triumph, and said scornfully: "I win the game, Miss Muriel."

Both the cousins stayed at Woodcote till their uncle was well enough to get up and be about. In the same room where he had offered her marriage that morning Basil Thornton said good-bye to Muriel. And now he honestly desired to marry her, and asked her for the second time. When she again refused, he became very angry.

"I gave you your answer then," replied Muriel. "I give you the same answer now. I shall never alter my mind about you. I have learnt all about you—I know you are a liar and a scoundrel!"

"What do you mean?" shouted Basil.

"You have poisoned Mr. Mayne's mind against your cousin; you have lied to him about your prosperity. You know that has all been lies—I have found out. You know that you are really in debt, and borrowing money on the strength of being Mr. Mayne's heir——"

"Is this true?" Once again old Mayne stood in the doorway, leaning against the side, weak from his illness. His voice was strong as ever. "Is this true, Basil?" he thundered.

Unable to equivocate in face of his uncle's stern look, Basil nodded sullenly. "Ah," said old Mayne. The excitement was too much for him, and he fell to the ground. Muriel rushed to his side.

"You have ruined me!" hissed Basil Thornton, and rushed from the room.

That night it was known that the master of Woodcote would not live. But, near to death as he was, and learning the truth about Basil, and how unfairly he had treated Jack Summers, he drew up another will in the latter's favour, of which only Muriel and another witness knew.

And Basil Thornton looked up at the shuttered room of death, and knew that he was ruined. Alone in her room, Muriel watched, dressed and sleepless, for the dawn.

There was a desperate chance for Basil. He guessed why old Mayne had sent for Muriel before he died.

If he could get into the dead man's room and steal that roughly drawn up will, the former one, the one in his favour, would stand!

There would be no chance of his disputing the hurriedly drawn will because there had not been time to send for a lawyer. Richard Mayne was too sharp and keen, even though death was at hand, to leave any loophole for mistake in his purpose.

He crept through the cold, unfriendly corridors, noiseless as a cat. It was long after midnight, and the dawn was not far off. A creaking stair terrified him; the silent room where the dead man lay, and which he reached at last, was greater terror still. He shaded the match so that he could not see the grim, silent figure on the bed. Once he could not help but see it, and then he fancied that the dead face was laughing at him.

He staggered back, and in that moment he saw the will on a little table by the dead man's side. It had been made out on ordinary large paper, and it was tied with red ribbon.

He groped for it with guilty hand; the match burnt his fingers as he stooped.

It was light when he retraced his trembling steps. He would go away at once and hide it in a safe place, then return as if nothing had happened. But his fumbling with the bolts of the door of the house reached the ears of Muriel James, who was watching, silent and sleepless, through the hours of the night.

She went to the window in time to see Basil just getting clear of the house. He had no hat, and she could just see there was something in his hand. What did it mean?

Bareheaded, too, she slipped quickly after him, and out into the keen morning air. The dew of the morning soaked through her thin shoes, she was tired with her sleeplessness; but a feeling that something was wrong, and that she must get to the bottom of it, kept her sharp and strong.

She was, in fact, gaining on him when he looked back over his shoulder and saw her. He began to run, and she ran too, gaining on him still more.

Looking back again, Basil Thornton saw how close she was. They passed a high wall, a dog within barked loudly at the sound of their steps; in desperation Thornton flung the thing in his hand high to the right over the wall. She would never be able to get it there, and he could come back afterwards for it. He could soon out-distance her, surely.

But Muriel did not attempt to follow him. She had seen the touch of red in the thing he had thrown over, and she had noticed as she flew past a little iron gate set in the bottom of the wall.

She went back. To her joy she found the little gate yield to her touch. It clanged as she shut it behind her. Immediately she was assailed and terrified by a ferocious barking the moment that she recognised that the thing which Basil Thornton had thrown over the wall was the will of old Richard Mayne, the will that she had witnessed, leaving the property to Jack Summers.

It had fallen away from the wall. And to a staple in the wall a chain was fastened, and at the end of the chain an enormous bloodhound danced and pawed in rage at sight of her. The will was under his very paws. Oh, Heavens, if the dog should seize it and destroy it!

She was afraid to reach it, for the dog was so threatening.

Yet she must dare. With a new idea she flung a stone against the wall, and, as the dog swerved towards the sound, she made a dash for the precious packet. But the bloodhound's distraction was only for half a second; he swung back again, growling horribly. She fled out of his reach, screaming and more afraid than before.

Ah, why could she not be brave? She would get that packet and prevent it from being destroyed, at any risk or injury.

She went forward and bent resolutely down. The hot breath of the bloodhound was upon her; his claws drew blood from her face and twisted in her hair, giving her a pain not to be borne. She shut her eyes and groped blindly for the packet; she felt the touch of it with a little cry of thankfulness.

The next minute she had rolled away. The blood was streaming from her deathly face, and she had fainted.

* * * * * * *

It was Jack Summers, her lover, who found her there not long after. She was clasping tightly the red-ribboned packet that meant so much and might so easily have been destroyed.

It was after all a happy couple who went back hand in hand through the morning to the house of death.

And Basil Thornton, the schemer, never saw either again.

Warwick Wright.

Digitized by Google

AN UNSUSPECTED MATCHMAKER.

The Story of an Unfounded Rumour.

"THAT silly rumour spoilt the whole thing, Jean!" said Roy Dennison dejectedly to his sister. "You want to know why I'm suffering so acutely from the blues, and I'm making a full confession!"

"This is interesting!" observed Jean Dennison, surveying her brother critically. "When, a fortnight ago, the rumour got abroad that you and Kitty Bryne were engaged, the idea appeared to me to be so utterly absurd that I laughed till I cried!

"I knew that you and Miss Bryne had never exchanged more than a couple of dozen words, which made the rumour impossible, quite apart from the fact that you have been the most invulnerable of men! In fact, Roy, to speak to you in a frank and sisterly manner——"

"As you generally take good care to do!" he interrupted drily.

"Don't be so pointed!" she remonstrated with a frown. "But it does you good to be told the truth, Roy! Well, to finish my remarks, you have been quite a thorn in my side; for all the girls I meet wish to know why you are not more amiable to their sex!"

"Oh, come!" objected Roy with animation. "I have always been polite to ladies; I am neither a bear nor a bore!"

"No, it isn't that!" explained Jean somewhat awkwardly. "But you have never shown any disposition to—to——. Oh, dear! How dense you are, Roy! Don't you understand?"

"I cannot say that your explanation is a very lucid one," remarked Roy with a slight flush, "but I suppose you mean that I have never shown any disposition to select one as a life-partner. I have never attempted to make love to anyone, eh?"

"That's it!" cried Jean quickly. "Well," she added, with a curious twinkle in her merry brown eyes, "now you tell me plump and plain that you had fallen in love with Kitty Bryne, and you were just about to make some advance when that rumour of an engagement was spread concerning you two—and that spoilt your life. Well, it was awkward, because she may think that you circulated the rumour as a move to further your conquest!"

"That's just what she must think," cried Roy dismally. "She cut me dead the very next time we passed in the street! I did my best to contradict it, but even the contradiction is hurtful, because it has the air of saying, 'I don't want her, and I'm indignant at the idea'! See, Jean? It has made my case simply hopeless!"

"It is awkward!" admitted Jean with puckered brows. "But I think if I had been you, and in love with the girl, I should have gone to her boldly and explained that the affair was a hoax, told her that you were in love with her, and asked her if she had any objection to transforming the rumour into actual truth."

"What!" gasped her less excitable and energetic brother. "Why, that would have convinced her that I had done it on purpose! Besides, I wasn't sure that I really loved her enough to make her my wife, and it isn't right to jump into matrimony. However, since she cut me, nearly a fortnight ago, I have come solidly to the conviction that I am in love and that my life without her will be a blank!"

"H'm!" said Jean, the mischievous twinkle becoming more mischievous, "and now you wish me to help you to undo the mischief wrought by the unknown rumourist—I think that that's rather a good word, don't you? That means that you want me to assist in bringing Kitty Bryne and you together?

"Seriously, Roy," she went on with pretended gravity, "I scarcely feel justified in doing so till I am quite satisfied that you are really in love. I have no proper proof of that fact yet!"

Roy looked up in alarm at the prospect of losing his lively sister's aid; her attitude was unexpected.

"I am in deadly earnest, Jean!" he cried passionately. "I love that girl to desperation; I have felt my love increasing day by day, I could worship the ground she walks on, and it is maddening to me to see her pass; I long to take her in my arms and tell her how madly I adore her, and yet I must not even meet her lovely eyes!

"What will life be without her? What will be the value of position, distinction, honours, if I cannot lay them at her feet? My whole being is hers, and the thought that another may possess her is intolerable! I yearn for her!"

"You've improved wonderfully!" said Jean calmly. "Jack never talks to me like that, and the very next time he comes I shall want to know why. When we were first engaged he did say something about his heart, but it was tame compared with you! I'll tell him to have a chat with you and take lessons, or I'll give him back his ring. I don't see why I shouldn't be treated as well as any other girl!"

Roy rose and stared haughtily at his irrepressible sister.

"This is not a joke, Jean!" he said stiffly. "I don't want Jack to ask me questions and if it won't help me——"

A ripple of laughter interrupted him. Jean sprang up, clasped her big brother round the neck, and kissed him.

"You're a goose, Roy! You know, dear, that you have been so invulnerable, so impregnable to the darts of Cupid, that to hear you talk like that is quite startling, and you deserved to be chaffed about it a little! You forget that you chaffed me when my engagement was announced, don't you? That's always the way with you cold, unimpressionable sort of men, when you do get caught in the toils, you—— But I won't tease you, Roy; I'll help you and, if you'll do your part, I will undertake that Kitty shall give you a kiss like this one day!"

Digitized by Google

She kissed him again with additional fervour. "Oh, you needn't blush so furiously! It will be very nice, I'm sure!"

Before the confused Roy could speak she had seated herself on the couch and begun to reflect.

"How can it be managed?" asked Roy at length.

"I'm thinking!" responded Jean.

There was no mistake about the thinking, if her appearance could be taken as a guide; for her brows were knit, her lips set tightly, and her eyes became grave and had a far-away expression.

"I shall have to press Jack into it," she said at length, "and I'm pretty confident of success. Listen, and I'll tell you my plan."

He listened, his face betraying doubt and perplexity, mingled with a trace of expectancy.

"But don't you think that she will——" he began, but Jean stopped him.

"Not at all, afterwards," she declared. "Why should she, if she is married and happy? It only paves the way and leads up to the point where you come in and do the rest!"

"Very well," he agreed. "Oh, you need not fear that I shall not have the courage to go on, if I get the chance. I love her so dearly; she is the——"

Jean's rippling laughter rang out again and she vanished through the doorway as he took up a book and made pretence of being about to throw it at her.

"That girl plagues the life out of me, but I will forgive her if she will put things right!" he murmured.

"It's all right so far," announced Jean on the following day to her expectant brother. "Jack and her brother are good friends, and Jack has so worked on the brother that he has partly wheedled and partly chaffed and partly dared her going to Madame Navarro's to have her fortune told. Kitty has a keen scorn of all that kind of thing, so the best way to get at her was to insinuate that she was afraid to learn what was in store for her, and that finished it. She has plenty of pluck and she is going, just to show that he is wrong."

"What a shame!" cried Roy with a feeling of compunction. "And Madame Navarro?"

"Jack says that you owe him a guinea for services rendered, but you need not send it by return of post as he is not hard up," said Jean enigmatically.

"I understand! It's worth a guinea if Madame does her work."

"She demurred at first, and said it might spoil her reputation, but Jack told her that it was quite likely to come true, whether the oracle said so or not, so she ought to have no fear for her renown."

"Jack and you will make a good pair of schemers!" was Roy's smiling comment on this speech, whereat Jean laughed happily.

That very evening the object of this conspiracy, Miss Kitty Bryne, went to the house of Madame Navarro to consult the oracle. She was tall and pretty; stately, and with an air of determination, but her stateliness and her determined air were not so pronounced as to prevent her from looking most winning.

It was rather a cold evening, and the sharpness of the air, coupled with the inward expectancy, produced a tinge of colour on her cheeks sufficient to enhance her attractiveness in a way that would have made it difficult for Roy to have restrained himself had he seen her at that moment.

Madame Navarro had had no notice from Kitty that she intended to call, but she found the feminine seer at home, and she required no introduction.

"Pray be seated, Miss Bryne," she requested, much to Kitty's surprise. Then she produced the cards and began.

Various things were told, and Kitty listened languidly till Madame asked, after making a fresh shuffle and laying half a dozen cards on the table. "Do you know anyone whose name begins with 'R'?"

Kitty reflected and finally returned a decided negative, a look of unbelieving triumph in her eyes.

"Strange," murmured Madame slowly. "Yet the cards plainly indicate such a person, who will be to you as one who brings good fortune. He or she will be your mascot! Let us go on!"

Madame continued her divinations. The cards showed evidence of an engagement, either just consummated or soon to be. Was Kitty already engaged? No? Then the saying of the cards was a prediction.

"You will soon meet someone to whom you will ultimately be engaged," Madame assured her. Kitty shrugged her shoulders slightly, whereon Madame continued: "It will come, and you will be foolish to repel the feeling through pride, believe me!" This was said so earnestly that Kitty was impressed.

After the cards, Madame did a little palmistry; she invariably gave her consultants the benefit of three sources of inspiration, the cards, the hands, and the magic mirror.

In Kitty's hands there were the same indications of an early engagement, a happy married future, and so forth, but this time the additional information was vouched that the future husband was a man who had not hitherto shown himself very impressionable.

Then came the mirror. Kitty had to place her hand on it for one minute, after which Madame wiped the surface carefully and gazed at it with much earnestness. It was necessary for the consultant to place her hand on the glass in order to have the magic effect of predicting the consultant's future, otherwise there was no conception between her and the glass, and there would be no pictures.

Madame saw several picutres; but it is unnecessary to mention those which do not deal with this story; it is sufficient to say that, as in the case of the cards and palmistry, there was just enough that was true to cause Kitty to feel that there must be something in these things which were of the future. Madame saw a young woman passing a man; the woman she recognised as Kitty, the man she did not know. She had certainly never seen him. The young man appeared to think, from his expression, that he had been unjustly treated. Kitty's face grew warm.

Another picture represented Kitty and this same young man; Madame could see him better now, and she gave a description which Kitty recognised as that of Mr. Dennison. The two were talking amiably and he appeared to be very attentive; Kitty seemed to be pleased. Another picture represented the same pair standing and apparently receiving congratulations. Madame said that the picture became blurred after a moment and she was unable to say whether the couple were dressed as if for a wedding or merely in ordinary clothes.

"Ah, I can see no more pictures; the mirror will tell me no more to-day!" cried Madame regretfully.

Kitty was satisfied. She placed the usual amount of silver thanks on the table and rose to say good evening. As if impelled by a sudden thought, Madame remarked. "Perhaps his name begins with 'R'? I can assure you that there is something in that statement of the cards!

Kitty shook her head slowly and left. She was disturbed by the consultation. She might have been more disturbed if she could have seen Jean retailing the interview to Roy; it was third-hand, having come through Jack.

"Jack's people are giving a party in a week; they have invited Kitty's brother and, as he (poor fellow!) is not engaged, he will persuade his sister to come. You are invited, Roy, so there's the first chance; make use of it!" said Jean.

Roy looked forward eagerly to that night, and when the evening arrived and he was in the house of the Masons, he looked just as eagerly for Kitty.

He soon espied her, and, nerving himself for an effort, he approached her and took a seat by her side.

They had been introduced weeks previously, but that cut in the street undid all that had preceded, or would have done in ordinary circumstances. But Roy screwed up his courage and ignored that disagreeable fact.

"I think this will be a decidedly pleasant evening, Miss Bryne, don't you? The Masons are good entertainers."

Thus deliberately addressed, she felt bound to answer politely. She wished he had not taken that seat; and then the recollection of that picture in the magic mirror came to her. Perhaps, after all, she had really been unjust in cutting him. She looked at him from the corner of her eye, and decided that she had. Having arrived at that conclusion, Kitty felt bound to make amends, and, although she could not see her way to make a plain apology yet, still she could efface the sting of the slight by being gracious now!

Digitized by Google

The result was that they were soon chatting quite pleasantly, and Roy was so happy that he trembled with joy. Kitty occasionally thought of the suggested engagement so persistently mentioned by Madame, and it chilled her for the moment, but she dismissed it and continued her process of making amends for her past rudeness.

"It doesn't follow that I am to marry a man because I talk to him," she told herself. "Mr. Roy Dennison was—— Oh, that 'R'!"

Now, however much we may disown it, there is a stratum of superstition in the breasts of all human creatures, and Kitty Bryne, usually strong-minded, had quite an ordinary mortal's share of it.

We all long to know something of the future, and, when we are told of something that is supposed to be in store for us, we endeavour to realise that something, unless it be extraordinarily disagreeable. This endeavour may even be unconscious, strange as that may appear.

Jean was shrewd enough to know this fact, and she had determined to use it for all it was worth; hence the visit to Madame Navarro, and now the effect was becoming tangible.

Kitty was simultaneously repelled and attracted by the fact that Roy Dennison and she were to be thrown together. She did not at first relish the idea, and yet—yet Roy was a grand specimen of a man, and she had heard a good repute of him! Roy played his part well, and before the evening was over, it was practically arranged that Jack Mason, with Mr. and Miss Dennison, should come to the Brynes' party a week later.

That week seemed more like a year to Roy, and by the time it had passed away he was in such a fever of excitement that he made a false move. He schemed for a few moments' conversation with Kitty and succeeded; but he boldly began to talk about the rumoured engagement.

"Suppose that rumour had been correct, Miss Bryne," he commenced, "we should have been thinking about the wedding by now, I imagine?"

Kitty flushed, and then she looked angry.

"I do not think we need discuss that piece of stupidity, Mr. Dennison!" she remarked coldly. "It was vexing to me!"

Roy saw his mistake; Jean's notion of a bold attack had not been rewarded with the desired result. Perhaps the conditions were different now that so long a time had passed! Roy, in his anxiety not to spoil his chance this time, developed unexpected coolness and artfulness.

"I can cordially echo your sentiments, Miss Bryne!" he declared with assumed sincerity. "It was most vexing to me to have my name linked in such an unwarrantable fashion with that of a young lady whom I scarcely knew."

Kitty did not like that speech; it was practically telling her that she had not attracted his attention in the least—she, whom so many young men had courted, or tried to court, in vain! She set her lips firmly, but Roy gave her no time.

"Yet," he continued musingly, "you really thought that I set that rumour afloat, I do believe! Now, I wonder why on earth you should have thought that?"

Kitty felt ready to cry; it was not often that her feelings got the better of her, but she was conscious of her unjustified rudeness, and she was being informed in plain, matter-of-fact language that she had no grounds for having harboured the idea! It was rather humiliating for such a favourite as Kitty Bryne!

Their little chat was interrupted and it was an hour later before they met again. It occurred to Roy that Kitty had watched for an opportunity for this second chat, and he was right; Kitty's vanity was wounded and she had resolved to show this cool young fellow, who had almost boasted of his immunity, that he was not impregnable.

"I was thinking just now of your remark," she said, boldly plunging into the difficult subject. "Suppose that announcement had been true?"

"Well?" he inquired.

He was looking straight into her eyes with a glance that seemed to read her soul. She was nonplussed; she had expected him to take up the thread, and there he was, leaving her to go on! And he was gazing at her in such a disconcerting manner! Poor Kitty, despite her usual self-possession, found her heart beating violently.

"Well, suppose?" she continued lamely, "I——"

She was so vexed with herself for having started the foolish topic. It was so silly of her to collapse in that way, yet how could she go on when he gazed at her like that, when her own heart was beating so hurriedly, and when he left it all to her to say?

Roy saw the position and risked a bold move this time; he had failed before in the bold attack, but he forgot it. He simply could not help it; he was impelled by some unknown force.

"I am quite ready to suppose that it is true, Miss Bryne—Kitty! Are you?"

She sprang to her feet, her lips trembling, and would have hurried away, but he quickly strode to her side and guided her to a quiet corner, which was in reality a small room thrown into the larger one for the occasion.

"Well, Kitty, I am waiting for the answer!" he said softly, when they were secluded from all observers. "Can I have it? I did not circulate that rumour, but I was at that time just awakening to a knowledge of the fact that I was falling in love with you, and I wished that it were true! I was playing a game this evening when I said I was vexed; I said so because you treated me so coldly and I thought that it would make you reflect. Do you wish me to tell you how much I love you before you give me the answer?"

Apparently she did, for he told her, and he took some time about it, and she appeared to be well pleased with what he said. And before they left that nook, he had asked for and obtained the first kiss. As their lips parted, he remembered the words of Jean—"I am sure it will be very nice!" And he acknowledged that it was!

"Oh, I'm so glad!" was Jean's exclamation when she heard the great news. "How will you tell her about the fortune-telling?" she added, in response to her brother's perplexed inquiry. "Well, I'll settle that, Roy. As soon as the engagement is announced—or shall I say as soon as the announcement made some time ago is confirmed?—I shall have something to say!"

So she did. Roy and Kitty were sitting together when Jean entered.

"I must apologise for intruding," she observed lightly, "You don't like it, of course; I don't, when I am listening to Jack! But I have a confession to make!"

Roy felt hot, Kitty looked mystified; but neither knew exactly what was coming.

"I always thought that you two would make a very happy couple," she went on volubly, "so I thought I would turn matchmaker and engineer a marriage. So I circulated that rumour! Don't look so surprised both of you! Unfortunately it failed. I was not much disturbed till I discovered, a fortnight afterwards, how my brother was affected by it, and then I went further!" Here she told about the fortune-telling.

"Now, Kitty, I'm sure you'll be all forgiveness, because you are so happy, aren't you? Yes, I thought you would!" she rattled on. "Don't you think we might make a double event of it, Kitty? Jack says he can't, positively can't, wait more than another six weeks, and I'm sure that Roy will agree if you will, dear! Won't you, Roy,?"

Of course, he replied in the affirmative, so Kitty, with flaming cheeks, gave her consent also.

Neva Grant.

Digitized by Google

A Fragment - - of Wood.

Which Played a Prominent Part in Two Lovers' Lives.

In a tiny room of a miserable house in a wretched East End street, before the dying embers of a fire which had never been higher than the grate's second bar, sat a tall, thin youth of about nineteen. His chin was resting on his delicate, taper-like fingers, his big, dreamy eyes stared vacantly into space. A sheet of music was propped up in front of him, and a violin and bow lay on a clothless table.

There was the sound of much creaking as someone dashed precipitately up the rickety stairs, followed a moment later by a tap on the door. There was a second tap, to which was vouchsafed no answer. Then the door suddenly flew inwards, and a young girl, whose cheap, poor garments could not disguise her beautiful features, her flaxen hair, or the glory of her lustrous eyes, stood on the threshold. She stepped into the room and placed a brown-paper parcel on the table.

"Mr. Raymond," she said hesitatingly, "an old gentleman's just left this for you. He was all of a tremble, and said I was to carry it very carefully. And here's a letter."

"Oh, Marjorie, is that you?" The tall youth rose languidly. "I was just dreaming, Marjorie, that I was in a crowded theatre conducting an opera, which I had composed myself, and that you, dressed as you should be in lovely silk clothes, were smiling at me from a private box. But I say, Marjorie, won't you ever call me simply Raymond?"

The girl's face flushed with evident pleasure, but she replied never a word.

Raymond Wynne, "the young Paganini," as he was billed by the promoters of the public-house smoking concerts at which he earned a scanty livelihood, tore open the letter.

"My Dear Nephew," he read. "I haven't got long to live. I am an old man, and my fingers are stiff with the rheumatics, so that I can't play my old fiddle as I used to. But you are a musician, you love a good fiddle like I do, and so I leave you my greatest treasure."

The young man clapped his hands with delight.

"Oh, Marjorie," he cried ecstatically, "my fortune's made.. It's a real Strad."

With frantic haste the eager hands of the girl, and the more eager ones still of the young man, stripped the paper from the case. Then Raymond's manner suddenly changed.

"Don't touch it," he almost screamed. "It's mine—mine. Nobody must touch it but me."

He lifted the valuable instrument from its plush-lined bed, and caressed and hugged it. Then he tuned it, and, in a few moments, the miserable garret was flooded with delicious melody.

All this time the girl stood in the doorway gazing with rapturous eyes at her lover.

"I must go down now," she said, as the violinist paused for a moment; "mother is calling me."

The young man made no sign of having heard her words. His mind was completely taken up with his new possession.

It was past midnight before he laid down his bow. But he was up again at break of day—practising, continually practising. And so for days and weeks, no matter whether the other lodgers in the house grumbled or even threatened, he continued practising upon his beloved instrument.

No more did he sit in the long evenings with Marjorie and her half-blind mother, reading to them, playing to them, or inventing other amusements. No more did he take Marjorie for those delightful Saturday afternoon rambles, for which she dressed with such scrupulous care in all her finery, and to which she looked forward so longingly all the week.

And, Marjorie? How she hated the instrument that had robbed her of her lover. When she remonstrated, somewhat feebly, with Raymond, he was vexed with her for noticing such silly trifles. But he grew cool and preoccupied, and never talked of anything but his ambition, and the great name that awaited him, when once he could get a start. And the more her lover drifted away from her, the more Marjorie hated the instrument with all the strength of her passionate, untrained soul.

At last the chance came. By this time Raymond had secured a place in the orchestra of a London theatre. One day he bounded up the stairs, three at a time, of the miserable house, and burst into Marjorie's room.

"It's come, Marjorie, it's come," he shouted, throwing his cap to the ceiling. "My fortune's made, my dream's realised."

The girl stared at him.

"This morning," he went on excitedly, "the great Max Baumer was in the theatre—at the rehearsal. He heard me play my solo in the orchestra, and he clapped his hands and told the manager he had discovered a genius. And I'm to make my début to-night at one of his concerts. A performer has fallen ill. I am to take his place. If I am well received, my name is made. To-morrow I leave these rooms for better ones. See, Baumer has given me a cheque."

He kissed Marjorie carelessly, and tore away to his room to caress his magic instrument, and to draw from it the ecstatic strains of pure delight.

He never noticed that Marjorie didn't return his kiss, or that while he spoke she walked away from him to the window with white cheeks and clenched, trembling hands.

Late in the afternoon, he hurried out to purchase a ready-made suit of evening clothes for the concert.

Raymond had not left the house more than half-an-hour

Digitized by Google

when the door—which in his excitement he had forgotten to lock—was pushed gently back and Marjorie tiptoed softly into his room.

But the figure which crept in so stealthily was very unlike the pretty young seamstress. Her face was whiter than ever, her lips were compressed tightly, and there was an evil light in the deep blue eyes.

Without pausing a moment she went straight up to the case inclosing the object of her hatred. With a shaking hand she threw open the case.

"It's you!" she cried, and her sweet voice had an angry snarl, "you who have stolen him from me! You have driven him mad, and now you are going to take him away. And, I—oh, Heavens, how I love him!"

She stamped a small foot sharply on the floor. Her eyes seemed ablaze. Then suddenly she seized the Stradivarius by its neck, dragged it from its case, snatched a knife from the table, and in a moment the strings were cut by a furious stroke. Though her body rocked with the passion that consumed her, she did not pause. Raising the violin high above her head she brought it down again and again with a sickening crash on the bars of the iron grate.

In two minutes the valuable instrument was a hideous, splintered wreck—almost past recognition—at the feet of Marjorie, who stood panting, but beginning to slowly realise what she had done.

The sound of a man's light-hearted whistling as he hurried up the stairs caused her to turn to the door—to encounter the eyes of Raymond Wynne. His face was glowing with happiness, and he carried a bulging parcel.

Throwing down the parcel, he began to incircle the girl's waist with his arm.

"Why, Marjorie, dear, you——" He stopped suddenly. His eyes caught sight of the mangled remains. In a flash he understood. His face turned livid, his breath came in quick gasps.

But as suddenly as his passion had risen, so Marjorie's had died completely away, and she now stood terrified and pleading.

"Raymond," she sobbed, clutching at his arm. "Oh, Raymond, forgive me! It was my love for you. Think——"

Like an angry tiger he turned upon her, mad and blind with rage.

"Murderess," he called her again and again. Then, raising his arm, he struck her twice with his clenched fist across the brow. She fell like a log—a thin stream of blood spurting from her temple. Raymond looked at her a moment, a gleam of savage exultation lighting his face, and then, without a word, he rushed blindly down the stairs and out of the house.

For two days and two nights Raymond Wynne wandered about, fighting with many sensations. At last his mood softened—an agony of penitence came upon him, and he returned to his old room. He meant to ask Marjorie's forgiveness.

But Marjorie and her mother had gone, no one knew whither.

On the table of his room he found a note from Max Baumer. He had come in search of Raymond when he failed to keep his engagement, and seeing the remains—which still lay by the hearth—had guessed pretty correctly what had occurred; being as kind as he was great, he offered to lend his own instrument to Raymond if he would consent to play for him the following week.

* * * * *

Twenty years have passed away. The ambitious, unknown lad has developed into a great composer and musician, whose name is a household word. Poverty has given way to wealth, obscurity to fame, and yet he is not satisfied.

The ormolu clock on the mantelpiece of the superbly-furnished drawing-room has chimed the hour of eleven, yet Raymond Wynne, though looking pale and weary, shows no sign of retiring for the night.

There seemed no reason on this particular evening why he should sip coffee and blow smoke rings into the small hours.

He had scrawled the final chord of his new opera early in the afternoon, and though, as a matter of course, he was neck-deep in engagements, he had decided, with the easy unconcern of the popular idol, to disregard them all. Truth to tell, it had suddenly drifted into the cells of his over-stocked mind that the 23rd of June was an anniversary, and he intended to keep it up his own particular way.

It seemed strange to him that he should have remembered it. Usually such matters made no impression upon him, and his wife was wont regularly to prod his memory when conventionality demanded that he should appear interested in such events as their wedding day or her birthday.

He thought of his wife, and he sank back languidly into his chair—thought with calm complacency how exactly she suited him.

This evening she was out—shining somewhere in their brilliant circle with some of the reflected radiance of his fame.

She had been a wealthy widow when he married her, and a famous beauty into the bargain, and that of itself is a sufficiently alluring candle for the average Society moth. As for love—well, there had never been any pretence of that between them. They had both been too old when they met for anything so—so hysterical.

But then Vera wasn't that kind of woman at all. Society called her the "Iceberg," and the musician smiled. He rather liked the name—it pleased his self-esteem. He was quite aware that she had simply chosen him because a celebrity is a good investment when pride is the capital.

Even after three years of married life he knew very little of her, he reflected. He hadn't troubled to know much. Vera wasn't given to confidences, and this was just as well, because confidences would have been rather a nuisance to a busy man.

Her beauty pleased him; her social triumphs were put to the fire of his ambition; her discretion was beyond challenge; and what more did he want?

"Ah, what more?" He repeated the words aloud, and then rising abruptly, he walked across the room to a cabinet, unlocked it, took something from it, and reseated himself.

It was no romantic relic that he held in his hand; neither a tendril of hair nor a faded flower; not even a packet of letters. It was merely a small, thin piece of polished wood. Like a flood the incidents of that miserable evening, twenty years before, rushed back to his memory.

He glanced round the luxurious room and thought of the miserable garret he once rented in that wretched East End street; he looked from the corner where, by a grand piano, were heaped several of the costliest violins money could buy, to the scrap of wood in his hand, the sole remains of his first Stradivarius.

Then his eyes sought the stately features of his wife in the full length portrait painted by a celebrated Royal Academician, and another picture rose out of the mist before his eyes—the picture of a girl in lowly dress with a soft tenderness in her deep blue eyes, who pleaded with him for forgiveness—the picture of Marjorie.

* * * * *

His head was still buried in his breast when his wife came into the room.

"Still up?" she asked, slightly elevating her handsome eyebrows. "Isn't it a little late—even for you?"

The composer started, and passed his hand across his fevered forehead as if trying to collect himself.

"I suppose it is," he said "but, strange to say, Vera, I've been thinking."

She shrugged her faultless shoulders.

"Gracious me!" she said. "One shouldn't think. If I thought—why, good Heavens, I should have wrinkles and furrows and grey hairs in a fortnight!"

He looked up quickly. Despite the carelessness of her tone, there was a note in it he did not quite understand.

"What's that?" she asked suddenly, pointing to the scrap of wood which still lay on the table.

He picked it up again and fingered it tenderly.

Digitized by Google

"It's a piece of a violin—one of the first violins I ever had. It's been reminding me of something which happened on this very day, twenty years ago. I—I should like, if you'd let me, Vera, to tell you about it."

He marvelled then, as he often marvelled afterwards, at the sudden impulse which impelled him to speak to her. But his heart was too full, and the desire to unburden it to someone was too strong to be resisted.

Without waiting for her to answer he began. He talked quickly—half-afraid that she would interrupt him with some chilling piece of sarcasm or some politely incredulous inquiry.

He spoke of the garret, of the Saturday afternoon rambles with little Marjorie, of his uncle's legacy, of his ambition, and of the shattered Strad.—he did not even spare himself when he came to the cruel blow that had separated him and Marjorie for ever. When he had finished the recital he sat waiting impatiently for her verdict. But she did not speak.

At last he glanced nervously at her. Was it possible that she could be jealous of this little dead and gone tragedy of so many years ago—or was she merely bored?

Her face was as calm and impassive as ever, but her eyes looked bigger and darker than usual. If she had been any other woman the musician would have sworn there were tears in them.

"I've tired you, Vera?" he asked quickly. "These things sound foolish to you?"

She waited an instant before answering, loosening the cloak from her shoulders as if its weight had suddenly become too much for her.

"No," she said. "You've surprised me, that's all. But tell me, Raymond, if you had found her—this child, this Marjorie—would you have forgiven her—really forgiven?"

The great violinist pressed his hands together—his thin cheeks flushed.

"Heaven knows I would!" he said; "it is her forgiveness I want. That blow has haunted me like a deadly nightmare for twenty years."

"And you cared for her all the time?"

Her voice was softer than usual—there was even tenderness in it. Against his will, it drew from him the truth.

"I love her still, Vera. Forgive me, I love her still."

Then a very amazing thing happened.

His wife stepped suddenly forward, and heedless of damaging her rich satin gown and delicate lace, she knelt with bowed head at the musician's feet. Taking both his hands in hers, she covered them with kisses.

"Then forgive her, Raymond," she whispered. "She needs your forgiveness badly, for she too has been a coward—too great a coward to tell you the truth when you asked her to become your wife, and she saw you no longer recognised the child in the woman; such a coward that she gave you only her second name and not her first—such a coward that she has never shown you this."

She lifted a corner of her fringe and disclosed a small red scar, showing up sharply against the white of the skin.

For some minutes the only sound in the big drawing-room was the ticking of the little clock which seemed to hammer into their brains.

A great sigh left the lips of the musician. As one who awakes from some overpowering trance he staggered to his feet.

Then he stooped down and gently raised his wife, and, folding his arms about her, he held her tight against his heart as if he never meant to release her.

Again and again he kissed the disfiguring scar as if he would have kissed it back into comeliness once more.

"Couldn't you have trusted me, darling?" he asked at last. "What made you so afraid?"

And the woman whom Society called the "Iceberg," whispered the little word "Love!"

J. G. Jones.

He: "That fellow over there cheated me out of a cool million." She: "How could that be?" He: "Wouldn't let me marry his daughter."

Your Editor Chats.

A Personal Note.

At the risk of appearing egotistical, I should like to devote just a few lines this week to a brief chat about myself and my paper. I think that every reader will acquit me of boasting if I say that I believe Short Stories is at the present time a splendid little paper. An editor is always proud of the paper over which he has control, more especially so if his own particular paper is at the top of the tree of his contemporaries. And undoubtedly Short Stories is the best and brightest of its kind. The motto of its staff is "Unflagging Energy and Ceaseless Progression," and the motto is never unheeded. Popular as it has ever been, it has never been so popular as it is at the present time. I account for this by divers reasons. The picture covers have been so highly appreciated that I am sure that they must have brought some scores of thousands of fresh readers to Short Stories. Then again, it has been most gratifying to see the interest evoked by such series as our Unsolved Love Problems. The excellence and high quality of the stories, both serial and short, appeal to the vast numbers who like good fiction, especially when there are copious illustrations by clever artists. And, in conclusion, I may say that I have in preparation for you some startling new features, which I am positive will be liked by all. I have been induced to write these few words as a reply to the many letters I receive congratulating me on the quality of Short Stories and wishing the paper every success. The senders of these I thank most heartily.

"Brian Cresswell's Choice."

I shall have much pleasure in announcing next week the name of the winner of the guinea offered in connection with the Eleventh Unsolved Love Problem. Readers who wish to enter for the Twelfth Problem must note that the closing day is next Friday, May 6th.

Pity the Poor.

The spirit of holidays is in the air. You, gentle reader, are considering where you shall spend your summer vacation, away from the worry of work. You, perhaps a unit of London or of one of our great commercial cities, are "tired of the din and rattle of wheels, sick of the dust," and are pining for the brief spell of a more open existence in the country or at the seaside. The knowledge that you will soon realise your wishes is comforting in the extreme. It gives you greater heart for the work that you needs must do.

But there are others—others, on the threshold of life, who from year's end to year's end never get out of the slums in which they abide, never taste of the great and glorious fields, shining under a great and glorious sun, that are but a few miles away. So near and yet so far. So pitiful and yet so true.

Won't you, more Providence-blessed reader, lend a helping hand to the children whose vision of Paradise is fields—green fields? It is within your means to give one poor unfortunate a whole day's transportation from misery to joy. Ninepence is all that is required—ninepence that is judiciously spent. You send along your donation, and the organisers of Pearson's Fresh Air Fund do all the rest. For every ninepence received one child of the slums spends a day in the country.

Send along your ninepences (as many as you can spare) to the Hon. Secretary of the Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The Editor.

Digitized by Google

AN UGLY DUCKLING.

. . . And a Collie Dog. . . .

He was just a ball of orange and white fluff. But I ought to begin at the beginning.

Dicker, our coachman, brought him to me first. He came to me one morning when I was in the garden, and said :

"I thought you'd like to see this, miss, he seemed just the sort what you could fancy." He unfastened his coat, and from inside it two shining eyes looked into mine, and an orange and white paw was thrust out in friendly greeting.

I nearly screamed with delight.

"Oh, Dicker," I said, "how lovely—how lovely ! What is he ? Where did you get him ?"

"'Tis a collie pup, miss, six weeks old. I found they had a litter of them up at Mr. Grindlay's, and I thought maybe you'd like one—if——"

As Dicker spoke he was drawing from under his coat the most fascinating person I ever saw. He was just what I said first—a ball of orange and white fluff and he had a tiny feathery tail, and a pointed nose and two of the brightest eyes that ever looked out of a dog's face.

"Oh, Dicker !" I exclaimed, "if only I might have him—I wonder if father would let me keep him—I should love him so."

"You might take him in and ask the master now, miss ; he's in the library," Dicker suggested. Dicker had been our coachman ever since I was a baby and he and I were fast friends.

So I picked up the puppy and scurried round the terrace and arrived breathless at the library door, and just listened outside for a moment, because I knew that if my step-mother were in there I had no chance of getting the dog. My step-mother and I didn't agree very nicely, but father and I—well, father and I were like chums.

The library was quite quiet, and I opened the door softly and went in.

Father was by himself, sitting writing at the table. He held out his hand and smiled.

"Well, my child !" he said.

"Dad, did you ever in all your life see anything so lovely ?" I answered him, laying the collie pup on his knee with one hand and putting my free arm round his neck. "Dad, I do want him," and I laid my cheek against father's dear grey head. The puppy looked into father's face, and lifted one of its paws in a pleading sort of way.

Father smiled.

"But, my dear," he said doubtfully, "I don't know what your mother will say."

"Dad, I promise you he sha'n't get into mamma's or anybody's way. I'll train him ever so well."

(I never would call my step-mother "mother." I don't know whether it was naughty of me or not, but I could not and would not do it.)

Father smiled again. I hugged him a little harder.

"Please, dad, dear." I whispered, "I don't believe I ever wanted anything so much in all my life—and he will be such a lovely companion for me."

Mamma said father always spoilt me dreadfully, and that I was odious in consequence. Perhaps I was odious ; I don't know, but I think she really did contrive to provide an excellent antidote for any spoiling I got from father, because she never approved of anything I did, or was, or said. Well, after all, it doesn't matter much about all that. Anyhow, that morning father said :

"Well, well, my dear, if you will undertake to look after the dog yourself and not allow him to worry anybody, you shall have him. Only, mind, you must take entire charge of him."

"Rather," I answered, and I hugged father till he cried out for mercy.

Mamma always said I was nothing but a tom-boy, and that I should never learn repose of manner. I don't believe father cared so very much about repose ; in his secret soul I think he liked his little "boy-girl." His second wife and her daughter were so very full of repose that there didn't seem to be anything else in them at all. "Icily regular, faultlessly dull," applied to them excellently.

Mamma was not at all pleased about Jock ; she invariably called him "that horrid dog," but really he was not so very horrid ! He was never in her way. He was not allowed to go into any room in the house except the schoolroom, my own special sanctum, from which there was a separate stair into the garden, and Jock's education and mine went on there apace.

Though I was seventeen I still had a governess. Mamma said my education had been disgracefully neglected before she married father, and that now I must make up for lost time.

Father and I did not dare say a word, but I don't think we either of us thought I had been neglected, really. You see, I had done lessons always with him, and you don't know how dreadful it was to work with a governess afterwards. At first I used to cry myself to sleep every night, I was so miserable ; but that did no good, and it made father miserable to see me unhappy, so I tried not to mind about my lessons. There were so many things to mind about just then that one more or less hardly mattered.

Father and I had lived oh ! so happily together for fifteen years of my life, and then—well, then somebody persuaded him that he ought to marry again for my sake, that I needed a mother's care, and so on, and he listened to what that dreadful busybody said and married Mrs. Lane, who already had a daughter of her own, and began by thinking me everything that was tiresome and disagreeable. Perhaps I was. But I do not think, looking back on it dispassionately, that I can have been quite so objectionable as my step-mother thought me.

Be that as it may, life was not very pleasant or endurable in the days when my collie pup first came to gladden my heart.

Digitized by Google

I was a lonely little girl just then for a girl of seventeen. Till my father's second marriage I had been his constant companion, but it was soon plain that nothing vexed my step-mother more than to find me in the library with father, or to watch us strolling through the garden together arm in arm. So it was very occasionally now that my dear old dad and I had any of our happy talks. My governess was, well, she was middle-aged and well-informed, and a governess to her finger-tips, and she had not two ideas beyond seeing that I sat upright and learnt those stereotyped lessons correctly. My step-sister was twenty, and had been out two years and looked down upon me from a lofty height, so you see I was rather lonely—till Jock came!

He grew with amazing rapidity, chiefly at the legs. They became lengthy and spindly, and his fluffy body lost that puppy fluff which changed into beautiful silky fur, his tail grew more feathery than ever, and his dear eyes brighter and more loving every day.

He was not always an angel in his youth. He took a great deal of teaching. Like his mistress, he dearly loved mischief.

He and my step-mother steadily and persistently disliked each other, and though Jock was too much of a gentleman to be aggressive, he would never go near her if he could help it. My father he silently and unobtrusively adored.

He loved me with all the depth of his faithful doggy heart, in spite of the many beatings I had bestowed on him. Well, he had to be taught that it was not right to scurry downstairs and hunt for slippers to be devoured slowly on the dust heap in the garden.

It had to be impressed on him by tedious and painful means that to scrab a hole in the midst of the best flower beds was not a thing a self-respecting dog should do, and out of much tribulation it came home to him at last that sheep in the fields must not be chivied and hunted into a corner.

But he learnt all his difficult lessons at last and by the time he was a year old, and I nearly eighteen, Jock was a thoroughly well-mannered, well-brought-up dog!

Just before my eighteenth birthday my step-mother called me into her boudoir after lunch.

"Barbara," she said coldly, "your father and I think that it is time you left off being a child, and that you tried to be a little more grown up," she glanced at my short skirt severely.

My step-mother always made me feel nervous. I felt myself moving from one foot to the other in a maddening way.

"Do not try to shuffle about like that," she said icily; "it is quite sufficiently annoying to have to take out a girl so utterly indifferent to her appearance as you are without your adding to it by ungainliness. Nothing," she paused to give her words weight, "nothing will ever make you passably good-looking, but really you might try to attain to some sort of gracefulness."

"Am I to come out?" I blurted out, with utter disregard of grace of speech.

"Your father seems to wish it. I should have preferred keeping you at home for another year, till you have learnt to improve your manners and appearance a little. However," she shrugged her shoulders expressively, "when you have had a season, perhaps you will learn to be more like other people and not spend your whole time in going about with that horrid dog in the foolish way you do now."

It was on the tip of my tongue to say that I had no one else to go about with, but I luckily refrained, and after listening to a few more remarks on my personal appearance and my lack of good looks and qualities, I escaped.

Jock was lying outside my bedroom door and we went in together. I sat down before the glass disconsolately. It was all very well for my step-mother to say I did not care how I looked or what I wore, but no girl likes to be told she is plain!

"I wonder if I am so ugly, Jock," I said, and I leant my elbows on the table and looked long and earnestly into the glass. "I ought to be sure by this time that I am an ugly duckling. I've been told so often enough."

Jock sat and watched me with loving and adoring eyes. In his sight at any rate I was beautiful.

Out of the glass there looked back at me a small brown face, and two green eyes (eyes that were undoubtedly green). The mouth that smiled at me was not at all like buttons, or cherries or Cupid's bows, or nice things of that sort. It was rather wide, and when I laughed a great dimple came in my chin. My hair was always a sore point with my step-mother. It would not brush back smoothly, but rioted all over my head in curls that refused to be straightened by any comb in creation.

"I am an ugly duckling, Jock dear," I said, and Jock wagged his tail, "and I've got to go to London and dance at balls, and sit up and behave properly as a young lady should, and I'd much rather walk about with you in the country."

Jock wagged his tail again. "And it will all be as horrid as possible—if one's ugly, things are always horrid and I wish I wasn't grown up!"

Jock lifted a paw and put it in my lap. He quite understood the situation and sympathised with me entirely.

That same afternoon he and I wandered off to our favourite dell in the park, where the ground was golden with daffodils and sweet with the scent of violets; we generally went there when things were a little unbearable at home.

Jock lay on a bank of primroses and I lay with my head on his. He made a delicious pillow and before very long we were both sound asleep.

Jock's moving suddenly woke me, and I sat up with a start to find a tall stranger looking down at me with amused, grey eyes.

Jock was on his feet in a moment and on guard beside me, his eyes watching the intruder suspiciously.

"I beg your pardon," the stranger said, raising his hat, "but I think I have missed my way and am trespassing."

I saw then that he was not quite young—in fact, I thought him quite old, for he had a lot of grey hairs. His face was thin and brown and very kind, and his eyes made you feel at once that he was nice!

"Well, I'm afraid you are trespassing," I answered; "but it doesn't matter, because this is part of our park."

"It is very lovely," he said, lifting his hat again that the breeze might ruffle his hair; "I don't wonder you and your beautiful dog chose this place for your siesta."

"I was sound asleep," I laughed; "I never heard you come. Jock and I always come here when we——"

I pulled myself up short.

"When you what?" the stranger asked.

"Well, you won't say anything about it, will you?" I said, "but the thing is, when we are rather unhappy we come here, then we feel better."

By this time we had all sat down among the daffodils and Jock had expressed approval of our new acquaintance by giving him a paw.

"I am sorry you and Jock are ever unhappy," our new friend said gently; "what is it all about?"

"Well, this time it's because I've got to go to town, and come out, and be grown up—and it is such a bore. Jock and I are so much happier here."

"But—" a little amused smile came into the grey eyes watching me—"but surely you like balls, and fun, and all the other things young people enjoy."

"I've never been to a ball, and, you see, the thing is when you are very ugly, and awkward, and rather stupid you don't much like parties."

"No-o; perhaps under those circumstances one might not." He did not smile one bit, but his eyes still looked amused.

"Well, those are the circumstances," I answered nonchalantly; "anybody can see I'm ugly and awkward, and my step-mother is always reminding me of it, and I'm rather stupid, too. Besides that, I really like the country best, and Jock and I have a very nice time together, and, you know, I do so hate long frocks."

"Do you? They are a bore, I expect," he said, and his eyes twinkled.

I thought that most likely he had grown-up girls of his own, because he had some grey hairs and looked—well—looked quite elderly, and he seemed so kind and interested that I just went on.

Digitized by Google

"And it isn't only long dresses, but you can't think what a bore gloves are, and veils—well, of course, one's face and hands get brown, but what does that matter? And if you're all dressed up in those sort of things, how can you possibly go long scrambles in the woods, or—or——"

"Or climb trees," the stranger put in mischievously.

"How did you know," I exclaimed; "perhaps your daughters climb, too, do they?" I asked eagerly.

"My what?"

"Your daughters. Haven't you got any? Oh, dear, I thought you must have, you seemed to understand so well." But the stranger put back his head against the trunk of a tree and laughed, and laughed.

"Do I look so old as all that?" he asked presently.

"Well—you look pretty old," I answered, contemplating him thoughtfully.

"I suppose I do," he said, and I thought his voice sounded a little sad. I could not help exclaiming:

"Oh, please don't mind about it, I really like old people best. They're much the nicest, and I simply can't bear young men."

"Can't you, why not?"

"Do you know, I never can think of one single thing to say to them, not one. They come to lunch sometimes, and my step-mother says afterwards that, with my education, I really ought to have more conversation. But nothing in my education ever taught me how to talk to young men. Old ones are easy enough—I could talk to you all day."

And at that he went again into peals of laughter. I can't think why.

Jock liked our new friend very much, and Jock was a very good judge of character. When the stranger got up to go a few minutes later, Jock got up too, and wagged his tail, and then gave him a paw again, and Jock only does this to people he really likes and respects.

That evening, when I went down into the drawing-room after dinner, I had such a surprise. There, standing by the fireplace amongst other guests talking to my father, was my friend of the afternoon.

He came forward at once and shook hands with me.

"I didn't know I should have the pleasure of seeing you again," he said; "I had no idea to whose house I was coming with Mr. Grindlay," then he turned and told father how we had met in my daffodil dell.

"This is Sir Reginald Ainslie, Bab dear," father said; "he is coming to settle at Upton."

"How jolly!" I exclaimed, for you see Upton was only five miles off, and I thought how nice it would be to have my new friend in the neighbourhood. I saw my step-mother looking daggers at me, but as I didn't know that I had done wrong, I didn't pay much attention to her, and when father said: "Take Sir Reginald into the conservatory, dear, and show him the roses," I went gladly.

"You haven't started on that new frock yet," Sir Reginald said, glancing at my white muslin, which certainly was rather short.

"No, I'm going to put it off till the last minute. You don't know how I hate them and everything that they mean."

"They mean growing up and having a good time."

"I don't know about the good time," I said.

"But growing up means ever so much that is pleasant to a woman," he persisted softly, pulling a yellow rose to pieces as he spoke; "it means seeing life and the world, and then marrying and——"

"Me marry?" I laughed; "that isn't very likely. No one in this wide world would ever wish to marry me, and I'm quite sure I don't want to marry anybody. I mean to be an old maid and live with Jock. He is really and truly nicer than any young man. He's always the same," I added.

"And men are not?"

"I don't think young men are," I said gravely; "they never seem to be the same two minutes together. Now, Jock is always the same."

"It will be a case of love me, love my dog, I see," Sir Reginald laughed.

"If you mean that if anybody cared for me he'd have to care for Jock too, you are quite right," I said. "I wouldn't go anywhere without him, and as for marrying—well—I don't want to marry at all, but I certainly shouldn't dream of marrying anybody who wouldn't take Jock as well as me! He's such a lovely dog."

I didn't quite understand the look that came into Sir Reginald's eyes when I said that.

"Faithful little soul," he said, and I wondered whether he meant me or Jock, only Jock's is a big soul, so he must have meant me!

It was quite funny after that how often Jock and I met Sir Reginald in the daffodil dell. I suppose he liked it just as much as we did. He and I had ever so many jolly talks about all sorts of things, and he never seemed to think me stupid or tiresome in my ideas, though I was only a little girl, and he so much older and wiser.

The time for us to go to London was getting horribly close, and I dreaded it more every day. We were so happy in the country just now, Jock and I, and—Sir Reginald; I did so hate trying on my new frocks with their long skirts, and mamma never seemed to lose an opportunity of telling me how badly I

I looked up and saw a tall, handsome gentleman raising his hat to me.

Digitized by Google

walked, or how much I stooped, or how unfortunately plain I was!

And then something most extraordinary happened, so extraordinary that even now I sometimes have to pinch myself to see if I really am Barbara or somebody quite different!

One afternoon I came up to the front door, Jock as usual beside me, and I found father on the steps talking to Sir Reginald. Father's expression was half pleased, half bewildered, and he held out his hand to me and drew me close to him with a little tender movement.

"Well, my child," he said gently, and the look in his eyes puzzled me—it was full of love and wistfulness.

I looked at Sir Reginald. He was watching me, and something in his eyes made me suddenly turn away and pat Jock's head in a great hurry.

"Sir Reginald wants—" father began, then hesitated, his voice shook.

"I want you and Jock to come down to our pet dell for a stroll, will you?" Sir Reginald said, and there was a tone in his voice that made my heart give a funny little jump.

But, of course, I went with him. He seemed like a dear old friend now, and before we went father patted me on the shoulder and smiled down at me tenderly.

All the way across the park we never spoke a word. I don't know why I suddenly felt as though I had not anything to say, and Sir Reginald seemed struck with silence too.

Even Jock walked sedately and soberly like a very grown-up dog.

When we got to the daffodil dell we all sat solemnly down and still nobody said anything for a few minutes, and I began picking the daffodils round me from sheer nervousness.

Then—all at once Sir Reginald touched my hand softly.

"Little Barbara," he said, "do you know what I've been talking to your father about?"

I shook my head.

"I've been asking him a great favour."

"Well, then, I'm sure he'll grant it," I said. "Father never refuses people when they ask him things. I wonder whatever you wanted from him," and I forgot my nervousness and looked up at him, and again his eyes made me turn away quickly, and lay my hand on Jock's soft ears.

"He said"—Sir Reginald's voice was very gentle—"I might have what I want if—you will give your consent?"

"I?" I was so surprised that I jumped up. "Why, what have I got to do with it? It's much more likely to be my step-mother who would arrange any of father's business for him, not I."

"It's not exactly business," he hesitated, then took my hand into his and held it closely. "I asked your father whether, if you agreed, he would let you put off your season for a month or two, and then begin it—with me."

"With you?"

The clasp of his hand made me feel, oh! I don't know how, so happy, and yet as if I wanted to cry, and Jock seemed to understand, for he laid his dear head against me and wagged his tail.

"Yes, little girl, do you think you could be happy as—as the wife of an old fellow like me, and begin your first season with me to take care of you?"

"Do you want to marry me?" I asked, and I was so dreadfully surprised that I looked at him again; "you must have forgotten how very ugly I am, and, truly, I am most stupid and awkward," I spoke earnestly.

"Are you, dear?" he said, and all at once he put his arm round me and gathered me close up to him. "I don't think so—I think you're the dearest little girl in all this wide world, and quite the prettiest. And, Barbara darling, I am not so very old, you know."

The wistfulness in his voice made a queer sort of choking feeling come into my throat. I hid my face against his rough coat, and whispered:

"I don't think you're a bit old, and oh! Jock and I will be so very happy with you!"

"Jock is to come, too, then?" he said.

But I knew he was only laughing at me, because he drew my face up to his and kissed me, and Jock stood up and gave him his paw quite gravely, as though he were giving us his approval.

* * * * *

And as I write I am looking out of my window upon a lawn covered with daisies, where Jock is sitting looking extremely important and grave and responsible, whilst beside him on the grass kicks and crows and laughs a sturdy, grey-eyed person who is just learning the use of his two fat legs, and who grabs at Jock's orange and white coat with two chubby hands.

Jock adores him and he worships Jock, and do you know he is really and truly my son, though as I have told you, I often have to pinch myself to be sure that I am actually and really Barbara, the ugly duckling.

L. G. Moberly.

AUNT MATILDA: "Why do you look so utterly wretched, Jimmy?" Jimmy: "I'm on good behaviour, aunt, when we has company."

"ARE you married?" said the manager to a man who was looking for a situation. "No, sir." "Then I can't employ you. We find that married men know better how to obey than bachelors."

MISTRESS: "Mary, go to the door at once. Someone has rung three or four times." Mary: "Oh, it's all right. It's only that young feller as is mashed on Miss Maud. Yer needn't be afraid of his goin' away in a hurry."

THE grammar pupils were saying their lessons. "In the sentence, 'I love you,' what is the mood of the verb?" asked the teacher. "Sentimental mood," replied one of the big girls, who had spent the last summer at the seaside.

GENTLEMAN VISITOR: "Is Miss Winterbloom in?" Servant: "No, sir; she told me to say that she waited for you until half-past four." Gentleman Visitor: "But I told her expressly I shouldn't be here until five." Servant: "Yes, sir; so I heard her say."

Digitized by Google

A Nonsensical Notion.

Telling How Tom Dean Chose His Wife.

We had just finished breakfast. Tom laid down the egg-spoon he had been playing with, and looked across at mother.

"Aunt Anne, I think I'll take a wife," he said, exactly as he might have said: "I think I'll take another cup of coffee!"

"Take a wife?" repeated mother, by no means receiving the information as tranquilly as it had been given. "What for?"

"Well, I don't know," answered Tom, thoughtfully. "It's a notion I've got in my head, somehow."

"All nonsense!" said mother, sharply.

"Do you think so?" said Tom, apparently doubtful, but not in the least put out.

"Think so? I know it. What in the world can you want with a wife? After all these years we have lived so comfortably together, to bring home somebody to turn the house upside down! And, then, what's to become of that poor child?"

The "poor child"—that was I—reddening at being brought into the argument in this way, was about to speak for herself, when Tom interposed, warmly:

"I'm sure May knows I would never have any wife who would make it less a home for her—don't you, May?"

"Of course," said I.

"And I'm sure she knows nothing of the sort," persisted mother, "nor you, either, Tom Dean. How can you answer for what a wife may take it into her head to do, once you get her installed here? You can't expect her to forget, as you do, that May has no real claim on you."

"That I have no real claim on her, I suppose you mean, Aunt," Tom put in for the second time, just as I was getting thoroughly uncomfortable. "But, for all that, I intend to keep her—that is," added Tom, with one of his short-sighted blinks sideways at me, "as long as she'll stay with me, eh, May? And whoever has anything to say against that arrangement will have to go out of my house to say it—not that I'm afraid of any such result in this case—and, on the whole, Aunt Anne, I should like to try the experiment."

Mother smiled grimly, but Tom was so evidently bent on his "experiment," as he called it, that she gave up the argument.

"You can dance, if you're ready to pay the piper," she said, shortly. "And, pray, how soon do you mean to be married?"

Tom's face fell a little at this question.

"Well," said he, "I can't say, exactly. I suppose we shall have to be engaged first."

"What!" said mother, opening her eyes; "why, you don't mean to say, Tom, you haven't spoken to her yet?"

"Not yet," replied Tom cheerfully. "Time enough for that, you know, after I had spoken to you."

Mother, as a minister's widow, was not much given to the idle mirth that is as the crackling of thorns under a pot; but now she leant back, and laughed till the tears stood in her eyes.

"Well," she said, "if it was anybody else, I should say he was cracked; but you never were like other people, and you never will be, Tom Dean. But, at least, you have fixed on the lady?"

"Oh, yes!" answered Tom; "but, if you will excuse me, Aunt Anne, I would rather not say anything about her just yet; for, if—if anything should happen, it wouldn't be pleasant for either party, you know."

With which veiled allusion to his possible rejection, Tom took his hat, and left the room.

Our household was rather queerly put together. There was no particular reason why I should have been of it at all; for I was not really related to Tom, nor even to "mother," as I called her, though I am sure we were as dear to each other as any mother and daughter could be. She was the second wife of my father, who, like most ministers, had been richer in grace than in goods, and had left us at his death with very little to live on.

Then it was that Tom Dean had come forward, and insisted on giving a home to his aunt and to me, whom he had scarcely seen a dozen times in his life before. That was exactly like Tom—"queer Tom Dean," as his friends were fond of saying "who never did anything like anybody else." I suppose, in spite of his clear head for business, there is no denying that he was whimsical; but I am sure, when I think of his unfailing generosity and delicacy, I can't help wishing there were a few more such whimsical people in the world.

Naturally, at the time I am speaking of, my opinion had not been asked; all I had to do was to go where mother went, and, while she gave her energies to the housekeeping, I gave mine to growing up, which by this time I had pretty well accomplished. But perhaps for that very reason—for one sees with different eyes at twelve and eighteen—my position in the house had already begun to seem unsatisfactory to me; and the morning's words put it in a clearer light, since it had been used as an argument against Tom's marrying.

I knew that mother had spoken honestly, believing that such a step would not be for his happiness. But was not he the best judge of that? I knew him, if reflection should bring him round to her opinion, to be perfectly capable of quietly sacrificing his own wishes for my sake, who had not the shadow of a claim on him; so it must be my part to prevent his own kindness being turned against him now. Still, it was not so easy to see how I was to provide for myself, in case it should become advisable. What could I do? Draw and sing, and play tolerably; but not in a manner to compete with the hosts that would be in the field against me. Literature? I had read so many stories whose heroines, with a turn of the pen, dashed into wealth and fame. That would be very nice, only—I was not the least little bit literary. I had never even kept a diary, which is saying a great deal for a girl in her teens. The "fine arts," then, being out of the question for me, what remained? There was some outdoor situation, or a place in some family, and—and there was Will Broomley!

That may seem like going away from the point, but it was not. I was matter-of-fact; but I could see well enough what was going on right under my eyes, and I had a pretty clear idea of what was bringing Will to the house so often as he had taken to coming lately. There was a "situation," then, that would give me the home life I liked best, and felt myself best suited for; but—would it answer in other respects?

Digitized by Google

I overcast the long seam I was sewing twice over, I was so busy trying to make up my mind whether I liked Will Broomley well enough to pass my whole life with him; and even then I had not come to any decision, when I was called downstairs to see Letty Walters.

Letty was the prettiest, I think, of all my friends, and certainly the liveliest. Tom called her "the tonic," and used to laugh heartily at her bright speeches. I suppose it was this that made mother fix on Letty as his choice.

When I came into the sitting-room, I found a kind of cross-examination going on. It was amusing to anybody in the secret, as I was, to watch mother's artful way of continually bringing the conversation round, as if by chance, to bear on what she wanted to know. But it all amounted to nothing—either because Letty was too good a fencer, or because she really had nothing to betray. But, when Tom came home, mother took care to mention that Letty had called.

"What, 'the tonic'?" said Tom. "Too bad I missed her."

"But for your choice being already made," said mother, with a covert scrutiny of his face, "I daresay you might have as much of the tonic as you liked."

"But I go on the homœopathic principle, you know," answered Tom, with a twinkle in his eye.

After that mother's belief in Letty's guiltiness wavered. Her suspicions were transferred from one to another of our acquaintances, but always with the same unsatisfactory result.

"It passes my comprehension," she said to me, despairingly, one day. "I am positive I could tell the right one, by Tom's face in a minute, and yet I have mentioned everybody we know."

"Perhaps it is somebody we don't know," I suggested; "some friend of his whom we have never seen."

"What! a perfect stranger?" said mother, sharply. "Don't be so silly, child; Tom's not capable of that!"

I was silent, for I did not want to worry her; but that was my opinion, all the same.

The same evening—it was rather more than a week since Tom had hurled that thunderbolt of his at us—mother began about it openly.

"When are you going to introduce your wife to us, Tom? I suppose you have come to an understanding by this time?"

"Oh, there's no hurry," Tom said, as he had said before; but this time he did not speak quite so cheerfully. "The fact is," he continued, with a little hesitation, "there—there's a rival in the case."

"A rival?" repeated mother, with unfeeling briskness.

"Yes, a young fellow—younger by a good deal than I am," and Tom's face assumed an absurdly doleful look. "He is always there now. I confess I don't see my way clear; I'm waiting for her to make up her mind."

"And she's waiting, most likely, for you to make up yours," said mother, forgetting, in her propensity to right matters, that she was playing the enemy's game.

"There's something in that that never occurred to me," said Tom, his face brightening.

Mother saw her mistake, and made a counter-move at once.

"But the ways of my time are old-fashioned now; young ladies, nowadays, take matters into their own hands. If she cared for you, you may be sure she wouldn't have waited till this time to let you know it; that is, I judge by the girls I am in the habit of seeing; but if this one is a stranger to me"—(here mother riveted her eyes on Tom's face; oh, dear, my unfortunate words!)—"if she is an entire stranger, I cannot pretend to form any opinion of her, of course."

"Of course," repeated Tom, absently.

"Not that I have any such idea," resumed mother, growing warmer; "I have said, and I say again, that to bring a perfect stranger under this roof is not my opinion of you, Tom!"

I felt mother's words like so many pins and needles; for Tom was looking meditatively across at me, and though that was just a way of his, it seemed now as if he were reading in my face that the opinion was mine, and that I had been meddling in what did not concern me. I felt myself for very vexation getting redder every moment, till it grew intolerable.

"It is so warm here," I said, for an excuse, turning towards the French window, "I am going to get a breath of air."

I went out into our little strip of garden ground. Tom followed. I thought I should never have a better opportunity to say what I had it in my mind to say, so I waited for him by the bench under the old pear-tree.

"Sit down here, Tom," I said; "I've something to say to you."

"Have you?" said Tom; "that's odd, for I—well, never mind that just yet. What is it, May?"

"Tom," I said, still surer now he had misjudged me, and more resolved to set him right, "I want a place."

"A place?" repeated Tom, puzzled, as well he might be, by this sudden and indefinite announcement; "what kind of a place?"

"I don't know," I said; for, indeed, my ideas were of the vaguest. "I thought you might know, being in the way of such things. Now, pray, Tom," I went on, quickly, "don't fancy I am discontented, or—or anything of that sort. The truth is, ever since I left off school, I have wanted something to do, and had it in my mind to speak to you about it."

With this I looked at Tom, fearing he might be vexed; but he did not look vexed, only preoccupied.

"I do know of a place, as it happens," he said, after a while, "only I'm not sure how it would suit you."

"That's soon seen," said I. "What is it like?"

"Well, it's a sort of — of general usefulness——"

"Why, it must be to run errands," said I, laughing. "And where is it, Tom?"

"Well," said Tom, hesitating again, "it's with me."

"How very nice!" I exclaimed. "How soon can I have it?"

"The sooner the better, so far as I am concerned," said Tom; and with that he turned round and looked at me, and directly I met his eyes I knew somehow, all in a moment, what it was he meant; and I knew, too, at the same instant, that I could not have passed all my life with Will Broomley, and why I could not.

I am sure Letty Walters, who interrupted us just then, must have thought my wits were wandering that evening, and, indeed, they were; for I was completely dazed with the sudden turn things had taken. But Tom, who had the advantage of me there, took it quite coolly, and laughed, and talked with Letty just the same as ever till she went away.

It was rather late when we went in. Mother sat where we had left her, knitting in the twilight.

"Wasn't that Letty Walters with you a while ago?" she said, as we came up.

"Yes," said I, with a confused feeling of an explanation of something being necessary; "she just came to bring the new crochet pattern she promised me."

"H'm!" said mother, as much as to say she had her own ideas as to what Letty came for.

Tom had been wandering about the room in an absent sort of fashion, taking up and putting down in the wrong places all the small objects that fell in his way. He came up, and took a seat by mother. I became of a sudden very busy with the plants in the window, for I knew he was going to tell her.

"Wish me joy, Aunt Anne," said he; "it's all settled."

"Settled, is it?" said mother, in anything but a joyful tone. "So it's as I suspected all along. Well, you have my best wishes, Tom. Perhaps you may be happy together, after all; I'm sure I hope so."

This wasn't a very encouraging sort of congratulation, and Tom seemed rather taken aback by it.

"I'm sorry you're not pleased," he said, after a pause. "I had an idea somehow you would be."

Digitized by Google

"I don't know from what you judged. But, there, it's no use crying over spilt milk. You'll be married very soon, I presume; I must be looking out for a house."

And mother stroked her nose reflectively with a knitting-needle.

"What for?" said Tom. "I thought of keeping on here all the same."

"I never supposed otherwise," said mother. "Of course I did not expect to turn you out of your own house."

"But what is the need of looking out for another, then?"

"Why, for myself."

"For yourself?" repeated Tom, in a tone of utter amazement. "Going to leave us—just now? Why, Aunt Anne, I never heard of such a thing!"

"Now, Tom," said mother, speaking very fast, and making her needles fly in concert, "we might as well come to an understanding at once on this subject. I am fully sensible of your past kindness—now just let me finish—I say I appreciate it, and have tried to do my duty by you in return, as I hope I should always be ready to do. I wish all good to you and your wife, and shall be glad to help her if ever I can; but to live in the same house with her is what would not turn out pleasantly for either of us, and, once for all, I can't do it."

"Aunt Anne," said Tom, pushing back his chair, and staring in mother's excited face, "either you or I must be out of our wits."

"It's not I, then, at any rate," retorted mother, getting nettled.

Amusement and a certain embarrassment had kept me a silent listener so far, but there was no standing this; I tried to speak, but could not, for laughing.

"I think you are both out of your wits together," said mother, turning sharply. "What ails the child? It's no laughing matter."

"You don't understand each other," I gasped. "Oh, dear! It's not Letty—oh—oh, dear!" and relapsed again.

"Not Letty?" repeated mother, turning to Tom. "Then why did you tell me so?"

"I never told you so," said Tom.

"Why, yes, you did," persisted mother. "You came in, and told me you were going to be married."

"Yes, so I am," said Tom, still at cross-purposes.

"Now, Tom Dean," said mother, rising and confronting him, "what do you mean? Who is going to be your wife?"

"Why, May, of course," answered Tom.

"May!" and then, after a pause of inexplicable astonishment, it was mother's turn to laugh. "Do you mean to say, Tom, it was that child you were thinking of all the while?"

"Why, who else could it be?" said Tom, simply.

"Well," said mother, "I ought to have remembered you never did do anything like anybody else. But, still, why in the world did you go to work in such a roundabout way?"

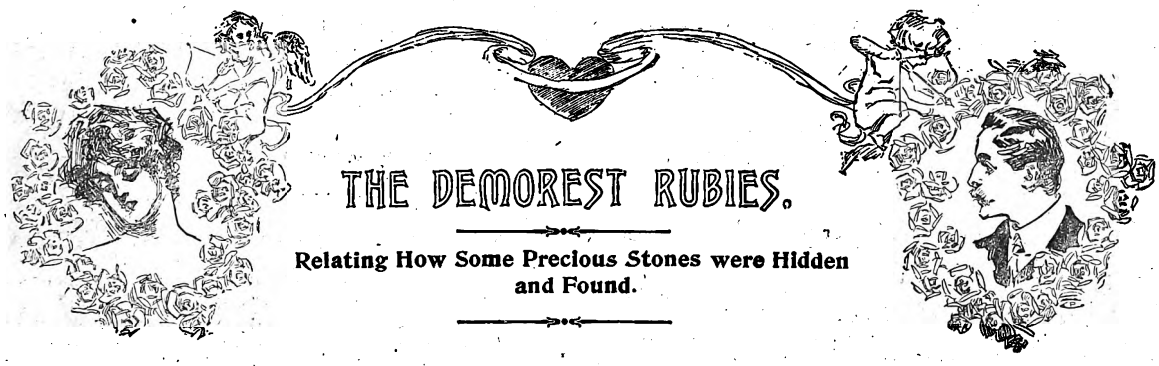
"I wanted to see how you took to my idea," said Tom.

"And how do you suppose we were to guess your idea meant May?" mother asked.

"Who else could it be?" repeated Tom, falling back on what he evidently found an unanswerable argument. It was no use talking to him. Mother gave it up with a shake of the head.

"And you won't want another house, then, Aunt Anne?" said Tom, suddenly. That set mother off again; Tom joined with her, and altogether I don't think we ever passed a merrier evening than the one that made us acquainted with Tom's future wife.

K. P. Owen.



THE DEMOREST RUBIES.

Relating How Some Precious Stones were Hidden and Found.

Yes, she was dead at last—Margaret Demorest of Stony Lodge—and the shock of her demise had shaken Rusper through and through. For years, her numerous relatives, each with an eye to the estate, had watched her movements from a respectful distance, which she herself had interposed between them, and their hearts had grown sick with hope deferred. But the grim looks of the old maid had not power to repulse the King of Terrors when his hand knocked at her gloomy door.

Heart disease, the doctors said, when she was found one morning with a smile of peace frozen on her stern and withered features. The relatives accepted the verdict with due resignation, following the remains of the "dear departed" to their final resting place amid an ostentatious display of crape and black-bordered handkerchiefs. But, when the will was read, the excitement of the heirs-at-law rapidly ascended to fever-heat. Always eccentric in life, Miss Demorest had retained that eccentricity to the end, and woven it into her last will and testament.

With the exception of a few bequests to her servants, the whole of her property, landed and personal, to wit: Stony Lodge, her present residence, with its beautiful park, which was a very Eden of loveliness, together with a splendid house in town and money to the amount of five hundred thousand pounds, was to pass into the sole possession of that one among her kinsfolk who should discover the hiding-place of the twelve Demorest rubies.

Should the gems remain undiscovered after the lapse of one year from the date of her death the estate was to be sold, and the legacy to be devoted to charity.

"The old cat!" muttered fashionable Mrs. Meredith, viciously. "She hid those rubies herself, the spiteful thing!"

"It is too provoking!" pouted her pretty daughter Maude.

"I shall contest the will," said thin-lipped Reuben Gray. "It cannot stand."

Mrs. Meredith was Miss Demorest's niece and Reuben Gray her nephew. The two were brother and sister, and the nearest akin to the dead woman.

Next came Margie Vane, child of a favourite nephew who was to have been the heir had he not displeased his aunt by marrying against her will, a girl of obscure parentage—"a pauper," Miss Demorest termed her.

Harold Vane had died some years back, closely followed by his wife; and the one daughter, Margaret, was left alone in the world and utterly penniless.

Mrs. Meredith had taken her—for the old aunt remained obdurate—and she was now serving in the capacity of maid to her beautiful cousin Maude.

Digitized by Google

Margie Vane was not present at the reading of the will. Mrs. Meredith considered it unnecessary, and Margie herself had not the faintest hope of being remembered kindly by her father's stern old relative. When, therefore, they returned in anger and disappointment and gave an account of the wording of the will, Margie's hazel eyes opened wide in wonder.

"Whoever finds the rubies will inherit everything?" she asked, half breathlessly.

"By the terms of the will," answered Mrs. Meredith. "But I very much doubt if anyone will find them. Aunt Margaret was such a spiteful old cat."

"Oh, aunt, hush!" cried Margie, in pained tones. "She is dead now."

"So much the better for the community," said Mrs. Meredith, vindictively.

"Are you going to search for the gems?" Margie asked.

"Of course. There is just one chance in a thousand that I may unearth them."

"In which event you would find no further fault with poor Aunt Demorest's will," said the girl, shrewdly. "Oh, Aunt Jennie, may I go with you to the great house? I was never inside it."

"I suppose you may if you choose," replied her aunt, ungraciously. "In fact, Mr. Fay, the solicitor, insists that you shall take your chance with the rest of us. But it is extremely improbable that you will find the gems."

So that afternoon, and many ensuing afternoons, Mrs. Meredith, Maude, and Margie walked over to Stony lodge, and wandered fruitlessly about amid the treasures of bric-à-brac, statuary, books, and rare old china.

On one of these occasions Margie met Will Demorest, a distant cousin. He was a frank, handsome young fellow, with dark-blue eyes and close-curling, fair hair. His was the genuine Demorest face, the index of a strong noble character.

By occupation he was an artist in glass-blowing, having learnt the art in Venice. He had done considerable work for Miss Demorest, with whom he was a prime favourite. Indeed, there had been times when Mrs. Meredith and her brother Reuben had feared lest a will should eventually be drawn up in favour of this bright youth. But death had settled all that, and their fears were a thing of the past.

"So you thought you would have a look for the rubies with the rest of us," said Mrs. Meredith, with a sneer, as she found the young glass-blower examining the books in the library one morning. "Yet I thought you abhorred mercenary considerations."

"I am not in quest of the gems," Will replied, as his blue eyes rested in unmistakable admiration on Margie's fair, sweet face.

"Humph! I hope you don't take me for a lunatic or a fool, Will Demorest," was the scathing rejoinder.

"For neither, I assure you," said Will, with a bow. "Only at present I am more interested in pearls than rubies. Cousin Margie, may I show you the house? I believe I know it more thoroughly than most people."

Margie shyly acquiesced, and the two went off together, leaving Mrs. Meredith and Maude to continue their search.

"Are you anxious to find the rubies also?" asked Will, as they paused in the china closet to admire the cut-glass.

"I have not even looked for them," answered Margie, with a bright smile.

"Yet you have an equal right with the rest," persisted the young man, watching her face keenly.

"Oh, no, I have not, indeed," she said simply. "Papa displeased Aunt Demorest, as you know, and she has never taken the slightest notice of me. This being the case, I should not feel entitled to join in the search for the rubies, even if I desired to do so."

"They are magnificent gems," said Will, "and they were never set. I saw them just once, and they nearly took my breath away."

"I should like to see them," Margie said, musingly, "but oh, Will, were they more beautiful than these exquisite cups? Surely that is impossible."

The cups in question were indeed exquisite. Blown of the costliest Venetian glass, lily-shaped, with curled leaves for saucers and glowing with rainbow tints, they resembled nothing so much as a bed of gorgeous tropical flowers.

Margie's eyes sparkled as she looked at them.

"How lovely! How dainty! How fairy-like!" she exclaimed breathlessly. "See, Will, this one is exactly like an opal with a touch of fire; and here is an amethyst, and here a glowing emerald. Oh, Will, do look! See how that strange glow of hidden fire flashes from each! This one is jacinth, this beryl, and—Mr. Demorest, here is a ruby! Oh, the beauty! The real gems cannot be more superb."

As she spoke she took the ruby cup into her hand. Will half started forward as if to prevent her, but drew back again with a pale, startled face.

"But how fragile it is, Will!" commented Margie, turning it round and round. "Surely Aunt Demorest never drank tea out of them! And where did she find the beautiful things?"

Before he could frame a reply Mrs. Meredith and Maude appeared upon the scene.

"Margie," cried the former, "put down that cup and come along. I should think you would have more pride than to dawdle here all day talking with Will Demorest."

Margie's soft, hazel eyes filled with tears as Mr. Fay entered the room and from under his bushy brows glanced sharply at each of the group.

"Hunting for rubies, eh?" he said, sarcastically. "But Miss Margie seems to be the only successful one of the party. That is a rare bit of glass, Miss Margie, and was blown by our friend here," with a motion of his hand towards Will.

Margie's hand tightened on the cup in her surprise; her rosy fore-finger pressed a raised stamen in the calyx of the lily bell, when presto! change! it sank beneath her touch, and her startled eyes gazed straight into a small cavity where glowed a ruby of inestimable value, like a drop of rosy fire.

"Found!" shouted the solicitor, as his eyes also beheld the gem.

Will, very white, shrank back against the wall, while Mrs. Meredith and her daughter pressed closer to Margie and the lawyer.

"The rubies!" gasped the avaricious woman, making a dive for the other cup.

But the lawyer placed himself in her way.

"I beg your pardon," he said. "The discovery is Miss Margie's, and in accordance with the terms of the will of my deceased client she is sole heiress to the Demorest estate."

Mrs. Meredith grew pale with chagrin, Maude burst into tears, and Reuben Gray, who had heard all from the door, announced his intention of breaking such an unjust will.

"You may try it," was all Mr. Fay said to the threat.

Will came slowly forward and congratulated Margie on her good fortune.

"And my congratulations are none the less sincere that with them I resign the sweetest hope of my life," he said.

"Resign a fiddlestick!" muttered the old lawyer. "Miss Margie, that boy refused to be made Miss Demorest's heir, insisting that it would be an injustice to those nearer of kin. Then she made him blow these cups of tinted glass, with the central cavity and spring. She inserted a ruby in each cup, which, combined with the different tints, gave them their rich colouring. He watched her hide the rubies, and he has kept the secret. Does he not merit some reward?"

Margie flushed and glanced timidly at Will; then she looked round for her aunt and cousin. Both had disappeared.

"Take her, Will," said the old solicitor, with twinkling eyes, "and bless you, my children."

With a melodramatic gesture he, too, vanished, and I think the young people were not long in coming to an understanding; for cards are now out for their wedding.

The disappointed relatives maliciously declare that the whole thing was neither more nor less than an infamous conspiracy between Will Demorest and Mr. Fay. But Margie says the property is rightly Will's as he was the old maid's favourite, and in wedding him she is but giving him back his own.

Stanley Hammond.

Digitized by Google

Circumstances Alter Cases.

She: "How hot it was in there! And I do hate to be squeezed in a crowd!" He (moving closer): "That is very natural, Miss Flossie; but—er—there is no crowd here, you know."

She Said "Ja."

Julie: "So you are engaged to Jack! You told me once that if ever he asked you to marry him your answer would be a word of two letters." Nellie (blushing): "I answered him in German!"

Ah! Flattering Courtier!

"What! You call me pretty? Why, I am an old woman; my hair is turning white, and, look, here is a wrinkle!" "A wrinkle! No, madam, it is a smile that has drifted from its moorings!"

Food For Thought.

Husband: "Are you aware, my dear, that it takes three-fourths of my salary to meet your dressmaker's bills?" Wife: "Goodness gracious, whatever do you do with the rest of your money?"

Cynicism.

The Adorer: "It's wonderful, old man, what love will enable a fellow to see in a girl that he never saw before!" The Onlooker: "No doubt! But it's equally wonderful what it won't let him see that he'll see later."

It Was Detachable.

Lady (at telephone): "Are you there? Are you Mr. Frizzle, the barber? Well, I want my hair done for a party this evening." Mr. Frizzle (at the other end of the wire): "Certainly, mum. I'll send a boy round for it in five minutes."

Very Absent-Minded.

She (after the elopement): "I have received a letter from my father. Dear papa is so absent-minded." He: "In what way?" She: "He inclosed a lot of millinery and dressmaking bills and forgot to put in the money to pay for them!"

Sheer Spite Again.

Maude: "Charlie Wiggins sent me a beautiful mirror for a birthday present." Clara: "That accounts for the funny question he asked me the other evening." Maude: "What did he ask you?" Clara: "If a woman ever got too old to be pleased with a looking-glass."

Foremost In His Thoughts.

"I suppose, colonel," said the beautiful grass widow, "that there often are moments when you wish you were again on the battlefield, thrilled by the roar and fired by the excitement of war?" "Yes," he answered, looking round eagerly for a way of escape, and seeing none, "even now the old feeling comes back to me."

What It Will Come to.

Visitor: "Rock-a-bye, baby, on the tree top——" Up-to-date baby: "Excuse me, madam, but I consider arboreal oscillation extremely dangerous."

And He Stayed On.

Fiancee: "George, can't you see what the face of the clock tells you?" Mr. Late-bird: "Yes, darling, but what the face of the clock tells me your face makes me forget!"

Hard Lines!

Frank Fairleigh: "Yes, Miss Antique, to be frank with you——" Miss Antique (with a chirp): "Oh, Mr. Fairleigh, of course you may be Frank with me; but this is so sudden."

A Secret Society.

Lulu: "We girls are getting up a secret society of our own." George: "Indeed! What's the object?" Lulu: 'I don't know yet, but I'll tell you all about it after I'm nitiated."

Very Remarkable.

Ada: "Flo was just going down for the third time when Dr. Watson dived off the yacht and caught her." Grace: "And saved her life! Wasn't that wonderful?" Ada: "Yes, for a doctor."

No Sympathy Needed.

Millionaire: "My dear Prince, I am so sorry you are engaged to my daughter. The crash has come, and I am ruined." Prince: "Oh, don't you worry about me, my dear sir; I can easily get another heiress."

Cause For Suspicion.

"Poor Mrs. Jaysmith," exclaimed Mrs. Gargoyle. "Her husband must treat her shamefully." "What makes you say that?" asked Mrs. Gummey, "she never complains." "I know it. That is what makes me suspicious."

Thankful For Small Mercies.

"Did you say there were accidentals in that music?" asked the father of the young lady at the piano. "A great many," answered his daughter. "Well, it's a great comfort to know that you were not doing it intentionally!"

A Nasty Knock.

Envious Young Man (speaking of favoured rival): "Yes, George is clever and handsome, but he is abominably conceited." Sharp Young Lady: "But, Mr. Dumley, if you were handsome and clever would not you be conceited?"

So He Did.

Mr. Hopeful: "Miss Wellthy, I adore you. Will you not be my wife?" Miss Wellthy (haughtily): "The idea of you proposing to a girl in my station! You should know better." Mr. Hopeful: "I do know better, but no richer."

Of Course They Don't.

"How lucky," said Mrs. Nuwed, "that I happened to pass that cigar sale this morning! These cigars are exactly the shade of George's new smoking jacket, and the smart little green bands round them will go with the lining beautifully. Men never think of these little things!"

Then He Collapsed.

Footinitt (energetically helping at bazaar): "Won't you take a share in a raffle for this cushion?" Lady: "Oh, no, thanks!" Footinitt: "Of course, it's rather useless and gaudy, and all that, you know; and personally I think the design rotten. But do take a share!" Visitor: "No, thanks! I made it!"

She Was Forgiven.

Mistress (to nurse-girl): "I hear that you are seen quite often speaking to the policemen in the park. I cannot allow that." Artful Maid: "I can't help it, ma'am. All the policemen in the park admire the baby so much—they will stop the perambulator to speak to him. They all say that he's the prettiest baby that comes into the park."

Digitized by Google

START THIS SPLENDID SERIAL TO-DAY

A Story of Love and Crime.

By ARNOLD BENNETT.

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters.

Mr. Theodore Racksole, American multi-millionaire, arrives at the Grand Babylon Hotel, and in consequence of an altercation with Jules, the all-important head waiter, he purchases the hotel for £400,000, with the intention of dismissing Jules from the staff.

Reginald Dimmock, English companion to Prince Aribert of Posen, dines the same evening with Racksole, who suspects that there is some sort of secret understanding between the young equerry and Jules.

The millionaire that night retires to bed very late, and is greatly surprised to see the waiter emerge from a room which he believes to be occupied by his daughter Nella.

Investigating the matter, Racksole finds that Dimmock is inhabiting the rooms, he having volunteered to change apartments with Nella, as a window of those she had intended to occupy had been broken by a stone flung from the outside. The millionaire accepts the explanation, although the circumstances of the case worry him considerably.

The next morning he learns that Miss Spencer, the bureau clerk, has left the hotel during the night, without giving any warning whatsoever.

Racksole dismisses Jules the first thing in the morning, forbidding him to enter the hotel again. Prince Aribert of Posen arrives, and Nella recognises him as a gentleman she has met in Paris as "Count Steenbock."

Dimmock is seen to drop dead in the quadrangle of the hotel. The cause of death is mysterious. More mysterious still is the way in which Dimmock's dead body disappears during the night—a coincidence being that Racksole discovers Jules in the hotel precincts.

Prince Aribert is in great grief, and tells Nella that he has been informed that his nephew, Prince Eugen, the hereditary Grand Duke of Posen, who is almost of an age with himself, has disappeared in Ostend or the neighbourhood. Aribert returns to the Continent at once.

On the morning following the Prince's departure, Miss Spencer comes to the Grand Babylon disguised as the Baroness Zerlinski. Nella sees her take a note out of a cream puff that is served to her at lunch.

Suddenly the identity of the Baroness as Miss Spencer strikes Nella. Discovering that she has set out for Ostend, Nella decides to follow her, and tracks her to a house in that town. Boldly confronting Miss Spencer with a revolver, she learns various important facts about the Dimmock mystery; but by a trick, Miss Spencer eventually bests Nella.

The latter faints, and, awakening, finds herself on board a yacht. Jules is approaching her.

The erstwhile waiter tells Nella that he has her in his power, but that he will release her if she will consent to marry him.

Nella boldly refuses, and suddenly Prince Aribert springs out of a dinghy a few feet away and knocks Jules down. They both eventually leave the yacht, and reach Ostend again, where Nella wires to her father to come to them.

A Mr. Sampson Levi, stockbroker, seeks an interview with Theodore Racksole at the Grand Babylon. The two men are attracted to one another, and exchange confidences. Racksole tells the stockbroker of the occurrences at the hotel, and Mr. Sampson Levi explains how he had an appointment with Prince Eugen in order to arrange the terms of a State loan. The Prince was wishing to marry Princess Anna of Eckstein-Schwartzburg, but could not do so until he had paid off his debts, amounting to one million pounds.

The disappearance of the Prince had complicated matters considerably, for the day had arrived when the money was to be paid over. If Prince Eugen did not appear he could not have the money.

Suddenly an idea strikes Racksole. Another pauper prince might be wishing to marry Princess Anna, and therefore it would be to his interests to stop the loan. Hence, perhaps, the solution to the disappearance of Prince Eugen.

That night Racksole discovers Rocco in the State bathroom embalming the body of Reginald Dimmock! Racksole intends to hand the chef over to the police, but by a clever ruse Rocco escapes. The next morning the millionaire receives Nella's telegram summoning him to Ostend. He at once journeys thither, and is told the whole story of Nella's adventure. When the two men are alone, Aribert tells Racksole that he has seen in Ostend a well-known Berlin actress whom he believes is concerned in the mystery of Prince Eugen's disappearance.

Digitized by Google

THIS WEEK'S INSTALMENT.

SIXTEENTH CHAPTER.
The Woman with the Red Hat.

"BUT how does this theory square with the murder of Reginald Dimmock?" asked Racksole.

"It does not square with it. My idea is that the murder of poor Dimmock and the disappearance of my nephew are entirely unconnected—unless, indeed, this Berlin actress is playing into the hands of the murderers. I had not thought of that."

"Then what do you propose to do to-night?"

"I propose to enter the house which Miss Racksole entered last night and to find out something definite."

"I concur," said Racksole. "I shall heartily enjoy it. But let me tell you, Prince, and pardon me for speaking bluntly, your surmise is incorrect. I would wager a hundred thousand dollars that Prince Eugen has been kidnapped."

"What grounds have you for being so sure?"

"Ah!" said Racksole, "that is a long story. Let me begin by asking you this. Are you aware that your nephew, Prince Eugen, owes a million of money?"

"A million of money!" cried Prince Aribert astonished. "It is impossible!"

"Nevertheless, he does," said Racksole calmly. Then he told him all he had learnt from Mr. Sampson Levi.

"What have you to say to that?" Racksole ended. Prince Aribert made no reply.

"What have you to say to that?" Racksole insisted.

"Merely that Eugen is ruined, even if he is alive."

"Not at all," Racksole returned with cheerfulness. "Not at all. We shall see about that. The special thing that I want to know just now from you is this: Has any previous application ever been made for the hand of the Princess Anna?"

"Yes. Last year. The King of Bosnia sued for it, but his proposal was declined."

"Why?"

"Because my nephew was considered to be a more suitable match for her."

"Not because the personal character of his Majesty of Bosnia is scarcely of the brightest?"

"No. Unfortunately, it is usually impossible to consider questions of personal character when a royal match is concerned."

"Then, if for any reason the marriage of Princess Anna with your nephew was frustrated, the King of Bosnia would have a fair chance in that quarter?"

"He would. The political aspect of things would be perfectly satisfactory."

"Thanks!" said Racksole. "I will wager another hundred thousand dollars that someone in Bosnia—I don't accuse the King himself—is at the bottom of this business. The methods of Balkan politicians have always been half-Oriental. Let us go."

"Where?"

"To this precious house of Nella's adventure."

"But surely it is too early?"

"So it is," said Racksole, "and we shall want a few things, too. For instance, a dark lantern. I think I will go out and forage for a lantern."

"And a revolver?" suggested Prince Aribert.

"Does it mean revolvers?" The millionaire laughed.

"It may come to that."

"Here you are, then, my friend," said Racksole, and he pulled one out of his hip-pocket. "And yours?"

"I," said the Prince, "I have your daughter's."

"The dickens you have!" murmured Racksole to himself.

It was then half-past nine. They decided that it would be impolitic to begin their operations till after midnight. There were three hours to spare.

"Let us go and see the gambling," Racksole suggested. "We might encounter the Berlin lady."

The suggestion, in the first instance, was not made seriously, but it appeared to both men that they might do worse than spend the intervening time in the gorgeous saloon of the Kursaal, where, in the season, as much money is won and lost as at Monte Carlo. It was striking ten o'clock as they entered the rooms. There was a large company present—a company which included some of the most notorious persons in Europe. In that multifarious assemblage all were equal. The electric light shone coldly and impartially on the just and on the unjust, on the fool and the knave, on the European and the Asiatic. As usual, women monopolised the best places at the tables. The scene was familiar enough to Prince Aribert, who had witnessed it frequently at Monaco, but Theodore Racksole had never before entered any European gaming palace; he had only the haziest idea of the rules of play, and he was at once interested. For some time they watched the play at the table which happened to be nearest to them. Racksole never moved his lips. With eyes glued on the table, and ears open for every remark of the players and the croupier, he took his first lesson in roulette. He saw a mere youth win fifteen thousand francs, which were stolen in the most barefaced manner by a rouged girl scarcely older than the youth; he saw two old gamesters stake their coins, and lose, and walk quietly out of the place; he saw the bank win fifty thousand francs at a single turn.

"This is rather good fun," he said at length; "but the stakes are too small to make it really exciting. I'll try my luck, just for the experience. I'm bound to win."

"Why?" asked the Prince.

"Because I always do, in games of chance," Racksole answered with gay confidence. "It is my fate. Then to-night, you must remember, I shall be a beginner, and you know the tyro's luck."

In ten minutes the croupier of that table was obliged to suspend operations pending the arrival of a further supply of coin.

"What did I tell you?" said Racksole, leading the way to another table further up the room. A hundred curious glances went after him. One old woman, whose gay attire suggested a false youthfulness, begged him in French to stake a five-franc piece for her. She offered him the coin. He took it, and gave her a hundred-franc note in exchange. She clutched the crisp, rustling paper, and with hysterical haste scuttled back to her own table.

At the second table there was a considerable air of excitement. In the forefront of the players was a woman in a low-cut evening dress of black silk and a large red picture hat. Her age appeared to be about twenty-eight; she had dark eyes, full lips, and a distinctly Jewish nose. She was handsome, but her beauty was of that forbidding, sinister order which is often called Junoesque. This woman was the centre of attraction. People said to each other that she had won a hundred and sixty thousand francs that day at the tables.

"You were right," Prince Aribert whispered to Theodore Racksole; "that is the Berlin lady."

"The dickens she is! Has she seen you? Will she know you?"

"She would probably know me, but she hasn't looked up yet."

"Keep behind her, then. I propose to find her a little occupation."

By dint of a carefully-exercised diplomacy, Racksole manœuvred himself into a seat opposite to the lady in the red hat. The fame of his success at the other table had followed him, and people regarded him as a serious and formidable player. In the first turn the lady put a thousand francs on double zero; Racksole put a hundred on number nineteen and a thousand on the odd numbers. Nineteen won. Racksole received four thousand four hundred francs. Nine times in succession Racksole backed number nineteen and the odd numbers. Nine times the lady backed double zero. Nine times Racksole won and the lady lost. The other players, perceiving that the affair had resolved itself into a duel, stood back for the most part and watched those two. Prince Aribert never stirred from his position behind the great red hat. The game continued. Racksole lost trifles from time to time, but ninety-nine hundredths of the luck was with him. As an English spectator at the table remarked, "He couldn't do wrong." When midnight struck the lady in the red hat was reduced to a thousand francs. Then she fell into a winning vein for half an hour, but at one o'clock her resources were exhausted. Of the hundred and sixty thousand francs which she was reputed to have had early in the evening, Racksole held about ninety thousand, and the bank had the rest. It was a calamity for the Juno of the red hat. She jumped up, stamped her foot, and hurried from the room.

Digitized by Google

At a discreet distance Racksole and the Prince pursued her.

"It might be well to ascertain her movements," said Racksole.

Outside, in the glare of the great arc lights, and within sound of the surf which beats always at the very foot of the Kursaal, the Juno of the red hat summoned a fiacre and drove rapidly away. Racksole and the Prince took an open carriage and started in pursuit. They had not, however, travelled more than half a mile when Prince Aribert stopped the carriage, and, bidding Racksole get out, paid the driver and dismissed him.

"I feel sure I know where she is going," he explained, "and it will be better for us to follow on foot."

"You mean she is making for the scene of last night's affair?" said Racksole.

"Exactly. We shall—what you call, kill two birds with one stone."

Prince Aribert's guess was correct. The lady's carriage stopped in front of the house where Nella Racksole and Miss Spencer had had their interview on the previous evening, and the lady vanished into the building just as the two men appeared at the end of the street. Instead of proceeding along that street, the Prince led Racksole to the lane which gave on to the backs of the houses, and he counted the houses as they went up the lane. In a few minutes they had burglariously climbed over a wall, and crept, with infinite caution, up a long, narrow piece of ground—half-garden, half-paved yard, till they crouched under a window—a window which was shielded by curtains, but which had been left open a little.

"Listen," said the Prince, in his lightest whisper; "they are talking."

"Who?"

"The Berlin lady and Miss Spencer. I'm sure it's Miss Spencer's voice."

Racksole boldly pushed the French window a little wider open, and put his ear to the aperture, through which came a beam of yellow light.

"Take my place," he whispered to the Prince; "they're talking German. You'll understand better."

Silently they exchanged places under the window, and the Prince listened intently.

"Then you refuse?" Miss Spencer's visitor was saying.

There was no answer from Miss Spencer.

"Not even a thousand francs? I tell you I've lost the whole twenty-five thousand."

Again no answer.

"Then I'll tell the whole story," the lady went on, in an angry rush of words. "I did what I promised to do. I enticed him here, and you've got him safe in your vile cellar, poor little man, and you won't give me a paltry thousand francs."

"You have already had your price." The words were Miss Spencer's. They fell cold and calm on the night air.

"I want another thousand."

"I haven't it."

"Then we'll see."

Prince Aribert heard a rustle of flying skirts; then another movement—a door banged, and the beam of light through the aperture of the window suddenly disappeared. He pushed the window wide open. The room was in darkness, and apparently empty.

"Now for that lantern of yours," he said eagerly to Theodore Racksole, after he had translated to him the conversation of the two women.

Racksole produced the dark lantern from the capacious pocket of his dust coat, and lighted it. The ray flashed about the ground.

"What is that?" exclaimed Prince Aribert with a swift cry, pointing to the ground. The lantern threw its light on a perpendicular grating at their feet, through which could be discerned a cellar. They both knelt down, and peered into the subterranean chamber. On a broken chair a young man sat listlessly with closed eyes, his head leaning heavily forward on his chest. In the feeble light of the lantern he had the livid and ghastly appearance of a dead man.

"Who can it be?" said Racksole.

"It is Eugen," was the Prince's low answer.

SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER.

The Release of Prince Eugen.

"Eugen," Prince Aribert called softly. At the sound of his own name the young man in the cellar feebly raised his head and stared up at the grating which separated him from his two rescuers. But his features showed no recognition. He gazed in an aimless, vague, silly manner for a few seconds, his eyes blinking under the glare of the lantern, and then his head slowly drooped again on to his chest. He was dressed in a dark tweed travelling suit, and Racksole observed that one sleeve—the left—was torn across the upper part of the cuff, and that there were stains of dirt on the left shoulder. A soiled linen collar, which had lost all its starch and was half unbuttoned, partially incircled the captive's neck; his brown boots were unlaced; a cap, a handkerchief, a portion of a watch-chain, and a few gold coins lay on the floor. Racksole flashed a lantern into the corners of the cellar, but he could discover no other furniture except the chair on which the Hereditary Prince of Posen sat, and a small deal table on which were a plate and a cup.

"Eugen," cried Prince Aribert once more, but this time his forlorn nephew made no response whatever, and then Aribert added in a low voice to Racksole: "Perhaps he cannot see us clearly."

"But he must surely recognise your voice," said Racksole, in a hard, gloomy tone.

There was a pause, and the two men above ground looked at each other hesitatingly. Each knew that they must enter that cellar and get Prince Eugen out of it, and each was somehow afraid to take the next step.

"Thank God he is not dead!" said Aribert.

"He may be worse than dead!" Racksole replied.

"Worse than—— What do you mean?"

"I mean—he may be mad."

"Come," Aribert almost shouted, with a sudden access of energy—a wild impulse for action. And, snatching the lantern from Racksole, he rushed into the dark room where they they had heard the conversation of Miss Spencer and the lady in the red hat. For a moment Racksole did not stir from the threshold of the window. "Come," Prince Aribert repeated, and there was an imperious command in his utterance. "What are you afraid of?"

"I don't know," said Racksole, feeling stupid and queer; "I don't know." Then he marched heavily after Prince Aribert into the room. On the mantelpiece were a couple of candles which had been blown out, and, in a mechanical, unthinking way, Racksole lighted them, and the two men glanced round the room. It presented no peculiar features; it was just an ordinary room, rather small, rather mean, rather shabby, with an ugly wall-paper and ugly pictures in ugly frames. Thrown over a chair was a man's evening-dress jacket. The door was closed. Prince Aribert turned the knob,, but he could not open it.

"It's locked," he said. "Evidently they know we're here."

"Nonsense," said Racksole brusquely; "how can they know?" And, taking hold of the knob, he violently shook the door, and it opened. "I told you it wasn't locked," he added, and this small success of opening the door seemed to steady the man. It was a curious psychological effect, this terrorising (for it amounted to that) of two courageous, full-grown men by the mere apparition of a helpless creature in a cellar. Gradually they both recovered from it. The next moment they were out in the passage which led to the front door of the house. The front door stood open. They looked into the street, up and down, but there was not a soul in sight. The street, lighted by three gas-lamps only, seemed strangely sinister and mysterious.

Digitized by Google

"She has gone, that's clear," said Racksole, meaning the woman with the red hat.

"And Miss Spencer after her, do you think?" questioned Aribert.

"No. She would stay. She would never dare to leave. Let us find the cellar steps."

The cellar steps were happily not difficult to discover, for in moving a pace backwards Prince Aribert had a narrow escape of precipitating himself to the bottom of them. The lantern showed that they were built on a curve. Silently Racksole resumed possession of the lantern and went first, the Prince close behind him. At the foot was a short passage, and in this passage crouched the figure of a woman. Her eyes threw back the rays of the lantern, shining like a cat's at midnight. Then, as the men went nearer, they saw that it was Miss Spencer who barred their way. She seemed half kneeling on the stone floor, and in one hand she held what at first appeared to be a dagger, but which proved to be nothing more romantic than a rather long bread-knife.

"I heard you, I heard you!" she exclaimed. "Get back; you mustn't come here."

There was a desperate and dangerous look on her face, and her form shook with scarcely controlled passionate energy.

"Now, see here, Miss Spencer," Racksole said calmly, "I guess we've had enough of this fandango. You'd better get up and clear out, or we'll just have to drag you off."

He went calmly up to her, the lantern in his hand. Without another word she struck the knife into his arm, and the lantern fell extinguished. Racksole gave a cry, rather of angry surprise than of pain, and retreated a few steps. In the darkness they could still perceive the glint of her eyes.

"I told you you mustn't come here," the woman said. "Now get back."

Racksole positively laughed. It was a queer laugh, but he laughed, and he could not help it. The idea of this woman, this bureau clerk, stopping his progress and that of Prince Aribert by means of a bread-knife aroused his sense of humour. He struck a match, relighted the candle, and faced Miss Spencer once more.

"I'll do it again," she said, with a note of hard resolve.

"Oh, no, you won't, my girl," said Racksole; and he pulled out his revolver, cocked it, and raised his hand.

"Put down that plaything of yours," he said firmly.

"No," she answered.

"I shall shoot."

She pressed her lips together.

"I shall shoot," he repeated. "One—two—three."

Bang, bang! He had fired twice, purposely missing her.

Miss Spencer never blanched. Racksole was tremendously surprised—and he would have been a thousandfold more surprised could he have contrasted her behaviour now with her abject terror on the previous evening when Nella had threatened her.

"You've got a bit of pluck," he said, "but it won't help you. Why won't you let us pass?"

As a matter of fact, pluck was just what she had not, really. She had merely subordinated one terror to another. She was desperately afraid of Racksole's revolver, but she was much more afraid of something else.

Eugen—poisoned by his own hand—lay 'twixt life and death! Would he recover or not? This dramatic episode will be related in a forthcoming instalment of this splendid serial.

Digitized by Google

"Why won't you let us pass?"

"I daren't," she said, with a plaintive tremor; "Tom put me in charge."

That was all. The men could see tears running down her poor wrinkled face. Theodore Racksole began to take off his light overcoat.

"I see I must take my coat off to you," he said, and he almost smiled. Then, with a quick movement, he threw the coat over Miss Spencer's head and flew at her, seizing both her arms, while Prince Aribert assisted.

Her struggles ceased—she was beaten.

"That's all right," said Racksole; "I could never have used that revolver—to mean business with it, of course."

They carried her, unresisting, upstairs and on to the upper floor, where they locked her in a bedroom. She lay on the bed as if exhausted.

"Now for my poor Eugen," said Prince Aribert.

"Don't you think we'd better search the house first?" Racksole suggested; "it will be safer to know just how we stand. We can't afford any ambushes or things of that kind, you know."

The Prince agreed, and they searched the house from top to bottom, but found no one. Then, having locked the front door and the French window of the sitting-room, they proceeded again to the cellar.

Here a new obstacle confronted them. The cellar door was, of course, locked; there was no sign of a key, and it appeared to be a heavy door. They were compelled to return to the bedroom where Miss Spencer was incarcerated, in order to demand the key of the cellar from her. She still lay without movement on the bed.

"Tom's got it," she replied faintly, to their question; "Tom's got it, I swear to you. He took it for safety."

"Then how do you feed your prisoner?" Racksole asked sharply.

"Through the grating," she answered.

Both men shuddered. They felt she was speaking the truth. For the third time they went to the cellar door. In vain Racksole thrust himself against it; he could do no more than shake it.

"Let's try both together," said Prince Aribert. "Now!" There was a crack. "Again," said Prince Aribert. There was another crack, and then the upper hinge gave way. The rest was easy. Over the wreck of the door they entered Prince Eugen's prison.

The captive still sat on his chair. The terrific noise and bustle of breaking down the door seemed not to have aroused him from his lethargy, but when Prince Aribert spoke to him in German he looked at his uncle.

"Will you not come with us, Eugen?" said Prince Aribert; "you needn't stay here any longer, you know."

"Leave me alone," was the strange reply; "leave me alone. What do you want?"

"We are here to get you out of this scrape," said Aribert gently. Racksole stood aside.

"Who is that fellow?" said Eugen sharply.

"That is my friend, Mr. Racksole, an Englishman—or, rather, I should say, an American—to whom we owe a great deal. Come and have supper, Eugen."

"I won't," answered Eugen doggedly. "I'm waiting here for her. You didn't think anyone had kept me here, did you, against my will? I tell you I'm waiting for her. She said she'd come."

"Who is she?" Aribert asked, humouring him.

"She? Why, you know! I forgot, of course, you don't know. You mustn't ask. Don't pry, Uncle Aribert. She was wearing a red hat."

"I'll take you to her, my dear Eugen." Prince Aribert put his hands on the other's shoulder, but Eugen shook him off violently, stood up, and then sat down again.

Aribert looked at Racksole, and they both looked at Prince Eugen. The latter's face was flushed, and Racksole observed that the left pupil was more dilated than the right. The man stared, muttered odd, fragmentary scraps of sentences, now grumbling, now whining.

"His mind is unhinged," Racksole whispered in English.

"Hush!" said Prince Aribert. "He understands English." But Prince Eugen took no notice of the brief colloquy.

"We had better get him upstairs, somehow," said Racksole.

"Yes," Aribert assented. "Eugen, the lady with the red hat, the lady you are waiting for, is upstairs. She has sent us down to ask you to come up. Won't you come?"

"Himmel!" the poor fellow exclaimed, with a kind of weak anger. "Why did you not say this before?"

He rose, staggered towards Aribert, and fell headlong on the floor. He had swooned. The two men raised him, carried him up the stone steps, and laid him with infinite care on the sofa. He lay, breathing queerly through the nostrils, his eyes closed, his fingers contracted; every now and then a convulsion ran through his frame.

"One of us must fetch a doctor," said Prince Aribert.

"I will," said Racksole. At that moment there was a quick, curt rap on the French window, and both Racksole and the Prince glanced round, startled. A girl's face was pressed against the large window-pane. It was Nella's. Racksole unfastened the catch, and she entered.

"I have found you," she said lightly; "you might have told me. I couldn't sleep. I inquired from the hotel-folks if you had retired, and they said no; so I slipped out. I guessed where you were." Racksole interrupted her with a question as to what she meant by this escapade, but she stopped him with a careless gesture. "What's this?" She pointed to the form on the sofa.

"That is my nephew, Prince Eugen," said Aribert.

"Hurt?" she inquired coldly. "I hope not."

"He is ill," said Racksole; "his brain is turned."

Nella began to examine the unconscious Prince with the expert movements of a girl who had passed through the best hospital course to be obtained in New York.

"He has got brain fever," she said. "That is all, but it will be enough. Do you know if there is a bed anywhere in this remarkable house?"

EIGHTEENTH CHAPTER.

In the Night-time.

"He must on no account be moved," said the dark little Belgian doctor, whose eyes seemed to peer so quizzically through his spectacles; and he said it with much positiveness.

That pronouncement rather settled their plans for them. It was certainly a professional triumph for Nella, who, previous to the doctor's arrival, had told them the very same thing. Considerable argument had passed before the doctor was sent for. Prince Aribert was for keeping the whole affair a deep secret among their three selves. Theodore Racksole agreed so far, but he suggested further that at no matter what risk they should transport the patient over to England at once. Racksole had an idea that he should feel safer in that hotel of his, and better able to deal with any situation that might arise. Nella scorned the idea. In her quality of an amateur nurse, she assured them that Prince Eugen was much more seriously ill than either of them suspected, and she urged that they should take absolute possession of the house, and keep possession till Prince Eugen was convalescent.

Digitized by Google

"But what about the Spencer female?" Racksole had said.

"Keep her where she is. Keep her a prisoner. And hold the house against all comers. If Jules should come back, simply defy him to enter—that is all. There are two of you, so you must keep an eye on the former occupiers, if they return, and on Miss Spencer, while I nurse the patient. But first you must send for a doctor."

"Doctor!" Prince Aribert had said, alarmed. "Will it not be necessary to make some awkward explanation to the doctor?"

"Not at all!" she replied. "Why should it be? In a place like Ostend doctors are far too discreet to ask questions; they see too much to retain their curiosity. Besides, do you want your nephew to die?"

Both the men were somewhat taken aback by the girl's sagacious grasp of the situation, and it came about that they began to obey her like subordinates. She told her father to sally forth in search of a doctor, and he went. She gave Prince Aribert certain other orders, and he promptly executed them.

By the evening of the following day everything was going smoothly. The doctor came and departed several times, and sent medicine, and seemed fairly optimistic as to the issue of the illness. An old woman had been induced to come in and cook and clean. Miss Spencer was kept out of sight on the attic floor, pending some decision as to what to do with her. And no one outside the house had asked any questions. The inhabitants of that particular street must have been accustomed to strange behaviour on the part of their neighbours, unaccountable appearances and disappearances, strange flittings and arrivals. This strong-minded and active trio—Racksole, Nella, and Prince Aribert—might have been the lawful and accustomed tenants of the house, for any outward evidence to the contrary.

On the afternoon of the third day Prince Eugen was distinctly and seriously worse. Nella had sat up with him the previous night and throughout the day. Her father had spent the morning at the hotel and Prince Aribert had kept watch. The two men were never absent from the house at the same time, and one of them always did duty as sentinel at night. On this afternoon Prince Aribert and Nella sat together in the patient's bedroom. The doctor had just left. Theodore Racksole was downstairs reading the New York Herald. The Prince and Nella were near the window, which looked on to the back-garden. It was a queer, shabby, little bedroom to shelter the august body of a European personage like Prince Eugen of Posen. Curiously enough, both Nella and her father, ardent democrats though they were, had been somehow impressed by the royalty and importance of the fever-stricken Prince—impressed as they had never been by Aribert. They had both felt that here, under their care, was a species of individuality quite new to them, and different from anything they had previously encountered. Even the gestures and tones of his delirium had an air of abrupt yet condescending command—an imposing mixture of suavity and haughtiness. As for Nella, she had been first struck by the beautiful "E" over a crown on the sleeves of his linen, and by the signet-ring on his pale, emaciated hand. After all, these trifling outward signs are at least as effective as others of deeper but less obtrusive significance. The Racksoles, too, duly marked the attitude of Prince Aribert to his nephew: it was at once paternal and reverential; it disclosed clearly that Prince Aribert continued, in spite of everything, to regard his nephew as his sovereign lord and master, as a being surrounded by a natural and inevitable pomp and awe. This attitude, at the beginning, seemed false and unreal to the Americans; it seemed to them to be assumed; but gradually they came to perceive that they were mistaken, and that though America might have cast out "the monarchical superstition," nevertheless that "superstition" had vigorously survived in another part of the world.

The Strange Tricks It Does.

AT first this seems like a strange thing; almost an absurd thing. Can you account for it? "My case puzzled me," says Mrs. Martha Beverley, "and puzzled others. I had a good appetite and ate plenty of nourishing food, yet I lost flesh and got weaker all the time." The lady says she had suffered from indigestion and debility for twenty years. What do we mean by debility? Is it a disease? No, it is an effect of a disease.

"Food did not strengthen me," says Mrs. Beverley, "but often gave me much pain across the chest and between the shoulders. Often, when I stooped down, I could hardly straighten myself up again. As the years rolled by I got worse, and was always in pain after eating. My body would swell with wind and I had fearful griping in the stomach. Sometimes they made me faint dead away. For months I knew not what it was to have a good night's sleep. My breath was short and I was troubled with palpitation of the heart. To live was to carry a load almost greater than I could bear. I was pale as a ghost and was scarcely more than bones covered with skin. Now, however, thanks to Mother Seigel's Syrup, I am well and strong again.

"A friend (who was a friend indeed) argued its merits to me until I gave up and tried it. Mother Seigel's Syrup first cured my indigestion and all the pains, aches, and ailments that were caused by it. Then it made me profit by the food I ate, so I gained flesh fast; and with that came new life and strength. I used Mother Seigel's Syrup regularly for six months and it delivered me completely from a disease that had clung to me for twenty years, and came near laying me in the grave. What I would say to sufferers is this:—Use Mother Seigel's Syrup and keep on using it; don't doubt or get discouraged. Where one takes it now a thousand should take it."

When she made that statement on July 18th, 1900—four years ago—Mrs. Beverley lived at 102 Lumley Street, Middlesboro'. On February 18th, 1904—this year—at her new home, 154, Abingdon Road, Middlesboro', she made and signed this statement:

"Referring to my testimonial of four years ago, to the merits of Mother Seigel's Syrup, I am pleased to inform you that I have enjoyed good health ever since. I still take a dose occasionally on the principle that prevention is better than cure; but the old complaint never troubles me now. For twenty years I had endured the tortures of indigestion when Mother Seigel's Syrup restored me to health. From little beginnings it had come to be the haunting menace of my life. My doctor declared I should never recover, but he was wrong. Mother Seigel's Syrup restored me to perfect health, and I feel that I can never praise it too highly."

Indigestion does more tricks than any other necromancer. Watch it and use the Syrup immediately.

INDIGESTION

"Six or seven years ago," says Mrs. Mary Northey, 13 Hull St., Newcastle-on-Tyne, "I wrote you of the cure made in me by Mother Seigel's Syrup. I had suffered for years, and in 1897 was four months in bed when I began using the Syrup. Several doctors had failed to help me. My trouble was indigestion. Mother Seigel's Syrup saved my life. I have ever since been as well as any woman could wish to be."

YIELDS TO MOTHER SEIGEL'S SYRUP.

Price 1/1½ and 2/6 per Bottle.

Digitized by Google

"You and Mr. Racksole have been extraordinarily kind to me," said Prince Aribert very quietly, after the two had sat some time in silence.

"Why? How?" she asked unaffectedly. "We are interested in this affair ourselves, you know. It began at our hotel—you mustn't forget that, Prince."

"I don't," he said. "I forget nothing. But I cannot help feeling that I have led you into a strange entanglement. Why should you and Mr. Racksole be here—you who are supposed to be on a holiday!—hiding in a strange house in a foreign country, subject to all sorts of annoyances and all sorts of risks, simply because I am anxious to avoid scandal, to avoid any sort of talk, in connection with my misguided nephew? It is nothing to you that the Hereditary Prince of Posen should be liable to a public disgrace. What will it matter to you if the throne of Posen becomes the laughing-stock of Europe?"

"I really don't know, Prince," Nella smiled roguishly. "But we Americans have a habit of going right through with anything we have begun."

"Ah!" he said, "who knows how this thing will end? All our trouble, our anxieties, our watchfulness, may come to nothing. I tell you that when I see Eugen lying there, and think that we cannot learn his story until he recovers, I am ready to go mad. We might be arranging things, making matters smooth, preparing for the future, if only we knew—knew what he can tell us. I tell you that I am ready to go mad. If anything should happen to you, Miss Racksole, I would kill myself."

"But why?" she questioned. "Supposing, that is, that anything could happen to me—which it can't."

"Because I have dragged you into this," he replied, gazing at her. "It is nothing to you. You are only being kind."

"How do you know it is nothing to me, Prince?" she asked him quickly.

Just then the sick man made a convulsive movement, and Nella flew to the bed and soothed him. From the head of the bed she looked over at Prince Aribert, and he returned her bright, excited glance. She was in her travelling-frock, with a large white Belgian apron tied over it. Large dark circles of fatigue and sleeplessness surrounded her eyes, and to the Prince her cheek seemed hollow and thin; her hair lay thick over the temples, half-covering the ears. Aribert gave no answer to her query—merely gazed at her with melancholy intensity.

"I think I will go and rest," she said at last. "You will know all about the medicine."

"Sleep well," he said, as he softly opened the door for her. And then he was alone with Eugen.

It was his turn that night to watch, for they still half-expected some strange, sudden visit, or onslaught, or move of one kind or another, from Jules. Racksole slept in the parlour on the ground floor. Nella had the front bedroom on the first floor; Miss Spencer was immured in the attic; the last-named lady had been singularly quiet and incurious, taking her food from Nella and asking no questions; the old woman went at nights to her own abode in the purlieus of the harbour. Hour after hour Aribert sat silent by his nephew's bedside, attending mechanically to his wants, and every now and then gazing hard into the vacant, anguished face, as if trying to extort from that mask the secrets which it held. Aribert was tortured by the idea that if he could have only half an hour's, only a quarter of an hour's, rational speech with Prince Eugen, all might be cleared up and put right, and by the fact that that rational talk was absolutely impossible on Eugen's part until the fever had run its course.

As the minutes crept on to midnight the watcher, made nervous by the intense, electrical atmosphere which seems always to surround a person who is dangerously ill, grew more and more a prey to vague and terrible apprehensions. His mind dwelt hysterically on the most fatal possibilities. He wondered what would occur if by any ill-chance Eugen should die in that bed—how he would explain the affair to Posen and to the Emperor, how he would justify himself.

He saw himself being tried for murder, sentenced (him—a Prince of the blood!), led to the scaffold—a scene unparalleled in Europe for over a century! Then he gazed anew at the sick man, and thought he saw death in every drawn feature of that agonised face. He could have screamed aloud. His ears heard a peculiar resonant boom. He started—it was nothing but the city clock striking twelve. But there was another sound—a mysterious shuffle at the door. He listened; then jumped from his chair. Nothing now! Nothing! But still he felt drawn to the door, and after what seemed an interminable interval he went and opened it, his heart beating furiously. Nella lay in a heap on the door-mat. She was fully dressed, but had apparently lost consciousness. He clutched at her slender body, picked her up, carried her to the chair by the fire-place, and laid her in it. He had forgotten all about Eugen.

"What is it, my angel?" he whispered, and then he kissed her—kissed her twice. He could only look at her; he did not know what to do to succour her.

At last she opened her eyes and sighed.

"Where am I?" she asked vaguely, in a tremulous tone. "Ah!" as she recognised him. "Is it you? Did I do anything silly? Did I faint?"

"What has happened? Were you ill?" he questioned anxiously. He was kneeling at her feet, holding her hand tight.

"I saw Jules by the side of my bed," she murmured; "I'm sure I saw him; he laughed at me. I had not undressed. I sprang up, frightened, but he had gone, and then I ran downstairs—to you."

"You were dreaming," he soothed her.

"Was I?"

"You must have been. I have not heard a sound. No one could have entered. But if you like I will wake Mr. Racksole."

"Perhaps I was dreaming," she admitted. "How foolish!"

"You were over-tired," he said, still unconsciously holding her hand. They gazed at each other. She smiled at him.

"You kissed me," she said suddenly, and he blushed red and stood up before her. "Why did you kiss me?"

"Ah! Miss Racksole," he murmured, hurrying the words out. "Forgive me. It is unforgivable, but forgive me. I was overpowered by my feelings. I did not know what I was doing."

"Why did you kiss me?" she repeated.

"Because—Nella! I love you. I have no right to say it!"

"Why have you no right to say it?"

"If Eugen dies, I shall owe a duty to Posen—I shall be its ruler."

"Well!" she said calmly, with an adorable confidence. "Papa is worth forty millions. Would you not abdicate?"

"Ah!" he gave a low cry. "Will you force me to say these things? I could not shirk my duty to Posen, and the reigning Prince of Posen can only marry a Princess."

"But Prince Eugen will live," she said positively; "and if he lives——"

"Then I shall be free. I would renounce all my rights to make you mine, if—if——"

"If what, Prince?"

"If you would deign to accept my hand."

"Am I, then, rich enough?"

"Nella!" He bent down to her.

Then there was a crash of breaking glass. Aribert went to the window and opened it. In the starlit gloom he could see that a ladder had been raised against the back of the house. He thought he heard footsteps at the end of the garden.

"It was Jules," he exclaimed to Nella, and, without another word, rushed upstairs to the attic. The attic was empty. Miss Spencer had mysteriously vanished!

(Another long instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

EARN A BICYCLE

distributing circulars and taking orders from sample machine furnished by us. Active Agents wanted in each district. Large profits easily made. Highest grade fully warranted

BRITISH MADE CYCLES

LATEST MODELS £2-10 to £6

New Departure Coaster Hubs, Best Makes Tyres, and best British made equipment throughout.

200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES all makes, good as new, £1 to £2-10

Great factory clearing sale at half factory prices. We send on approval and allow Ten Days' Free Trial on every cycle. Money with carriage charges refunded without question if not perfectly satisfactory. Write at once for free catalogues and our special offer. Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonos half prices.

MEAD CYCLE CO. Dept. 44e,
85-97, Paradise Street, Liverpool,
19, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST

FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN

Rustless Roman Rims & Hubs.

Complete with All Fittings and Carriage Paid.

CASH OR 12 MONTHLY PAYMENTS o

£8 0 0 „ 15/- ea.
8 8 0 „ 15/10 „
9 0 0 „ 16/8 „
9 10 0 „ 17/6 „

JUNO Motor Cycles, 3 H.P., £34, or Monthly Payments.

JUNO Two-Speed Gear Cycles £12 12s., or 12 Payments of 23/4 each. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories; over 130 pages and Hundreds of Illustrations, sent post free.

Metropolitan Machinists' Co. Ltd., S.S. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C.; and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

Of all Chemists, or Post Free for P.O. only for 1/3, 2/10, and 4/7 from the Sole Proprietors:

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Mfging. Chemists, NOTTS.

A Good Cycle

At a FAIR price is cheaper than a poor Cycle at ANY price. Buy the best and avoid risks.

"CENTAURS," "COVENTRY CHALLENGE," "HUMBERS," "PREMIERS," "ROVERS," "SWIFTS," SINGERS," &c.

Their names guarantee their quality.

FROM 8/- MONTHLY.

WITHIN YOUR REACH

A HIGH-GRADE COVENTRY CYCLE FOR £6

On approval. Two Years' Warranty. Write for Lists (Free).

EDWARD O'BRIEN Ltd. (Dept. S3), World's Largest Cycle Dealers, COVENTRY.

5 YEARS' WARRANTY.

SOLID SILVER WATCH, Lady's or Gent's. Deposit, 2/6

Sent in Handsome Case.

After delivery of Watch, you send 1/6 each week for 13 weeks, making a total of 22/-. If you prefer to pay cash, within 7 days send balance of 16/- (making 18/6 in all).

Watch delivered only to responsible and bona fide applicants.

C. S. LAST & CO., 59 Oxford St., London, W.

£8 10

From 6/- Monthly. Special Offer. 500 New Cycles £3 10s. 500 Genuine B.S.A. £6 10s. Sample Victory Motor Cycle £26. Sent carr. paid before payment. Agents Wanted. Dereham Rd. Cycle Co., Norwich

Beauty.

Without Icilma Natural Water, Soap, and Cream no woman can keep a clear, healthy, and delicately-tinted skin. Icilma invigorates, cleanses, and beautifies as no artificial cosmetic can do; by its use alone can natural beauty be assured. Prevents sunburn and refreshes. Cures nettlerash and mosquito bites. (Samples Soap and Cream, 2d.) Icilma (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

TELL COOK

KEATING'S POWDER

KILLS

BLACK BEETLES

Tins Only 3½ 6½ 4½

FREEMAN'S

TRADE MARK

THE ORIGINAL & ONLY TRUE

CHLORODYNE

Best Remedy for Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 6s., or postage free by the INVENTOR, R. FREEMAN, 70 KENNINGTON PARK ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

RECOMMENDED BY MEDICAL MEN.

N.B.—Lord Chancellor Selborne, Lord Justices James and Mellish, decided in favour of Freeman's Original Chlorodyne, and against Browne & Davenport, compelling them to pay all costs. —"Times," 24-7-73.

"THE PILLS THAT MAKE LIFE EASY."

A healthy life is an easy life, and a healthy life is always enjoyed by those who rely upon to correct the Stomach and Liver Disorders that everyone is subject to.

Page Woodcock's Pills

Of all Chemists, at 1/1½ and 2/9.

Ask your grocer for

EPPS'S

(The most nutritious)

COCOA

And take no other.

GIVEN AWAY

With This Week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 538)

A PAPER PATTERN

of this

BLOUSE WITH CAPE.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

High School Young Ladies.

"TOBY" is very much in love with a young lady who has been educated at a High School. "The only thing I can't stand," he says, "is her manner. She seems to know an awful lot, and to be terribly conceited. In fact, she corrects me in everything, and makes me feel very awkward. Now, is there a cure for this? If not, ought I to go further in my courtship?"

* * * * *

Experience proves that nothing so soon wears off as the High School or University "side." When a young lady first leaves such a school, she is of course very full of her own superiority, just as a young man is on leaving a school to go to college. But very little contact with the world puts that sort of thing right. If "TOBY" is really fond of this young lady, he should put up with her manner for a little time, and if she is at heart a nice girl, of good disposition, she will soon get rid of her little failing, and, in the long run, be all the better for her High School education.

A Puzzle of Promotion.

AN interesting question about marriage comes from "NEWLY-WED." "I am just married," she writes. "My husband is an official under Government, I need not say what, and he has two courses of life open to him. One is to remain in a certain position, and earn a retiring pension in ten years' time. The other is to work up for a higher position, in which he would earn a much larger salary, but would not be entitled to a retiring pension until twenty-five years have passed. My husband himself says he thinks that he would enjoy life on a retiring pension in ten years much better than twenty-five years of hard work, even if he got a higher salary and better social position. I want you to advise me. I believe he will do whatever I wish. Personally, of course, I would rather he had the higher position and larger income, but ought I to respect his wishes in the matter?"

* * * * *

Everything must depend on your husband's nature. Of this you must be the judge. In a Government position a very energetic, capable man certainly ought not to retire when young, as his enforced leisure will probably a nuisance to himself and all with whom he comes in contact, especially his wife. That kind of man usually devotes his spare energy to household matters, with miserable results. On the other hand, if a man is naturally lazy, and has no ambition in the world, it seems to me that he might as well retire on his pension as keep up a pretence of work which he does not enjoy in a better position. However, this is a matter in which men nearly always yield to the wishes of their wives. If you yourself insist on his working for the higher position, and point out that your family—if there should be one—would be the gainers by your husband's increased income and position, I expect he will give in.

What the Young Man Said.

THERE was nothing at all to worry about, "WORRIED EMILY," in what the young man said. He meant that he had taken a great fancy to you, and was not merely a flirt, like so many other fellows. He didn't express that idea so well as he might, but, believe me, that is all he meant. The fact that he has called on you so many times, and that you have kept the appointments with him, and have grown to like him, is sufficient proof that you are safe in continuing the little affair.

A Question of Rings.

"HARRY B."—Your young lady means nothing in wearing a ring on the second finger of her left hand. It is a mere ornament, and not intended as a hint to you to place one on the third. I cannot advise you on the second question, which must depend on circumstances. However, if the matter is as you say, your fears are justified, and your action must depend on the extent to which you are fond of her.

The "Don't Dance" Man.

"I DON'T see enough of my best girl," writes "BERTIE." "I could see more of her if I went to dances, of which she is very fond. Now, I don't dance, and never could, though I get invitations. The point is, should I accept invitations to dance, under the circumstances?"

* * * * *

It seems to me that there are only two courses open to you. One is simply to learn dancing without any delay. It might be a torture to you, but if you could just get through the waltz somehow, it would, at any rate, enable you to go to a dance. On the other hand, if you cannot learn dancing, you might accept the invitations, and then trust to the girl's fondness for you to pull you through without injuring herself. But it is a great test of a girl's love for a man if she agrees to "pull him through" a dance of which she is herself a good dancer.

Alone in Germany.

A LADY writes me from Dresden, in Germany, signing herself "PEARL." "I am over thirty," she says, "and have just a little private income. It is too little to enable me to live in Britain without working, but just keeps me in Germany. Now, I very much wish to meet a gentleman who may suit me for marriage, but I could not bear the idea of marrying a foreigner. Very few Britons come here who are at all likely to know me personally, so I am in an awkward position. Would you advise me to advertise in a British newspaper? Or is the class of man who answers such advertisements generally a rascal?"

* * * * *

I see no reason why "PEARL" should not advertise in a British newspaper. True, there would probably be a good many undesirable answers to such an advertisement, as the man who seeks a wife through the papers is usually not the ordinary type of man. Still, I have known of very happy matches being made in this manner, and "PEARL" might be so lucky as to find the right man. I should advise her to select a trusted friend to interview those who answer the advertisement, a friend able to see that the references were all right, and other details. It would, however, be far better if "PEARL" returned home, and met the gentleman for herself. One more word to "PEARL." Why this objection to foreigners? As you are living in a foreign city, would not your life be happier if you did marry a native? Foreigners, after all, are not bad fellows personally, if you get rid of your little prejudices, and many British girls are happily married to them.

Cynthia.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

MISCELLANEOUS ADVERTISEMENTS.

Will be inserted in this column at the rate of 6d. per line of 8 words or part thereof. All advertisements should be addressed to Advertisement Manager, "Short Stories," 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., 11 days prior to date of appearance.

A Flower Garden for 1/-.—26 Threepenny Packets Expensive Annuals—Aster, Balsam, Canary Creeper, Columbine, Lobelia, Phlox, Everlasting Pea, Ten Weeks' Stock, &c., all different, post free, 1/1½.

52 Penny Packets for 1/-.—52 different Packets of favourite flower seed, ample supply, post free, 1/1½, all different from above. 26 packets, 7½d.

Giant Sweet Peas.—20 Packets Giant Sweet Peas exhibition strains (gold medal); 800 Seeds, post free, 7½d.

Monster Mignonette.—Sweet-scented Treet, 2ft. high, grown easily from our Pedigree Seed. Large Packets, post free 7½d.—Imperial Supply Stores, 4 to 20 Crampton Street, Walworth, London.

Baby's Long Clothes, complete set, 50 articles, very choice, unused; 21/-; approval.—Mrs. Max, The Chase, Nottingham.

Baldness Cured. Free Trial.—A French Specialist who has devoted his life to the study of Hair Diseases, having cured thousands of almost hopeless cases, will send a genuine inexpensive treatment to all who write enclosing 2 stamps. New Hair grows in 4 to 10 days.—K. Henri-Francis, Brixton Road London.

"Walking," by C. Lang Neil, is a thoroughly practical guide to pedestrianism, contains information as to how to train in order to become an expert walker, &c. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (W. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Sufferers from Chronic Bronchitis, Asthma, &c., should at once read the May "Chatter," one penny, by post, 1½d.—"Chatter," 90-91 Queen Street, London, E.C.

Bicycle, Free Wheel, 2 Brakes, Plated Rims, £5. New last month.—1075 Chester Road, Stretford, Manchester.

Etiquette for Men.—A Book of Modern Manners and Customs, which should be in the possession of every reader of Short Stories; post free from 17 Henrietta St. for 1/2.

Photo Post-cards, yourself, 12 1/6; send photo, no money; pay afterwards.—May, Enfield Terr., Seacombe.

Lace Curtains.—Maker's Stock; thousands of pairs; beautiful designs; buy at 25 per cent. below shops; catalogue free.—Milner's, 28 Hyde Park, Leeds.

Drunkenness Cured.—It is now within the reach of every Woman to save the drunkard. A free trial package of a marvellous home remedy posted to all who write for it. Can be given in tea, coffee, or food, thus absolutely and secretly curing the patient in a short time with or without his knowledge.—Address, in confidence, Ward Chemical Co., 120 Century House, Regent Street, London, W.

Dentofyxoline Powder.—Invaluable to wearers of artificial teeth. Old and loose plates made tight and safe by its use; tasteless and harmless, 1/- post free.—Trevor, 13 Union Street, Coventry.

"Swimming," by Montague Holbein, the celebrated Channel Swimmer, is a splendid book for those who wish to become good swimmers. Price 1/2 from the Publisher (S. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

1/3 Silver Brooch, 1/3. We will send a real Silver Brooch, Government Hall-marked, latest and most fashionable pattern, for 1/3. Send stamps or P.O. to the Leopard Silver Company, Summerfield Crescent, Birmingham.

A charming 18-carat Gold Cased Pendant for necklet, &c., containing two splendidly finished miniature photographs, for 2/- Send the two photographs you want reproduced, which I return uninjured.—Artist, 11 McKenzie Road, Cambridge.

Private Work.—Authors' MSS. carefully typewritten, 10d. 1,000. Many unsolicited testimonials.—Mrs. Wells, High Street, Uppingham.

"Cricket," Edited by G. L. Jessop, contains practical instructions as to how to play the game by K. S. Ranjitsinhji, C. B. Fry, G. L. Jessop, and others. Price 1/2, post free, from the Publisher (C. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Photography.—"How to Take and Fake Photographs," by Clive Holland, contains all information required by the beginner. Price 1/2, post free, from the Publisher (P. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Face Leathers, superfine quality, 1/- post free, in box.—K. Henre-Frances, Brixton Road, London.

Old Artificial Teeth Bought.—Call or forward by post; full value per return, or offer made.—Messrs. C. Browning, Manufacturing Dentists, 153 Oxford Street, London. (Established 100 years.)

Field Glasses.—Extremely fine pair Regulation Glasses (Army pattern) very long (30 mile) range, purchased for officer's use in Transvaal, not now required; leather case and strap; worth 75/-; will sacrifice for 11/9; approval before payment proof of genuineness.—F. Barker (Quartermaster), "Durdans," Brixton, S.W.

Teeth Bought, Gold and Platinum. Banker's reference.—Apply, Teeth by Instalments Institute, 48 Edgware Road, W.

PEARSON'S HOME MANAGEMENT.

is the most up-to-date and comprehensive work on Housekeeping, Cookery, and all Domestic Matters yet published.

Now appearing in fortnightly parts (complete in 12), price 7D. each nett.

Ask your Newsagent to let you see a copy, or send 7 stamps for a specimen part to The Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, W.C.

"No Better Food."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa

"Strongest and Best."—Health

TRY ALSO FRY'S MALTED COCOA

A Combination of Fry's Pure Cocoa and Allen and Hanburys' Extract of Malt.

Strongly recommended by the "LANCET" and "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL."

Digitized by Google

DON'T YOU THINK SO?

When a remedy has been before the public for over fifty years; when it has cured where other medicines failed; when it has brought relief to thousands of sick all over the world; when it has carried health to the suffering, hope to the despondent, and strength to the weak—don't you think such a remedy is a safe one for you?

BEECHAM'S PILLS

are without an equal for dispelling all disorders of the Stomach, Liver, Bowels and Kidneys. They act swiftly, gently, and thoroughly. One dose of BEECHAM'S PILLS will relieve the most distressing symptoms. Taken as directed they will quickly restore health and strength to the entire body. Year in and year out BEECHAM'S PILLS prove every claim made for them. That is why they are

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

Prepared only by

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancs.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 802. Week Ending May 14, 1904. Price One Penny.

Triumphantly she held the valuable parcel on high, but she did not see the figure that was about to snatch it from her grasp! It was Maurice Westmoir—the detective!

(An Exciting Incident from the Story, "A Deal in Diamonds." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

. . . You'll want a . . .

KODAK

. . . for your Holidays. . . .

- - THE - -

FOLDING POCKET SERIES

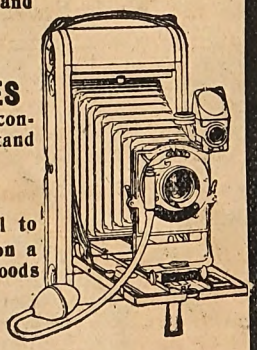
are light, compact, convenient, and can be put in the pocket.

Prices from 26/- to 82/6.

THE CARTRIDGE SERIES

are every bit as reliable and convenient, but can be used on a stand as well as in the hand.

Prices from 84/- to 160/-



A Genuine Kodak is essential to success, and the name Kodak on a Camera or other photographic goods is as the hall-mark on silver. Write for full list of these and other Cameras to

KODAK Ltd.,
41-43 CLERKENWELL RD., E.C.

J. G. GRAVES

THE

"Enterprise" Parcel

OF SHEFFIELD CUTLERY AND PLATE.

Contains: 6 Table Knives, 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Knives, 6 Dessert Forks, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 2 Table Spoons, 2 Salt Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, 1 Moist Sugar Spoon, 1 pair Sugar Tongs, and 1 Pickle Fork.

51 PIECES FOR 25/-

The Knives are made of best Sheffield Steel and fitted with 'Ivorette' Handles. 'Ivorette' is the best known substitute for genuine Ivory. The Forks and Spoons are made of 'Columbian' silver, a hard metal which wears white throughout and is not affected by acid foods or exposure.

DIRECT FROM MY FACTORY TO YOUR HOME.

Sent on receipt of 2/6 and your promise to pay the balance in nine more monthly payments of 2/6.
Discount Advantages to Cash Purchasers.

Handsome Catalogue of Sheffield Cutlery and Plate, post free.

AGENTS WANTED. Good Pay. No Responsibility. Write for Terms.

J. G. GRAVES, 100 Division St., SHEFFIELD

An admirable Food of the

EPPS'S

Finest quality and flavour.

COCOA

Nutritious and Economical.

SAPON

It REALLY does!
Does what?
"It does itself!"

that is to say, if you follow the directions.

SOAK,
SQUEEZE,
RINSE,
WRING.

SAPON does the washing while you take your ease.

A FREE SAMPLE will be sent for Post-card to SAPON Limited (Dept. 68), St. Swithin's Chambers, London.

ONE DOSE of

Kaputine cures in Ten minutes the most violent Headache or Neuralgic Pain no matter what the cause of the attack.

KAPUTINE is not an aperient, but is for one purpose only—to cure Headache and Neuralgia.

KAPUTINE

Cures in Ten Minutes.

Kaputine goes right to the seat of the trouble—the Nerves—it puts the Nerves right, that is why it cures almost instantly

Headache or Neuralgia.

Refuse dangerous white Headache Powders, such as have been condemned by the press. Demand Kaputine, the remedy that is backed up by medical testimony—the Safe Remedy.

Packets of 18 doses 1s.; Samples 1d. each. Of all Medicine Dealers.

Samples Free from Proprietors:
C. G. Kaputine, Huddersfield.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

BODLEIAN 11·5·1904 LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 802.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending May 14th, 1904.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

A DEAL IN DIAMONDS.

Telling how a Small Parcel of Stolen Gems was Passed to the Wrong Person and what Came of the Mistake.

"OH, I do wish the rain and wind would stop!" cried the girl distressfully, as she strove to make headway, with opened umbrella, against a howling wind that drove the rain fiercely before it, drenching her skirt, and making her feel quite crumpled up. She had some difficulty in keeping her breath, and she realised that the umbrella would quickly go inside out if she continued to hold it up. "I must shut it and get still more wet!" she gasped despairingly.

She stood still for a moment with the intention of closing the umbrella, and then she saw that she was in front of the steps of the Holborn Viaduct. It would have been worse than useless to have attempted to go over the Viaduct without closing it; the wind would have caught her with even more force. She placed her finger on the catch, but she was too late. A gust of wind which seemed to come from all four quarters of the compass at one time gave the umbrella a twist this way and that; she clutched frantically at it, and gave a tug that certainly had the effect of shutting it, but not until two at least of the ribs had suffered, and the covering had been torn in more than one place.

Nora Brecon felt like crying; troubles never come alone, and she had had enough and to spare of troubles lately. However, she had no time to indulge in that relief to the overwrought nerves; she was forced to take immediate refuge under the shelter of the archway at the top of the steps in order to save herself from a thorough drenching.

She managed to get her handkerchief out and wipe her dripping face, but she had scarcely begun that process when the figure of a man appeared.

"Here, take it quick, and be off; I'm shadowed!" cried the man, whom she could barely distinguish in the gathering darkness. He thrust something into the hands of the bewildered girl, and flew down the steps. At the same moment there was a shout from the roadway—a shout followed by a cry that rose above the noise of the rattle of cabs and omnibuses; everything seemed to be in confusion in the road. Nora understood that some poor creature had been run over in attempting to cross the road, and the thought, in her present distressed and agitated condition, upset her greatly. She shuddered, left the friendly shelter and hurried away in the rain as fast as she could go, with that cry from the injured person still haunting her.

"I must give it up for to-day and go home!" she almost sobbed. "Home!" It sounded like a mockery! "I can get a 'bus from here to go part of the way."

For once Fortune favoured her in a small way; she was successful in obtaining an inside seat right at one end.

All rights reserved.]

Having now some time in which to think collectedly and to breathe freely, she began to reflect on the probable nature of the injuries suffered by that unfortunate pedestrian; and then the recollection of the man in the archway came to her like a flash!

Where was that something which he thrust into her hands, or, to speak more correctly, that which he had pushed against her hands? She tried to remember whether she had actually grasped the object or not, but she could not recall the exact occurrence. Where was it? She had not got it, so much was certain! It must have dropped to the ground; probably she let it fall when the cry fell on her ears. What did it contain, and what did he mean by saying that he was shadowed? Those questions were so many riddles to Nora Brecon, and she gave up the attempts to answer them. It really appeared as if some thief had tried to pass his booty in order to save himself; but why try to pass it to her?

Nora's home was a small bed-sitting-room in the equally small house kept by Mr. and Mrs. Smithers. The lady of the house had been an old servant of the Brecons in the happier days, and had always borne an affectionate remembrance of little Miss Nora; but she had heard very little of the family for nearly ten years, and it gave her quite a shock when, a week prior to the opening date of this story, a girl had come up to her in the street and asked if she were Mrs. Smithers. She replied involuntarily in the affirmative, and then she recognised that this girl was little Miss Nora. She was so like her dear mother that there was no mistaking the resemblance!

The kind-hearted woman learnt a sad story of loss of money by the failure of the firm of which Nora's father was chief partner, and of death. Nora's mother had died five years before, so the girl was alone in the world and practically penniless. Mrs. Smithers further learnt that Nora Brecon had been in London a fortnight, trying to obtain a situation as nursery governess or companion, but without success. She only had one sovereign left when she accidentally met the old servant, whom she had half-believed to recognise from a photo; she had asked the question at hazard, and she had been correct.

So Mrs. Smithers insisted that the girl should go to her own house, where she could lodge free, and so eke out her sovereign.

"You can pay me, if you feel you must, when you get on a bit!" Mrs. Smithers had said. And thus it was settled.

Mrs. Smithers was out when Nora returned, so the girl let herself in with the key which had been lent to her. She placed the wrecked umbrella in the scullery to dry; she did not like to throw it into the dust-bin, for it had been a present from her father. It was probably quite useless, but she could keep it; there was some comfort even in retaining it, worthless as it was now.

Digitized by Google

"I can't afford to buy another!" sighed the girl, "so I must borrow Mrs. Smithers' or go out only when the weather is fine."

She did her best to be cheerful, but it was a relief when she could lay her head on her pillow and court sleep, which mercifully came very quickly.

In the morning she felt better, and ready once more to look for a situation of some kind, although it might be only to address envelopes. Two days passed in a weary hunt for the means of earning a living, and on each of those evenings she passed unintentionally over the Viaduct. On the second day she was passing those steps when a hand was placed on her shoulder.

"Were you standing here in the rain two evenings ago?" asked a voice.

She looked up with a start, and saw a man of about twenty-five gazing fixedly at her with keen, blue eyes.

"Yes, that is correct!" she responded, a feeling of fear creeping over her. "Why?"

"Why? Because that being so, you can tell me what became of that small packet of stolen—property!" was the rejoinder.

"I do not know!" stammered poor Nora in dismay at this verification of her original suspicion. "I don't think I had it! That is, I don't know anything about it!"

The man's face, which had assumed an expression of puzzled amusement, became grave.

"It seems to me that you are trying to play the innocent, and are not a good hand at deceiving people!" he remarked sarcastically.

"I have never attempted to deceive people!" cried Nora, her anger rising at this imputation. She drew herself up to her full height and looked so dignified that Maurice Westmoir thought that she must be more than twenty, the age which he had first ascribed to her; she seemed to have added three or four years to her record by that attitude.

"How dare you say that to me?" she continued. "What have I to do with your stolen property?"

"H'm!" thought Maurice. "I thought that she was a new hand and was making a mess of it, but this looks like genuine innocence! No, I don't think there is any acting here! Then what on earth is at the bottom of it all?" Aloud, he said: "I beg your pardon! I see that there is some mistake, some mystery which I did not suspect! I am a detective, trying to unravel a tangle—not a regular detective, I ought to say, but that does not matter. You may be able to throw some light on it. Can I see you anywhere? At the house of someone you know, who can be present?"

His tone was very deferential now, and although it was twilight, yet Nora fancied she detected a light in his eyes that made her feel strangely fluttered. The sensation was not unpleasant, and she answered, somewhat shyly:

"If you like to come to Mrs. Smithers' this evening, she will be at home, and I will tell you all I know!"

"Thank you!" he said courteously, and he made a note of the address.

"I'm sure I don't know if I have done right!" cried Nora to Mrs. Smithers, at the end of her story. "But I told him, and no doubt he will come. He gave me his card; his name is Maurice Westmoir!"

"I don't like young men!" observed the good lady emphatically. "But it'll be all right; I shall be here!"

She looked so dragon-like that most people would have agreed with her in the assertion that it would be "all right."

Maurice Westmoir arrived; he was so polished in his manner that the old servant, who prided herself on her ability to recognise a gentleman when she saw one, melted considerably.

"You wonder how it was that I knew you were the lady who was standing at that spot?" he began, addressing Nora. "It is soon explained. A robbery of diamonds has been committed; the police had a clue to the thief. He was trying to get those diamonds to an accomplice—a woman, it was suspected, from his antecedents—who would take them to Holland to dispose of them. The police had got on his track; a detective had succeeded in getting close to him while he had a packet of stones on him. The man dodged across the road on the Viaduct, and the detective followed. The officer was so intent on keeping the man in view that he forgot to be cautious of the traffic. The officer saw the light from a passing vehicle fall on the face of a young woman whom the man went up to; although it was only a flash, the detective saw enough to describe you very well. Then he went under a cab, and was hurt. Oh, not so very badly, Miss Brecon!" he added hastily, as the girl turned pale. "It turns out that his injuries are not severe!"

"I'm so glad!" said Nora simply. "Yes, that is true, and now I will continue the story!" She told him of her own experiences, and concluded: "I suppose you have watched for me in various places?"

"Several of us have!" he laughed. "I had some kind of a presentiment that you would go that way again, and I was right!"

"I am so sorry that I have lost the parcel!" said Nora regretfully. "What is to be done?"

"You can help me to catch the rogues, at least!" remarked Maurice. "And perhaps we shall get most of the other stones back. From what we know, there should have been someone else at the spot at that time, but doubtless the weather delayed that fair accomplice, and you were mistaken for her in his agitation. Now, both the thief and his accomplice must feel very much annoyed that a blunder was committed, and will be on the look-out for a chance to regain possession of that packet. I have a scheme for making use of that fact in order to trap them, and I want your assistance!"

Nora did not like the idea much, but when she raised a rather timid protest, and turned her tender eyes to his, she noticed something in his face that stopped the words on her lips and caused a slight tinge of colour to mantle her cheeks.

"Oh, I am sure you don't feel at all afraid!" he replied, in answer to her half-uttered protestation. He spoke so warmly that the colour on Nora's cheeks deepened. "It will be quite simple—and I shall be close at hand to guard you from any attempt at mischief on their part, you see!"

He appeared to think that this argument would be quite sufficient to allay her fears, and Nora herself was rather surprised when left alone a short time afterwards, to remember that she also had a similar feeling! Maurice Westmoir spoke with so confident an air, with such brotherly—yes, that was it!—with such brotherly care, that how could she help feeling that all would be well if he were only near her?

"This is the scheme," pursued Maurice eagerly. "We have learnt a lot about these rascals, and we know that they sometimes use a certain cipher. So I propose to insert an advertisement in a particular journal to the effect that a young lady who received a packet by mistake will be glad to return the same if the address to which it should be returned is stated in a letter to be sent to Miss Welsh (your name sounds Welsh, you know!) at some address on which we can decide—some shop where you can have letters sent on payment of a small fee. I fancy that the plan will give us a good clue!"

"But I haven't got the packet!" said Nora dismally.

"That doesn't matter, Miss Nora!" interrupted Mrs. Smithers, who had remained silent all this time, although anxiously awaiting an opportunity to say something. "The advertisement won't be in strict accordance with the truth"—that was a phrase which Mrs. Smithers had picked up—"but you must fight rascals with some of their own weapons!"

"Exactly!" concurred Maurice Westmoir quickly. But he kept his eyes averted from Nora; it seemed like sacrilege to teach this girl the wiles of the world.

It occurred to Mrs. Smithers that Mr. Westmoir stayed longer than was absolutely necessary, but she said nothing. He came the next evening, and that advertisement required a lot of editing and altering. And the next two evenings he came again, and made inquiries about how Nora had stood near the Viaduct steps and other trivial matters which he appeared to regard as very important. Nora found herself looking forward to his coming, and she explained this by telling herself that it was because she was so lonely and so unsuccessful in obtaining work.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Westmoir had learnt her history, and he had told her his own; he was the son of the diamond merchant from whom the stones had been stolen. He hinted that he might be able to help her to obtain employment, and he urged her to remain at home for a day or two, as she was tiring herself and might find herself laid up with nervous prostration. Poor Nora thought that he would not have given that advice if he had known her financial position exactly! Yet she felt constrained to act upon the kindly advice, for she realised that she was breaking down.

The advertisement had been in for three days, and on the evening of the third day Maurice came again; in fact he had not missed one evening since his first call! He found that she had remained in the house all day, owing to having caught a chill.

"We must get someone to go to-morrow to see if there are any letters," he said. "You have not been able to go to-day?"

"No," answered Nora. "It was useless for Mrs. Smithers or anyone else to go for them, as the people will only give them up to me! They took good stock of me when I made the arrangement, for that very purpose. Otherwise, anyone could get my letters! I shall feel better to-morrow."

He appeared ill at ease, though he tried to talk cheerfully. The conversation flagged; Mrs. Smithers dropped one or two broad hints about his going, which he did not take, and then she was forced to leave them together because she had something to attend to. After all, Miss Nora was able to take care of herself, surely!

The conversation did not brighten, even after the landlady's departure Maurice was decidedly preoccupied. They sat silent for quite five minutes, and, when Nora ventured to turn her eyes towards him, she found that he was gazing at her with undisguised admiration and longing!

"I thought I should never fall in love again!" he said abruptly. "But I have done so, Nora!"

It was a most unconventional declaration! Nora Brecon could not doubt that it was meant for her! She hastily turned her face from him.

"You turn from me! Perhaps you have a right to do so!" he said moodily. "I thought I was in love with her, four years ago, but I know now, since I have seen you, that it was merely a youthful infatuation! Let me tell you about it!"

Nora's face had paled at this confession; she still kept it averted, and wondered why everything had changed from light to darkness in her heart. He told her of his infatuation with a young woman who had deceived him; she had taken advantage of his love, or passing fancy, to obtain his confidence and then to rob his father.

"She wrote me a scornful note, jeering at me for having been so easily tricked," he concluded bitterly, "and she said that she would not return to England again, and that it was useless for me to attempt to trace her. I vowed that I would never trust another woman, and I have broken that vow. And I am glad that I have broken it! Nora, I will leave you now, to think over what I have said, but I will come again to-morrow!"

When Mrs. Smithers returned she found that Mr. Westmoir was gone, and that Nora had tear-stained eyes, although she declared that she was happy. Mrs. Smithers was puzzled to understand how he could have left the house without her knowing it, seeing that she had been in the kitchen all the while! She must have been very busy indeed!

Nora was well enough to go for letters on the following day, and she found one. She carried it home in triumph, and, once in her room, she opened it; the contents were in the cipher, which she could not properly read.

"I must give it up!" she sighed aloud.

"You mean the packet, I suppose? Certainly, you must give it up!" said a voice behind her.

Nora sprang to her feet with a little scream, to find that a tall, strongly-built, yet well-shaped woman, with features that were attractive and striking, if not beautiful, was standing behind her.

"I followed you home," said the woman, with an amused smile. "I guessed that that advertisement was a trap, and so I hit upon a plan to outwit the decoy duck and the master hand that used it! I am here to get information out of you, and by all that is bad, if you don't tell me where the stones are, I'll kill you!"

"I haven't got the packet!" said Nora, drawing herself up haughtily. She was bound to put a bold face on the matter, but her position was dangerous. Where was Maurice?

"Tell me what happened?" commanded the woman with flashing eyes, and Nora told her.

"You dropped it!" cried the strange woman. "Where is that umbrella?" she demanded suddenly.

"I put it into that cupboard when it was dry, just as it was. I determined to keep it until I could see if anything could be done with it!"

The woman hurried to the cupboard and took out the damaged umbrella. In a moment she had taken from the closed framework a little packet with discoloured wrapping! The fateful packet had somehow slipped into the umbrella and had lain there all the time that Maurice was trying to find it! And then Nora remembered that she had never mentioned that umbrella incident to Maurice, or he might have guessed!

"Ha, ha!" laughed the woman ironically. "Here it is! It is——"

"Mine!" cried a strong voice, and the packet was deftly snatched from her fingers.

With a shrill cry the woman turned

"Maurice!"

"Laura!"

And then the shrinking girl opposite them knew that the former lovers had met again!

"So you have come back again to rob me?" Maurice cried bitterly. "Once before, you fooled me and stole from my father and me, and now——"

"And now," retorted the woman fiercely, interrupting him and turning his words against him, "you have found consolation—there!" And she pointed her finger towards Nora, who instinctively shrank from her, and placed herself by the side of Maurice for protection. He drew her to him with his left hand, and his arm crept round her waist.

"You must tell me where the other stones are," said Maurice decisively. "If you do that you can go free; if not," he added, as she made a defiant gesture, "you go to prison!"

"Never!" screamed the now infuriated woman.

She made a cat-like spring towards the couple, who stood between her and the door, but she recoiled as Maurice released Nora and attempted to seize her wrists. She stood before him with heaving chest and flashing eyes; she wanted to hate him, to strike him down, yet she could not conquer the love that had manifested itself after she had lost him. If she had only been a better woman! Nora saw the expression in her eyes and comprehended it; placing her hand on Maurice's arm, she spoke gently.

"Let her go!" she said. "She has been punished!"

All the hardness and fury died out of the woman's features; she hesitated for a moment to take advantage of Maurice's movement to the side of the room to allow her a free passage out.

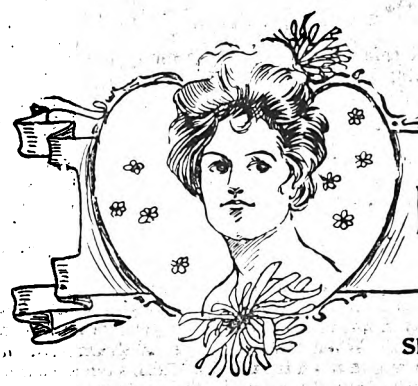
"You are right!" she said quietly. "And I deserve it! Make him happy!"

She passed through the door, and they never saw her again.

Maurice urged Nora to marry him at once, but she would not consent; there must be a probation time for both. So they agreed to wait a year, at the end of which time they were happily married.

George Day.

Digitized by Google



LOVE THE CONQUEROR.

Showing How True Love Overcame all Obstacles.

THE son of wealthy parents who idolised him, scarcely out of his teens, handsome, with genial spirits that appreciated his good fortune, Ronald White was supremely happy as he sauntered carelessly along that sunny day in May.

Winifred Charters stepped quickly towards him. A tall, graceful girl, hazel-eyed, shy, and beautiful, her silver-tinted Spring costume set off her charms the more. She held out a neatly-gloved hand.

"Yes, I am ten minutes late, I know. But I have finished my shopping, and am free for the afternoon."

"Free," exclaimed Ronald, laughing. "You mean bound to me unconditionally—for the afternoon."

She blushed—a pretty, shell-pink blush—and allowed her lover to draw her hand within his arm.

They walked slowly along, absorbed in each other, yet vaguely conscious of the delicious warmth in the air, the smart costumes of the passing crowd, the glory of the shop windows.

"I ordered my parcels to be sent to the railway station. It is so much pleasanter than to carry them about," said Winnie.

"Of course. And you are sure of finding them at the last minute?"

"Oh, yes. No one ever disappoints me," she returned, a bewitching assurance in her lovely eyes. "But then, you see, I never wait till the very last minute."

"You will have to wait to-night."

"Why?"

"Oh, well, you surrendered to me unconditionally, remember. Besides, I have sent a telegram to your sister, telling her you will not be home till midnight. And I have bought tickets for the theatre. After the performance is over we shall just have time to catch the last train. Won't you like that, Winnie?"

"Yes, very much indeed; but, supposing we lose the train or have no time to get my parcels?"

"Have no fear, dearest. A cabman shall go to the station and procure your packages in advance."

"How thoughtful you are, Ronald. And how easy it is to manage when one has plenty of money."

He winced slightly.

"Why mention that, Winnie? It is not wealth that makes happiness. Should we not be just as happy this afternoon, even without plenty of money?"

"I have no doubt we should be very happy," she replied.

They entered a fashionable restaurant and sat down in a corner before a small table. Winnie had eaten nothing since her breakfast, while it pleased Ronald to order everything that took her fancy. So they ate and chatted with the appetite of youth and the enjoyment of each other's company.

At last Winnie had finished her dessert, and Ronald his coffee.

They were in the street once more, sauntering along in perfect content, pausing now and again to glance into some shop window. Suddenly Ronald stopped before the great glass front of a famous jeweller's.

"I want to buy a little ring for you," he said, "and then we shall just have time to get tea and to reach the theatre."

The young girl blushed.

"Leave the ring till some other time, Ronald. We have had pleasure enough for to-day."

He pressed her hand. There was a tender look in his eyes, but his face was grave.

"I had not meant to buy the ring to-day, dear, but something, somehow, prompts me. I want something very lovely"—taking her hand in his—"to incircle this precious little finger. Bad luck, I'm sure, will follow if I do not put a ring on your finger to-night."

Winnie laughed. "You silly boy. What difference could a ring make?"

The amount of money necessary to secure the ring that took Ronald's fancy almost frightened Winnie. Her lover had been bred to a fortune, she to a pittance. Gratification at any cost was his first impulse, calculation hers.

The purchase over, they had tea, and drove to the theatre.

After the theatre, they hurried to the cab that Ronald had ordered. The parcels were quite safe. In a few minutes they were at the station. Their train was ten minutes behind time, they learnt. Warm as the day had been, the night was cold, and as they paced the platform together, Winnie could not refrain from shivering.

"Winnie, you have no coat, and your dress, how thin! My dear, this is unpardonable!"

"I expected to be home before dark, you know."

"And I have kept you. Heavens! I shall never forgive myself if you take cold—if you become ill."

"Don't worry, dear, I shall not be ill. I have not felt the cold till now. It is nothing."

The train steamed in and they took their seats.

"You'd better hurry up," they heard a porter tell the guard, "or the midnight express'll be after you."

They had a carriage to themselves. Winnie was unmistakably cold. She was shaking violently, her teeth were chattering.

"I must get a rug from somewhere," said Ronald, "next time we stop."

He called to the solitary porter of the sleepy station as the train slowed up.

"A rug, quick, fellow. Guard, you must wait a minute."

"I can't do it," replied the guard. "I'm already behind time."

Ronald ignored him, and turned to the porter.

"There's a rug in the master's room," said the excited porter, "but he's gone home, and the door's locked. This is the room, sir."

"Here, lend us your weight," cried Ronald, slipping half a sovereign into the man's hand. The two men threw themselves against the door.

The guard went to the edge of the platform and listened along the track with bated breath. He was well acquainted with his passenger. It was very risky waiting—even for a minute. He would not have waited for any ordinary person.

Digitized by Google

but a White—why, was not the boy's father, Sir Ronald White, a director of the company? There was no sound or sign of the express yet. It was perilous work, but he had run just as close before and got through safe. Though they had gained three minutes, they were still nine behind. He would give young White another minute, and try to make up the lost time by crowding on more steam.

A few passengers put their heads out of the windows and grumbled at the delay, but so far as the eye could see the track behind them was dark and silent.

The guard moved towards his van. He placed one foot on the step.

"I can't wait any longer, sir," he shouted.

At that moment there was a resounding smash as the station master's door flew suddenly inwards. A second later Ronald appeared with the rug in his grasp.

"Go ahead, guard," he cried almost breathlessly, as he leapt towards the now moving train.

Ten minutes and a half behind! The express was due there in two minutes!

Ronald staggered with the rug towards Winnie.

"My dear Ron, you should not have troubled," she said.

He drew close to her and slipped his arm about her waist. This was a new intoxication, this feeling which had come over him since she had worn his ring. She was his—his very own.

"How tired you must be, darling."

Winnie looked at him tenderly. "But we are almost home now, dearest," she said wearily.

"Yes, dear," drawing her a little closer, clasping her a little tighter—"yes—our day—is——"

"Heavens, Ronald!"

There was a shriek of terror from the girl's voice. Then a fearful crash and rending, the screaming of whistles, and all was darkness. The train was invaded by a fiend, the scalding water deluging the miserable inmates, the red coals, like horrible hailstones, falling about them. There came a terrific swaying and a sudden stop. Then, save for the groans of the injured and the hiss of escaping steam, there was a dreadful silence. The midnight express had run into the train.

* * * * *

Winifred Charters recovered consciousness in the cool May daybreak in her own room. Her sister was moving softly about, picking up scattered garments—the spoilt and torn pieces of the pretty costume in which Winnie had gone to the city the previous day. Instantly the terrible scenes of the previous night came back to her. She sighed.

"Am I hurt much, Lucy?"

"Your face and neck are scalded, dear. The doctor thinks not very seriously."

"Scalded? Then I shall be scarred! Was Ronald hurt?"

"Yes."

"Not killed, Lucy—not killed?" cried Winnie.

"No, dear. There is an injury to the hip-joint. They have sent to the West End for surgeons. Nothing can be known positively till they arrive."

Winnie lifted her hands.

"My ring," she cried wildly. "My lovely ring. It is gone."

"What ring, Winnie?"

"Of course you don't know, Lucy. Yesterday Ronald bought me a ring—oh, such an exquisite and costly ring. And now it is lost or someone has stolen it." Winnie sobbed into her hands.

"It is not impossible," said her sister. "The confusion was frightful. It was past midnight before I got there. We could not find you and Ronald for an hour."

Winnie shuddered.

"What an awful termination to that happy day!"

"Poor child! It was a happy day, then?"

"Oh, so happy, Lucy!"

"And Ronald gave you a ring, you say. Did he ask you definitely to marry him?"

There was a slight pause.

"Well, I don't think he did in just so many words, but it was the same thing."

"No, Winnie, it is not the same thing," said the elder girl decidedly, with a sigh. "A man who wants a girl for his wife will ask her plainly to marry him."

"Ronald wants to marry me, I'm positive. But you see, Lucy, we are very young to think of marrying yet. And, Lucy, we do love each other dearly. That is enough for the present, surely?"

Lucy Charters turned to the window to wipe the tears from her eyes.

"Winnie, I cannot see you suffer," she exclaimed. "You are too dear to me. Anything that grieved you would kill me. That is why I am so anxious about your relationship with Ronald White. When I received the telegram stating that you were staying in town till the last train, such a weight oppressed my heart that the news of the accident scarcely made it heavier. I could not bear to have you stay. And I wish you had not taken the ring till you were definitely engaged."

Winnie sighed.

"But the ring is gone. We may never be engaged now, Lucy."

"If we were situated differently, if we had a father or a brother, or if we were wealthy, Ronald White would have declared his passion before now. Has he not been wooing you for more than a year? But you have nothing except your pretty face, and he is not the first man who has ventured to trifle with a girl, who was pretty, poor, and unprotected."

"Nothing could persuade me, Lucy, that Ronald's heart is not the seat of honour. He could not be more tender to me were I a princess. You do not know how he left the train at Langley to get me a rug!"

The elder sister shook her head. Counsel or reflection seemed alike idle with the lovers separated as they were, on beds of sickness, and with the shadow of death between them. Try as she would, she could not convince herself that Ronald White, rich, brilliant, with so great a future before him, really loved her sister for herself alone. But she would never tell her that.

"I must leave you now, dear," she said. "Perhaps you will sleep when the room is quiet."

Lucy drew the blinds together before the dormer windows of the little country villa, straightened the sheets, arranged the bandages that swathed the girl's face and throat, and went lightly away.

As soon as she was alone Winnie hid her face in her hands and cried bitterly. Her poor, burnt face. If she were disfigured, would Ronald still love her? What awful things Lucy had said! They could not be true. They were the outgrowth of Lucy's own disappointed life. And she and Ronald had had such a happy day. What a miserable end!

Meanwhile, in the luxurious bedroom of the great house to which he had been carried, Ronald White lay pale and still. Though it was not yet daybreak, everyone in the house was about, speaking in whispers, and treading softly. One after another they came and went—father and mother and sisters—in mute suspense, to look at their darling and wander away, or to glance eagerly down the carriage-drive for the sound of wheels which would tell them of the arrival of the surgeons for whom they had telegraphed, and upon whose verdict hung the life and well-being of their cherished, only son.

Eight o'clock came at last, and with it the famous physicians. There was a long, thorough examination, an anxious consultation. They carried the result to Sir Ronald White. His son's life was not in immediate danger. But—— Well, he would be lame for life, and, more likely than not, an invalid.

"Save my boy's life," cried the anguished father, "only save his life!"

* * * * *

It was the end of June. The roses had bloomed and faded; the merry songsters, with their newly-hatched young, had flown away; the corn had ripened, and the grass grown tall—just as if no incident of human misery had come to mar the harmony of the lapsing hours.

Digitized by Google

Winifred Charters was up and about the house. She had escaped wonderfully from accident, everyone said. No scars disfigured her sweet, fair face, only a slight redness which a few months would remove. She was alone this day. Lucy had gone out on a mission, the thought of which kept the younger sister's heart in a flutter of expectation. She had gone to see Ronald White.

And how had it fared with the handsome young fellow? He had passed through fearful suffering. The fractured bones of the injured joint had been set, and were slowly knitting. Illness had left its mark upon him. He was feverish, peevish, and despondent. Upon this particular morning he awoke early from unrefreshing sleep. The doctors were to visit him at ten o'clock, and he had been promised, should his condition be favourable, that he might sit up for a little while in a reclining chair specially procured for him.

The moment he stirred from his sleep his elder sister stepped from the adjoining room which had been occupied by one or other of the family since Ronald had met with his injury. The White girls were three in number—proud, cold girls, never beautiful, no longer young, but animated with a feeling common among girls in similar families. They almost worshipped their only brother. His present prostrate position gave them the opportunity they so much desired. Never before had they been privileged to coddle and humour him as their hearts craved.

Agnes White stepped lightly in, bringing a costly china bowl of warm water for her brother's toilet. Then she returned again with a tiny tray, upon whose damask cloth was spread his breakfast. All the time she had not spoken. It irritated Ronald to be frequently asked if he were better. He pushed away the food.

"It is nearly ten," he exclaimed. "I will wait till the doctors come. Perhaps I may sit up to eat my breakfast."

Agnes took her seat in silence.

"I hear the carriage," she presently said.

A faint flush mounted to Ronald's cheeks.

"I shall die here," he cried irritably, "if they do not let me get up."

Perhaps the surgeons thought the same. Anyway, they gave permission for him to be cautiously lifted to the cushioned chair, placed by the window. Ronald's hungry eyes devoured the scene without—the trimly-kept lawn, the garden with its multi-coloured flowers, its pleasant fragrances.

"Who would have thought a month ago," he murmured bitterly, "that I should be thankful even to sit here, a crippled prisoner?"

"My dear boy," said his mother, "be grateful that it is no worse."

"We must have a little festival in honour of the occasion," interposed Agnes White, with an attempt at gaiety. "What shall we do in celebration?"

"Give the school-children a strawberry feast out here on the lawn, eh, Ronald, where you could watch them?"

"That would indeed be delightful," returned the invalid with supreme irony.

"Pray, mother, let Ronald make his own proposals."

"Why, of course, Agnes, if the dear boy has any desire, we shall be only too pleased to gratify it. I only suggested something to divert his mind."

"My mind doesn't need diversion, mother, and if you want a celebration, Agnes, please have it on the other side of the house. What I wish you to do is to send a message at once to Miss Winifred Charters. Tell her that I have left my bed, and should like her to come to see me. Send the carriage with the message, and tell the coachman to wait till she is ready."

There was a dead silence.

"Did you not understand me?" continued Ronald presently, his eyes closed, his lips compressed.

"Certainly, dear, of course. I was just going to write the note," and Agnes rose, beckoning to her mother to follow her from the room.

"You see?" whispered Lady White.

"Hush, mother dear. Let me manage him alone."

"He will marry her in spite of you. You see, she is his first thought."

Agnes did not stop to hear her mother's forebodings. Procuring her writing-case, she returned to her brother.

"Ronald," she said after a little hesitation, her pen suspended in the air, "I wish you were able to write this message."

"I wish I were."

"Because I think Miss Charters will scarcely like coming to see you, so conspicuously, you know, in our carriage, unless, of course, she comes as your affianced wife."

"You can consider that she comes in that position."

"You became engaged to her, then, that day?"

"I don't know, Agnes," replied Ronald, almost angrily, "that I am bound to explain my private affairs to you or to anyone else. I intend marrying Winifred Charters. Be good enough to send for her."

Agnes White's heart gave a little bound. They were not positively engaged yet, then. Her brother would have said so.

"But, my dear Ronald," her pen still trembled above the page, "of course I'm going to send for Miss Charters, but a disappointment just now would be so bad for you. I want you to reflect, my dear Ron, that she may not come. In the first place, she has not been out yet; she may not be able to drive so far; a sense of delicacy may prevent her; and again, my poor darling, a month has changed you greatly. Is Winifred Charters the kind of girl who would or would not be affected by this change? Dear, dear Ron, life has a very different outlook, at the very best, from what it had a month ago. Your riding, dancing, and similar amusements—all are done with. You have nothing better than this invalid's chair to look forward to, perhaps for years."

Her brother waved his hand wearily.

"Dear, precious boy," continued his lecturer, "who is going to make you happiest? I would not say these things did I not know they must have occurred to you. I am going to write now to Miss Charters, but tell me, before I bring her, is it fair to bind her to a prolonged engagement dependent upon your capricious recovery? Could you expect to fulfil the hopes you have inspired while wooing her? She has dreamt, no doubt, of being your wife, the wife of a wealthy, handsome young man; she has looked forward to a brilliant social position—to a life of gaiety, admiration, dress, and display. Tied to this chair, could you expect her to spend her life happily beside it? Could you be happy in merely supplying the means for her enjoyment in which you could not share?"

Miss White ceased. She told herself that desperate diseases required desperate remedies; that she was cruel in order to be kind.

Her brother leant his head upon his hand and closed his eyes.

"My poor Ronald, have I wearied you?"

"You have."

The tone was dejected. Miss White knew that the shots had told. She dipped her pen in the ink and wrote:

"MY DEAR MISS CHARTERS,—My brother is sitting up for the first time to-day. He desires to see you, and has asked me to send the carriage, hoping that, if you are able, you will do him the favour of driving over to see him. Allow me to beg you to have no scruples as to the propriety of your doing so. After the frightful accident to which you and my brother were subjected, nothing could be more natural than that you should wish to compare your experiences. Use your own convenience as to time. The coachman has directions to await your orders.—Very truly, "AGNES WHITE."

Her brother read the note and nodded an approval. There was nothing to object to; he could ask no more; but it galled him.

Winifred Charters took the note herself from the coachman's hand at the door. She turned a little pale as she read it, then handed it to her sister.

Digitized by Google

"What shall I do about it, Lucy?"

Lucy's lip curled.

"Can you ask?" she said with a fine scorn. "Will you subject yourself to such humiliating condescension?"

"Miss White is always hard and cold."

"True, but listen to what she says: 'You are to feel no scruples of delicacy,' you are not to come shyly, as you might if you and her brother were properly engaged. Nothing will be thought of your visit by anybody. It will not warrant the assumption of any engagement. How careful she is! You are not for a moment to suppose that they sent the carriage because they regard you as Ronald's future wife."

"But Ronald did not write this."

"No, but he saw the note, of course. He may even have suggested that clause, fearing you might suppose he wished to make his declaration. It is merely as a fellow sufferer that he wishes to see you."

"Then I will not go."

"My brave darling! That is your wisest decision."

"How shall I decline, Lucy?"

The elder sister sat thoughtful for a few moments.

"Say," she said finally, "that it is not thought advisable for you to drive so far quite yet—it is more than two miles, you know. And say how thankful and happy you are that Ronald is able to sit up, and that I shall come over in the course of the day to congratulate him."

"You, Lucy?"

"Yes. And if he has anything to say, he will say it to me."

He saw his ring was not upon her hand.

Poor Winnie wrote her note with pale cheeks and tearful eyes.

"Am I to go home without you, miss?" asked the coachman, when Winnie gave the note to him.

"Certainly."

"Mr. Ronald will be upset, miss. He would have me bring the horses round to see before I started. It's the first thing he's seemed to care about."

Miss Charters bowed gravely and closed the door.

"I did not think she would come to such a summons," declared Ronald, when the messenger returned.

Miss White thought the matter over carefully.

"She will not come, Ronald, unless it is as your betrothed wife. Her motive is obvious."

"Winnie feels herself to be my future wife, Agnes. She wears my ring upon her finger."

"If love was her only motive, Ronald, I should not be surprised if the change which has come over you lately would not alter even her affection. But if she has other motives, if it is your money which tempts her, she will still desire to marry you."

A hot flush mounted to the young man's face.

"Agnes," he cried, "I'm ashamed of you. You shall not poison my mind against her. Leave me instantly!"

Miss White went humbly away. Desperate diseases required desperate remedies. Her brother should not marry Winifred Charters with her pretty face and fascinating ways and her scheming tricks—if she could prevent it.

Nothing came of Lucy Charters' visit to Hollybush Towers, the Whites' residence. She was taken to Ronald's room where, in an atmosphere made oppressive by the presence of the three Miss Whites, she made a brief, cold call. She was truly shocked by the change in Ronald, and her endeavours to conceal her feelings were set down to duplicity.

She was glad when the end came and she was out once more in the leafy lanes where she could have her cry out. It would never do, she argued, to tell Winnie the actual truth—the poor, broken-hearted Winnie, who wandered about the little rooms through the cool hours of the summer afternoon in a feverish anxiety for her sister's return.

"My poor Winnie!" were Lucy's first words. "Ronald White will be a helpless cripple and fretful invalid all his life. He wants a strong, patient nurse, not a beautiful young wife. If you were engaged to him ten times over, it would be wiser to give him up."

"Give him up, Lucy? I never will—until some other woman has a stronger claim upon him than I. My poor, darling Ronald!"

"Oh, Winnie. Has his money so strong a fascination? It would not make you happy."

"His money!" retorted the younger sister with scorn. "I care nothing for his money. Would to Heaven that he were poor, that I might marry him, and work for him, and nurse him—to prove how dearly I love him."

And Winifred dropped her fair head and cried long and bitterly.

One day Winnie heard some news. The Whites were going abroad. It was the end of August now, and the outward traces of her accident were almost effaced. But she was drooping and pale. It would take a long time, the doctor declared, before she entirely recovered from the nervous shock. Had she been a wealthy patient, he would have prescribed change of air and scene. But as the Charters girls had only their little home and a small income with which to maintain it, it was useless to propose expensive remedies.

Digitized by Google

Week had succeeded week since the morning when Sir Ronald White's coachman had come in pomp on his fruitless errand, and no further communication had reached Winnie from her lover.

In reality, with an invalid's morbid judgment, and with the ever active poison of his sister's words distilling in his brain, Ronald was angry with her. He considered she ought to have come to see him. For her to stay away looked to him like prudishness. Perhaps, however, she was so truly shocked at his changed prospects that she wished never to see him again. Or, perhaps, it was as his sister had said—but, no, he would not believe that. So the days wearily passed, and his faith in the sweet girl who loved him so tenderly grew weaker and weaker.

Nevertheless, he gained in strength, and the doctors advised his removal to some medicinal springs at the earliest possible moment.

"And if one place doesn't agree with him, try another," said the great man from Harley Street. "The great thing is to keep him cheerful. Give him whatever he asks for."

One of the young autocrat's first steps was to dethrone his sisters. He would have a competent male nurse—a professional nurse who would take orders and obey them. He would no longer stand a crowd of hysterical women about him worrying his life away with their idiotic notions. Alas! for fraternal gratitude!

So a nurse was appointed and preparations were made to depart. Ronald was taking his own carriage with him, into which he could be lifted at ease and when all was arranged for the journey to the railway station, he called to his nurse and valet.

"Tell the man," he said, "to drive me over to Miss Charters!"

The man touched his hat. It was not for him to suggest that in doing so they would most likely lose the train.

The carriage stopped before the door. Without a moment's preparation, Winifred Charters found herself suddenly called upon to meet her lover. What could she say? What would he say? The two servants could not avoid hearing whatever they said.

"We little thought, Winnie, how long it would be before we met again," said the invalid sadly, holding out his hand.

"Little indeed! Are you better? You are going away?"

"Yes," more sadly still. "I have only stopped for a moment to say 'Good-bye.'"

"Good-bye. May you regain your health while you are away."

"My health will never be what it was."

"It may. You must look on the bright side for your friends' sake."

"Yes," he said.

He released her hand. His ring was not on it, he saw. And what conventional phrases she uttered; and how stately and unmoved she looked at him! But how beautiful she was—more than ever, he thought—so marble pale, with heavenly eyes, and the fair, shining hair that reflected the glory of the sun.

Oh, how Winnie wished to tell him the thoughts of her heart. But she must not appear to detain him. She stepped backwards when he released her hand. Not for anything would she let the attendant see her agitated at parting from the man who had been her lover for more than a year, the man who was leaving her now like any chance acquaintance.

"Please drive on," said Ronald quietly. "I thought to see your sister, Winnie. You will say 'Good-bye' for me?"

"Her good wishes," replied the girl, "will follow you with mine."

For an instant there was a wild, pathetic intreaty in his eyes. He must not go without—— She lifted her arms. Her lips parted. The horses stirred and the carriage moved. He was gone. Then, unable to control herself longer, she flew up the stairs to her tiny room and flung herself upon the bed, crying passionately.

The chilly autumnal twilight came on soon.

Lucy Charters was much concerned about her sister. Day by day she grew paler and more spiritless. Hope had left her life. Winnie folded her hands in listless apathy.

"Winnie, dear," said Lucy cheerfully, one morning. "I have a plan. I want you to accept Mrs. Delamere's invitation this winter."

"Oh, I couldn't. She only invites me because the children are fond of me. There is too much gaiety at her house for me."

"Well, the children won't hurt you; and if Mrs. Delamere does like gaiety, she is a bright, wholesome, sensible woman; she is just the tonic you need."

"And you, Lucy?"

"Well, this is my plan. I have had the offer of three boarders—the Ives girls and their father. I shall want your room for his study. Next summer we will go to some quiet seaside resort and spend the proceeds of my speculation."

Winnie sighed. She had not the spirit to remonstrate. A month or two later saw her staying with busy little Mrs. Delamere, forced, in spite of herself, to take an interest in the doings of the world. Mrs. Delamere did not understand the meaning of love-sick.

Slowly Winnie began to recuperate—both in body and heart. By degrees she began to forget how the whole world had seemed to slip out of view when she lost sight of Ronald White's carriage. Mrs. Delamere took her with her everywhere. She met nice women and agreeable men. She no longer cried on her pillow nightly. This, then, was her love test. This was the crucible in which her rejected love was to be proven.

Lucy Charters' speculation was successful. The Ives were profitable boarders. The girls were teachers, clever, and easily satisfied. Their father, unlike most bookworms and literary men, was seldom irritable. Lucy's housekeeping abilities made them more comfortable than they had ever been before.

When July came again, and with it the time for the projected stay at a quiet seaside watering-place, Lucy could hardly get free from her paying guests. Finally it was agreed that the Ives should remain and manage as best they could till Lucy's return.

"But Winnie is coming back with me," objected Lucy. "Your father could not dispense with his study."

Mr. Ives overheard them.

"My dear Miss Charters," he said cheerily. "'Sufficient unto the day,' you know. By the time your holiday is over we will make other arrangements."

Lucy and Winnie were at the seaside—the elder sister enjoying a well-deserved rest, the younger sister drifting along the current of such enjoyments as youth and beauty command even against one's will. She had many admirers—whom she neither encouraged nor repulsed.

Amid the train that followed her footsteps was a last winter's acquaintance—one Walter Grainger, a middle-aged successful stockbroker. His preference pleased her more than any other man she knew. He was no flatterer, but always thoughtful and attentive. Possibly she liked him. Yet when Lucy said: "Mr. Grainger is in love with you," she sneered that love was old-fashioned, and ridiculed the idea.

Lucy was right, however, though his declaration came sooner than she expected. Mr. Grainger had been telegraphed for, but the night before he left he asked Winnie to walk with him along the beach. It was a lovely moonlight night, and the conversation flowed into many topics as they wandered idly along the silvery sands. They seemed almost too good friends to behave like lovers.

A little boat lay high on the sands under the shelter of a cliff. They sat down in it, and in silence watched the long lines of waves as they rolled in glittering lengths and broke upon the sands.

Digitized by Google

"Miss Charters," said Mr. Grainger, at last, almost abruptly, "I have brought you to this spot this evening for a special purpose—to ask you to be my wife."

Winnie started violently. She had been thinking of Ronald White. She covered her face with her hands.

"Oh, why, why, do you ask me?"

"Why?"—taking her cold hands in his. "Why, dearest? Because I love you more tenderly than a whole life of devotion can make you aware of; because you are so dear and so precious to me that I want you for my very own."

He looked long and earnestly into the pale, fair face.

She could not repress a shiver.

"I wish you did not. I shall never marry anyone, Mr. Grainger."

He smiled. The remark seemed childish to him.

"I have been too abrupt, perhaps. I can wait and win your love patiently. We will talk of it no more to-night." Winnie was trembling with agitation.

"No—oh, no! We must end it here, Mr. Grainger. I have nothing to give—no affection to give anyone. My heart was bestowed on a man who did not want it. I shall never love again. Do not mistake me—I shall never alter."

Something came to the ears of both in the silence that followed—something like a moan. It must have been the tide or the wind among the rocks.

Walter Grainger stepped out of the boat.

"I would not willingly have pained you, Miss Charters. We may still be friends, I hope?"

She pressed his hand as he assisted her on to the sands. It was still early when they reached the hotel.

Mr. Grainger bade her "Good-bye." Lucy was playing cards.

Without being observed, she slipped out once more in the moonlight and retraced her steps. A shadow fell on the sands—not her own—and made her start.

It was a peculiar shadow! It was that of a man supported by crutches. Half alarmed, she turned suddenly and found herself face to face with Ronald White! Biting her lip, to check her emotion, she stood still before him.

"Is this my welcome, Winnie?"

The pathos in his voice dissolved her coldness. She uttered a cry and put out her hands. They were near the boat. By mutual instinct they approached it and took their seats.

"I heard every word just now, Winnie."

"You heard, then, what was not intended for your hearing. You have no right to recall it"

She turned suddenly and found herself face to face with Ronald White!

"Oh, Winnie, you are like ice to me. I would not recall it only that I am prevented from asking what, having heard from your lips, my soul yearns to do."

"You speak enigmas."

"Perhaps. And yet you understand that what I yearn for is your love, and what I am prevented from asking for is your hand."

"I understand nothing. There was no need to mention it."

"Do you not understand, Winnie, what it is that prevents me?"

"I know nothing of your reasons."

"Oh, Winnie, what but poverty could prevent me from speaking now?"

"Poverty?"

"Yes, Winnie. My wealth is gone. Shattered in body, ruined in purse, what right have I to ask you to share my lot?"

"What right?" she echoed. "Love does not scruple about rights."

"Love! Winnie, you do not love me now. You loved me strong and prosperous, but maimed and poor——"

"Ronald, Ronald, stop! I do love you!"

"My darling"—drawing her to his breast. "How I have wronged you."

Ronald White's story of his poverty, however, was a fiction. He had promised his sister that in this way he would test his darling's sincerity.

A year had passed away, but he had failed to forget her, and he had determined not to rest till he found her and offered his love.

Lucy went home to prepare for the wedding.

"After all, Mr. Ives," she said, "Winnie will not want her room."

"Ah, I thought so. But, you see, Miss Charters, I have already made other arrangements."

"Other arrangements," replied Lucy. "Whatever do you mean, Mr. Ives? Have you arranged to go somewhere else. I hope not."

"No, my dear, I want to stay here for always. I want you to marry me."

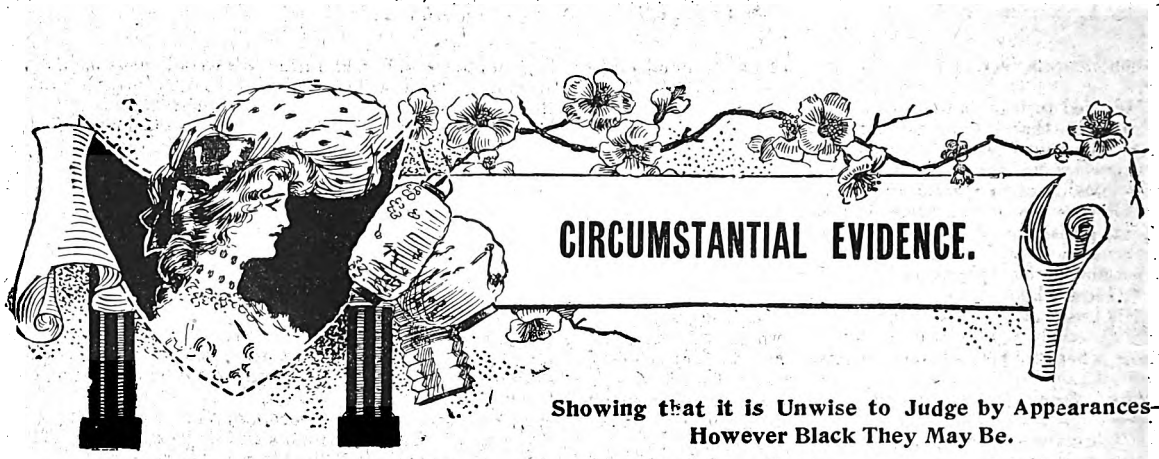
Lucy was not fluttered in the least. She smiled, and a slight flush tinged her cheeks not unbecomingly. She held out her hands to him and said:

"Thank you, Mr. Ives. I am quite willing to marry you."

And she did.

J. G. Jones.

Digitized by Google



CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

Showing that it is Unwise to Judge by Appearances—However Black They May Be.

ROBERT MALCOLM had never been called "Bob" by anyone until his recently-acquired wife, with a coquettish pretence of shyness, had so addressed him. He was a man with a great heart and a simple, kindly soul, whom early struggles had made reticent, and uncultured environment, awkward. Since success, by dint of hard work and boundless energy, had crowned his efforts, and he had become a wealthy and influential man, his reticence and awkwardness had been mistaken for pride and coldness.

He had no close associates, and his wife was the only person between whom and himself there had ever existed the least semblance of love. He could not recall that he had ever particularly desired anyone to call him "Bob," but after she had once pronounced the familiar nickname he had clung to the sound of it, had been thrilled at the remembrance of it and wondered why he had never thought of suggesting to any of his acquaintances that they should address him by that attractive name.

He had known his wife but a short time when he won her by his masterful wooing, which surprised no one so much as himself. He knew little of her past, and cared less. It was enough for him that he loved her, and that she had said that she loved him.

And now, at the end of six blissful months, he was sitting in his splendid library, perplexed and miserable, gloomily eyeing the embers of a grate fire, and trying to persuade himself that the shadow which threatened to wreck his future could be explained away if only he had the courage to ask her.

On coming home that afternoon he had gone to her sitting-room, the dainty furnishing of which was so subtly suggestive of her taste, and had found it empty. Turning to leave, he had seen a piece of note paper lying on the floor as though it had been brushed off her desk as she rose in a hurry. In stooping to replace it, his eye had caught two words, the beginning of a letter—"Dear Tom." Dear Tom! Could it be that there was a dear Tom in her life of whom he knew nothing? He knew she had no brothers and no cousins. He did not try to resist the temptation to read the letter, so he did that which reduced him to abject misery.

The letter read:

"DEAR TOM,—If I were to be asked why I am writing to you, I should have to admit that I am yielding to an impulse. My whole life has been made up of impulses, and I never battled with them but once—alas, the very time I should have yielded! You will know what I mean—that night you renounced me—renounced me while your blood was on fire with love for me, which I knew and felt and revelled in—when your eyes dumbly begged me to refuse to be renounced, and your lips told me it would be better to part. Ah, if I had only yielded then to the impulse to tell you I loved you well enough to share your poverty and the task of caring for your poor, helpless old father!

"How well I remember that dear, delightful, cruel summer in Dorking! Mother had scraped and saved that I might disguise our poverty, and so not disgrace Aunt Sarah, who, as you know, was a great stickler for appearances. When I bade the poor, shabby, unselfish mother 'Good-bye,' and started off in my new finery, I hated myself for my selfishness, but when once I was behind the beautiful, unsympathetic walls of Aunt Sarah's domain, I was small enough to be glad that I was sailing under false colours and wearing clothes to which I had no right. And so I shut my eyes to the mental vision of mother in her shabby clothes, with her tear-dimmed eyes and her work-worn fingers. Oh, mother, mother, whose beautiful wrinkled old hands I saw last folded peacefully across your breast! Forgive me, Tom—in thinking of her whose life was one long sacrifice I forget everything.

"Well—you came, dear, and you stepped into my heart with that first smile on your brave, sunny face. Then, afterwards, Aunt Sarah, when I told her of our betrothal, said in her icy, sneering tones, 'I congratulate you upon your discretion. It is a fitting thing that you should marry Tom Spencer, and let your early poverty be merged into middle-aged and elderly poverty. As Tom Spencer's wife you will have the satisfaction of knowing that you have before you such a life as your mother has led, only intensified, since your life will be encumbered by his helpless, paralytic old father.

"Tom dear, do not utterly despise me when I tell you that her words had their weight. I did not fear the poverty, for I knew you were bound to succeed, if only, dear one, you were not hampered in your career by your father. I knew you were fond of him, and that while he lived you would keep him with you—that even I could not influence you to send him away. So when you told me we had better part, I offered no protestation. I knew your heart was aching, and that you needed comforting words from me. I knew I had to speak only one word to break down the barrier, and have you take me to your heart for ever. I did not speak that word. Though my heart cried out to you that I could not leave you, that I loved you well enough to share your burden, I did not speak that word.

"I am married now. My husband loves me, and I am rich, beyond my fondest expectation. I have all those things which my luxurious and expensive tastes craved—yet I am not happy! Better indeed—

A book of verses underneath the bough,
A jug of wine, a loaf of bread—and thou
Beside me singing in the wilderness—
The wilderness was Paradise enow!

"This is my farewell, dear one. You know now—every word in this letter has told you—what you are to me. Yet you will not misunderstand—you will not come to me.

"It is over, Tom, and——"

Here the writing ended abruptly.

Robert Malcolm was a loyal man, and even though the evidence was against her, he refused to believe his wife guilty of all that the letter implied. He told himself that if he dared to ask her for an explanation, she would give it, and it would be satisfactory. If he dared! To ask her would be to confess a dishonourable act, and also to confess a lack on confidence in her.

Digitized by Google

He tried to formulate explanations in his own head—tried to imagine that he had no cause for the misery which was gnawing at his heart strings; but always he came back to the point where he started, with the wretched conviction that his wife loved another man staring him in the face.

While he was sitting there the door opened noiselessly. A slight, girlish figure stole across the thick carpet and behind his chair. Two soft, small hands were clasped before his eyes, and a voice whispered:

"Guess who it is!"

His heart gave a great bound, and he took the hands down and kissed them. Then he drew her down to the arm of the chair, where her face was on a level with his own, and solemnly and silently looked into her eyes for a long time before he spoke. Finally, as if satisfied with what he saw there, he asked:

"Have you been shopping?"

She seemed surprised at the trivial question following so closely upon the scrutiny she had undergone, and said:

"Is that all, Mr. Bluebeard? Gracious, how you scared me! I expected to hear you say in sepulchral tones, 'Woman there is guilt in your face—where have you hidden the body?' And instead, after that soul-searching gaze, you ask the common-place question in common-place tones, 'Have you been shopping?'"

With a sigh of content and love and relief, he threw his arms round her and drew her close to him for a moment. Then she seated herself opposite him in a low chair, where the firelight fell on her face, bringing out all its charm. It was an attractive face, with ever-varying expression, delicate in contour and colouring, with a rather insignificant nose, a red mouth ever ready to curve into gracious smiles, and big, wondrous grey eyes which glowed and darkened with emotion, and were shaded by heavy dark lashes. The whole was overtopped with a mass of rippling chestnut hair, with a glint of gold upon it.

In the magnetism of her presence her husband became almost happy once more—until the memory of that letter came back to sting him.

As he watched her face, he decided to try some judicious questioning, hoping to elicit the information which he longed, yet feared, to possess. She had been describing some poor woman she had seen and materially aided that day, and when she had finished he asked her suddenly:

"Adèle, were you ever in Dorking?"

She opened wide her eyes and answered:

"No, dear—why do you ask?"

"Just curiosity." Then, after a pause, during which he studied the fire and she studied him, he added: "Did you ever know a man named Tom Spencer?"

She laughed softly, and folding her dainty hands replied:

"Now am I indeed on the rack. Why torture my innocent soul with the curiosity to know your reason for placing me in the witness-box?"

At her irrelevant answer his doubts rose again, and he rather sternly repeated his question, with a request for a direct reply.

"Tom Spencer—Tom Spencer—where have I seen or heard that name?" she queried softly, as if to herself. "I certainly don't know any Tom Spencer, but I believe I have heard the name somewhere."

This puzzled while it relieved him.

"And now, you dear, cross ogre, are there any more conundrums for me? Because, if you have finished, I will go and dress for dinner; and I would advise you to do the same, instead of sitting there and letting the fire bake your brain. If you don't look out, your Tom Smith, or Tom What's-his-name, will take possession of your poor wits."

He laughed responsively, and watched her disappear through the door; then to himself he said:

"What a fool I was to doubt her! But the letter—pshaw! I will think no more of it." So saying, he took her advice and went to dress for dinner.

A month passed, and during this time Robert Malcolm tried to detect a flaw in his wife's devotion, to justify him in the doubt which would creep in whenever he thought of that letter. Try as he might, he could not rid himself of the unsavoury recollection. But it was in vain that he sought an explanation in her manner. There was nothing about her to suggest that wealth had palled upon her, or that without poverty and Tom Spencer her life was a blank. She was, as ever, airily affectionate, daintily tyrannical, flippant, and serious in one breath, with that "infinite variety" which was her greatest charm.

One night, when they had returned from a dance, he decided to make a full confession to her, and to ask for an explanation. She had thrown herself into an easy chair, and looked even fairer than usual. She was pale from fatigue, and there were shadows about her lustrous eyes which only intensified her loveliness.

Making a final effort he began, and rapidly he told her all—all about the letter, his doubts and despair, and the unhappiness he felt whenever he had thought of the matter.

While he was talking, she was looking down and twisting the rings on her slender fingers. When he finished she looked up at him with a slow, amused smile creeping over her face.

"Now I understand those questions you asked me about Tom Spencer. Yes, that was the name—and I know now why the name seemed familiar to me."

She paused musingly, and he said hurriedly and hopefully:

"Well, what of Tom Spencer? Who is he?"

"He is a creature of my own imagination; and once having created Thomas, I straightway forgot him. When you asked me that day, I wondered where I had heard the name."

"What do you mean?" he demanded.

"Only this, Bob—but first you must promise not to laugh at me." She stopped, looking at him anxiously. He nodded impatiently, and she went on. "Some time ago I conceived the idea of being literary. I thought out a story, and decided that I would depart from the usual routine and have it told in a series of letters. You got hold of the beginning of the story. I was called away that day, and never thought again of my literary venture."

He drew her up to him, and then, with his arms round her, he asked in a husky whisper:

"Adèle, will you forgive me?"

For answer she put her arms round his neck and then replied softly:

"If you'll promise never to doubt me again."

The promise and the forgiveness were consummated in one long kiss.

* * * * *

A week later, in a Surrey paper, Robert Malcolm happened upon the following:

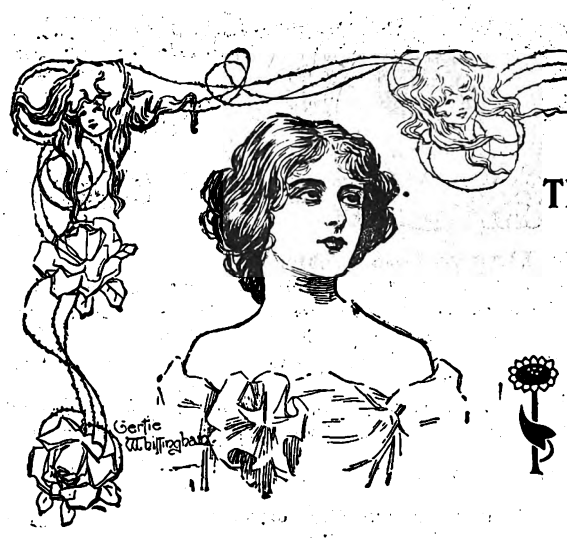
Dorking, April 23rd.—Mr. William Spencer, an old and respected citizen of this city, died yesterday afternoon. The deceased had long been a sufferer from paralysis, but his death was unexpected. He leaves one son, Mr. Thomas Spencer, with whom he lived, to mourn his loss.

Esther Maynes.

ARE YOU IN LOVE?

If so, you will be sure to want to know the best kind of present to give your fiancé or fiancée, whichever the case may be. More important than this, though, is for you to know if you are really suited to each other, and are likely to be happy if you marry. If you want to know this you should each of you send a specimen of your handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped, addressed envelope, to Ranee, 23 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., in return for which you will each receive an accurate delineation of your character, from which, by comparing the two, you will be able to draw all the conclusions necessary.

Digitized by Google



THE COURTING OF MONICA.

Telling of a True and a False Lover.

ALTHOUGH the little village of Olden was beginning to look bright with the green of early Spring, down here on the beach all was grey—sands, rocks, sky, even the water had the same dreary tint. Not a gleam of other colour, except that of the crimson shawl, which the girl, sitting on a ledge of rock, had wrapped round her.

Laurence Dare, coming along the road which ran along above the beach, saw the patch of red and paused.

At sight of her Dare's heart had given a great throb of joy. It was so long, so long since he had seen her. He made a few strides and stood beside her.

"Monica," he said softly.

The girl turned her head with a quick movement.

"Oh, Laurence."

There was a displeased tone in her voice, and her brows came together in a frown as she regarded him.

After a silence of some moments, which Dare spent in devouring eagerly with his eyes every line of her lovely profile he began:

"Monica, you are cruel; you have not let me see you once all this long winter. I have been down from town so often, and tried again and again to see you, but each time that I called you had just gone out. But Chance has been good to me to-day. I have caught you."

The girl made no answer. He went on:

"Last summer you gave me a faint hope that in time you would listen to me. What have you to say to me now; have you not thought of me all these long months?"

She turned round to him, her eyes full of tears.

"I was wrong to let you think you might hope, Laurence, for I can't do as you wish. It seems wrong for me to listen to you. Think, I belong to Allen; I was to have been his wife. He was always talking of cousin Laurence; you seemed cousin Laurence to me, too. Don't you see? I belong to Allen; I can't marry you."

"But Allen is not——"

"Hush; we don't know; he must be living."

"Monica," he said, with great gentleness of voice, "think, it is four years; he was to have returned in a year."

"I must be faithful to him."

"This is nonsense, Monica," he said, half-angrily. "If Allen is living," he went on, "why have we not heard from him all these years? Are you going to waste your life in this little village and give up all chance of happiness for a fanciful idea of being bound to him? And think of me; I have loved you so long. Come to me, I shall love you so much that you must love me in return. Come, I swear that you shall never regret it, Monica."

"I must not listen, Laurence. I wish that you did not care for me."

"I can't help caring for you. I think I have loved you since the first day I saw you, and now that you are free——"

Before he could stop her she had darted away. She went along swiftly until she knew that she was out of sight.

Her thoughts were in a whirl. Why should she not yield? She knew that her happiness would be secure with this strong, tender man. He thought she did not care. In the old days she had compared Allen with him, and always to the former's disadvantage. For after the first glamour of their engagement she had seen the shallowness and selfishness of Allen's nature.

And, these last years, how the tenderness of his nature had shone out! What care he had given to Allen's desolate mother! He had almost filled the place of her son.

When Allen had gone away for a year, she had promised to be ready to marry him upon his return. But the year had passed, and other months had grown into years, and he had not returned. They had had no news of him after that last letter, written seven months from his departure.

The only reasonable solution of the mystery was that he was dead. His mother believed it, but Monica did not. She had promised to wait for him; she dared not break that promise.

Dare did not again see Monica, although each time he visited his aunt during the Spring he called at the parsonage. But Monica always was out.

One day in June Monica was returning home from a walk. Her way was in the neighbourhood of Allen's mother's house. As it was still early in the afternoon, she decided to go and pay her a call. She had not gone to see her often of late, through fear of meeting Laurence.

She felt that she would run no risk of meeting him this afternoon, he having visited his aunt the previous week. On reaching the house she found the hall door open. She knocked lightly and without waiting for a response, walked into the little breakfast-room, where she knew Mrs. Dare was in the habit of sitting.

But at the threshold Monica paused, for there stood Laurence by the window with an open letter in his hand. His aunt sat near him, apparently in a state of great excitement.

As she saw Monica she cried out:

"He lives, Monica, he lives; my boy lives! Come in and hear the letter."

Monica looked from her to Dare in bewilderment. She had turned very white. Laurence went up to her and drew her to a chair. He, too, was pale.

"Is it true?" gasped Monica, at length.

"I received the letter this morning, and came down by the first train."

"Where is he—I don't understand."

"In America."

Monica looked at him confusedly.

"Why—why haven't I—but I have been out all the afternoon. I suppose that I shall find a letter at home."

Dare did not reply. His aunt was still crying. She now looked up at Laurence.

"Finish the letter, Laurence. Listen, Monica; our Allen is still living."

Dare had folded the letter and was putting it into his pocket.

"There is little more of importance, dear aunt."

"But Monica must hear it, Laurence. Monica, child, we'll be happy now. Read the letter to her, Laurence."

Digitized by Google

"My dear aunt, you must try to calm yourself, or you will be ill."

Monica was puzzled by Dare's evident desire not to read the letter to her.

"I shall go home now," said Monica. "Perhaps there is a letter for me."

Laurence had left the room and stood at the entrance door.

"I am coming with you," he said, as Monica came out.

Dare regarded the girl stealthily as they walked along. He marvelled at the unimpassioned manner in which she had received the news that Allen was alive. She was still very white, and there was a strained look in her face. Not the expression of joy he would have expected to see.

"Monica," began Dare hesitatingly, "I—do not think that you will find a letter from Allen."

She stopped still and looked at him.

"What is it, Laurence? You are hiding something. What is the mystery? Why did you not wish to read the letter?"

"Monica, I believe you are a brave girl. Call up all your pride now."

She gazed at him with wondering eyes.

"Laurence, what is it?"

He looked round hastily. It was but a short distance to the rocks on the beach, and the place was deserted.

"Let us go down there. I cannot talk to you here."

She followed him submissively. Thoughts of their last interview at this place came to her mind. Allen was alive, and she, wretched girl, was not glad. She did not love him. It was Laurence that she loved, but she must be faithful to Allen. Laurence must never guess what a wicked girl she was.

Dare seated her in a sheltered position and stood looking at her, a world of compassion in his eyes.

"Monica, I would give my life to spare you this. Allen is a scoundrel."

He drew the letter from his pocket, opening it slowly; and Monica said, with a touch of imperiousness in her voice:

"Let me read it!"

He gave it to her, and she read. She passed hastily over the preliminary lines. But what was this?

"I shall wait until later, Laurence, old boy, to give you the details of all these years. Briefly, the enterprise on which I came out here failed. I kept on trying others, hoping to achieve some measure of success before returning home, but one failure succeeded another. Finally I was taken ill with rheumatic fever.

"The woman at whose house I was staying nursed me through it, and her daughter, one of the sweetest girls in the State, helped her. Call me all the hard names you wish, Laurence, I'll not try to excuse myself, but I fell in love with her and we were married. I was a coward, I know, but she loved me to distraction, and we are very happy.

"Believe me, I have not been easy when I thought of my mother and Monica. But I met Melton last week out here. He told me that you all believed me dead, and that Monica was reported to be engaged to you, so she is consoled and will forgive me.

"That is why I am writing to disclose my whereabouts. I am fairly prosperous, and shall have mother come out here immediately. I know she will forgive me, and she will find the sweetest little daughter-in-law in the country. You will suit Monica far better than I should have done. You have the same high ideals of duty, and all that sort of thing. I confess to living on a lower plane."

Dare stood looking at her sadly, reviling Allen in his heart.

"My darling, if I could have spared you this," he said.

Presently Monica looked up at him and said tremulously:

"Laurence, I tried all along to be faithful to Allen, but——"

"But what, Monica?"

She stood up and looked into his eyes a fleeting glance but—it was enough for Dare.

Emily Windsor.

Your Editor Chats.

The Eleventh Love Problem.

I CONSIDER that the best solution to the Unsolved Love Problem, entitled "Brian Cresswell's Choice," was sent by Mr. Ernest McClatchie, 28 Edith Road, West Kensington, London, and I therefore award to him the guinea I offered.

The name of the winner of the twelfth and last problem, "The Test of Ruth Lawson," will be announced as soon as possible.

Our Whitsuntide Holiday Number.

NEXT week's issue will be a splendid Whitsun Holiday number. It will be full of interesting stories and clever illlustrations, and will be the very paper for you to take with you if you are making a train journey. One of the charms of Short Stories is that, the stories being complete, you can read it at any time you have half an hour to spare without the risk of losing the "connection" of the story, as you are liable to do when a story is long-winded and drawn-out.

The Signature Competition.

EXPERT examiners are now very busy checking the entries for the Signature Competition that closed a fortnight ago, and as soon as ever it is possible I shall announce the names of the fortunate winners.

A Proverb to Heed.

THE old Latin motto, "Bis dat qui cito dat." ("He gives twice who gives quickly"), is one of the truest of all proverbs. I wish that you would demonstrate the force of it to the benefit of the Fresh Air Fund. Just send along one ninepence now, and afterwards follow it up by another. Ninepence is such a small amount that scarcely any of my readers would appreciably miss it. And yet this ninepence will work such wonders if properly spent. It will afford one poor child a whole day's outing in the beautiful country that he never—or seldom—has a chance to see. The organisers of the Fresh Air Fund watch over the welfare of each child for that one day, and see that he or she thoroughly enjoys himself or herself. The actual cost of conveyance to and from the country and the necessary food monopolise the whole of the ninepence—all other expenses are borne by the organisers themselves.

Will you not send in just a small donation—just what you think you can afford to give—for the sake of those children of the gutter who long for the warm sunshine and the open air? Do!

All monies received will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly, and they should be sent to the Hon. Secretary, Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

"Mr. JAMES."

A Pretty Story with a Pleasant Ending.

It was a lovely day in July when Arthur Hayes came into possession of "The Poplars" through the death of an uncle whom he had never seen, and had hardly heard of even.

Up to the present he had been a struggling journalist, scarcely earning sufficient to keep body and soul together, and here he was, suddenly made master of one of the richest estates in the country.

Sir George Hayes had a daughter, a beautiful girl of nineteen, but, as the estates were strictly entailed on the male descendants of the family, he was unable to do anything further than settle an allowance on her of £100 a year, making her the ward of the future Baronet until she should attain the age of twenty-one.

Ida Hayes had never been brought up to expect that she would inherit anything at her father's death, and she had been given a thorough training (at her own express wish) in secretarial duties. Lady Hayes had been much against this course, but Ida had overcome her prejudices, and eventually had her own way.

"You know, mamma," she had said, "if anything happened to papa, we should have to do something, and no lady need be ashamed of earning her living in so pleasant a way!"

"Tut! tut, child! You will be married long before anything of that description happens, I hope!"

Whereupon Ida had wisely held her peace, and said nothing, but she had mentally vowed that, come what might, she would never marry anyone simply for a home or for money.

So it came to pass that, when she had reached the age of nineteen, Sir George had died, after a long illness, and his wife, who had nursed him herself devotedly through the entire eighteen months of his sickness, died three days afterwards, leaving Ida orphaned, and practically homeless!

Ida was, as before stated, a lovely girl. Tall, of a slender, perfect figure, and a queenly carriage, she had golden-brown hair, large, expressive violet eyes, a small, well-shaped nose and mouth with pearly teeth, and a "roseleaf" complexion; she was truly a picture any artist would delight in!

She was not, like many young ladies in her station of life, proud or haughty. No, Ida had a sympathetic and gentle heart, and, what is more, she was an earnest and God-fearing Christian, beloved of all for her kindness and gentle tact, especially for those in sickness or distress.

When Mr. Ramsey, the old family lawyer, had approached her with words of sympathy for her position and altered prospects, she had replied, with a rare, sweet smile:

"Not so, Mr. Ramsey, I am no worse off now than I was before. You know, I have never expected anything, and I have had a thorough business training. I am young and strong, and I am not ashamed to work!"

And the worthy man had left her, inwardly wondering at her quiet and unaltered demeanour, and saying to himself, "A queer lassie, but the best i' the world!" (for he was a Scotsman).

Arthur Hayes had heard of the Baronet's illness from a friend residing in the district, and he had also heard of Ida from this same friend, but, not being a "ladies' man," he had taken little notice of the enthusiastic description.

On receiving the news from Mr. Ramsey he at once made arrangements to visit "The Poplars." Alighting at the little station he perceived a small trap in the distance, coming along at a pretty good pace, and on inquiring from the station-master, learnt that the said trap belonged to "The Poplars." He knew that it could not be coming to meet him, for he had not advised anyone of his coming.

He sauntered along the high road leisurely, when suddenly the pony reared as a large white bird flew across the road, right under its eyes, and set off towards Hayes at a terrific rate. As the trap neared him, swaying violently, Hayes perceived that its only occupant was a young lady, who had evidently dropped the reins, and was clinging to the side of the vehicle for dear life. Pulling himself together, he waited, and as the pony got near enough he sprang at the bridle. The animal reared and plunged, and finally attempted to bolt again; but Hayes hung on for all he was worth. Then suddenly the wheel caught in a rut, and was thrown violently to one side. Quick as thought, Hayes released the horse's head, and turning caught the young lady in his arms, just in time to prevent her being thrown on the ground, letting the trap and pony fall clear into the ditch.

It was some moments before either could speak, when Hayes gasped out, as he released the terrified girl:

"Thank God!"

She tried to smile bravely as she held out a trembling hand, saying in an almost inaudible voice:

"How am I to thank you, sir? You have saved my life. I cannot be grateful enough!"

"I was only too pleased that I was at hand!" he replied courteously.

"But your arm!" she cried, noting for the first time that it hung limply by his side. "You have hurt it!"

"I am afraid I have!" he replied ruefully. "It is only a sprain, though, I think—nothing serious."

"I know a little about sprains," she said shyly. "Will you let me look at it?"

"Indeed it is nothing!" he replied hastily. "I shall do very well, I think, and——"

"No, no; you must let me see!" she said imperiously, and he had perforce to submit.

Passing her hand swiftly and gently along the wrist and arm, she found, to her dismay, that he had dislocated his elbow, and he could not suppress a slight groan, although her touch was almost as light as air.

"Oh, dear! I am afraid this is quite beyond me!" she exclaimed. "It is five miles to "The Poplars," and eight miles to the nearest doctor's. I am afraid we shall have to walk it, too, judging from poor Charlie's appearance and the state of the trap."

Digitized by Google

At that moment a labourer's cart turned into view, and very soon reached the scene of disaster. With the help of the two men who occupied it the trap and pony were extricated from the ditch in a very dilapidated condition, the trap being minus of both wheels and Charlie lame. What was to be done now?

"It does not really matter about me," said Hayes, "I can walk; but what about you and the pony and trap?"

"We be goin' towards 'Th' Poplars,' Miss Ida," said one of the men. "Mebbe you'd not care fur a lift?"

"Indeed, Thomas, we shall be very pleased, if you will take us!" exclaimed Ida, smiling gratefully.

The end of it was that Ida and Hayes got into the cart, and the trap was lifted in also, or what remained of it, Charlie being tethered behind, looking very shamefaced, and in about half an hour this strange procession reached "The Poplars."

An elderly woman, in black satin, whom Hayes took to be the housekeeper, met them in the hall, anxiously inquiring:

"Whatever has happened, dearie? Has there been an accident?"

"Yes, Nurse; Charlie reared at something, and this gentleman has done me an everlasting favour, by saving my life, although he won't acknowledge the fact in the least!"

"Oh, dear, I never did trust Charlie, dear; but how grateful we are to you, sir!" she exclaimed, turning to Hayes.

"It is nothing," said Hayes; "there is a saying, you know, that 'beauty in distress is a pleasure to men,' and I can assure you that such is the case!"

"Come along in," laughed Ida, blushing. "Nurse, dear, Mr——?"

"James," supplied Hayes wickedly.

"Mr. James has dislocated his elbow in stopping Charlie, and I think Dr. Bland ought to see it directly."

Nurse waited a moment to send the two men whose aid had been so opportune round to the kitchen for "refreshments," and then followed the two indoors.

"No," Hayes was saying, "I have just arrived, and was going to spend the week here, at the inn. The sea air is so bracing here!"

"Oh, but I hope you will stay with us now, and we can show you heaps of things here. It will be a poor return for all you have done for us!"

"Yes, indeed," rejoined Nurse; "and your arm, you know, will require attention, which you would not get at the inn."

"I have sent Carter for Dr. Bland," said Ida, "so you will have to wait and see him now," as Hayes made a gesture of protest.

The upshot of it was that Hayes, after the elbow had been satisfactorily "set" by the doctor (who had known him since he was a boy at school, and who nearly let the cat out of the bag, but stopped the words on seeing a ferocious frown on the face of his patient), was installed at "The Poplars" until he had to return to London.

Very soon Ida left the room, to change her dress, which had got badly torn and dirtied in the skirmish; and Hayes, wishing to be alone with Dr. Bland for a few moments, said he felt very thirsty, and Nurse bustled off to see about tea.

"Now, what does all this mystery mean, sir?" exclaimed the doctor. "I suppose you're 'Sir Arthur' now?"

"No," replied Arthur, "I'm simply plain 'Mr. James, journalist, of Fleet Street, London!'"

"What do you mean?"—sharply.

"Just what I say, my friend! By-the-bye, I suppose that is the old Baronet's daughter, is it not?"

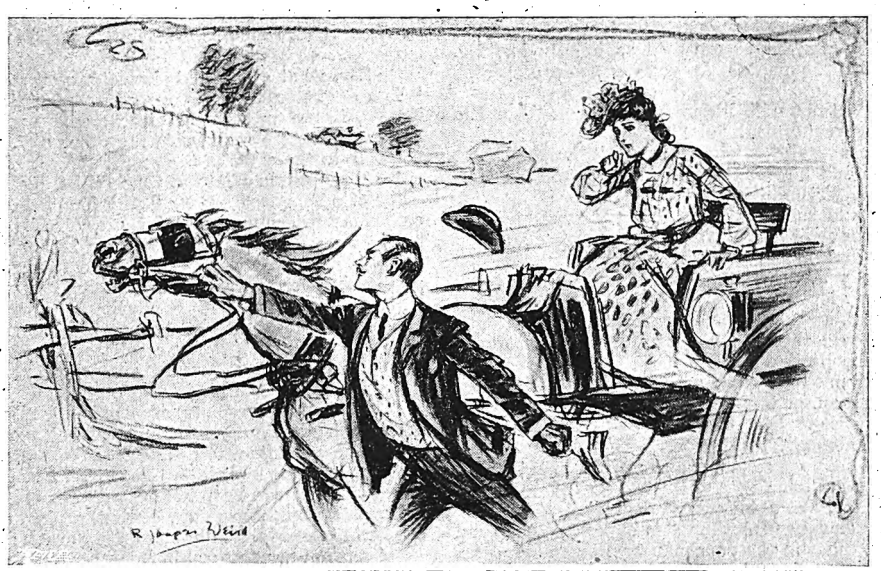
"Yes," replied Dr. Bland, who was an old friend of the family. "That is your cousin Ida, and a better or sweeter girl never breathed!"

"So I should think!" exclaimed Arthur warmly. "But she must not suspect that I am the new Baronet, and her guardian, Bland. I want to make her acquaintance incog. Understand?" And he looked at the doctor significantly.

"All right, my boy, I won't spoil sport!" laughed the doctor, with a twinkle in his kind, grey eyes. "Love at first sight, eh? Well, you'll be a lucky chap if you win her, 'Mr. James'!"

"Here, I say, shut up, Bland!" cried Arthur, flushing to the roots of his curly brown hair. "It's too bad of you, really, you know, and——"

At that moment Nurse re-entered the room, bearing the tea-tray, and followed by Ida, who was now clad in a gown of soft, clinging black material, with a spray of snow-white flowers in her belt.



Hayes sprang for the bridle and hung on for all he was worth.

Dr. Bland, having no pressing engagements just then, stayed to partake of a friendly cup, and afterwards departed, saying he was going towards the station, and would see that Hayes' portmanteau was sent on.

This, however, was rather a puzzling undertaking when he arrived at the station, for the label bore the name "Arthur James Hayes!" However, the worthy doctor was not to be beaten, and, after some little trouble, he succeeded in completely obliterating the last name, and triumphantly dispatched the porter with his burden, smiling to himself the while, for he had never thought that Arthur would have acted so, having almost set him down in his own mind as a confirmed bachelor, although the lad had only reached the age of twenty-nine!

* * * * * *

Three months had passed, and Arthur was still an inmate of "The Poplars." Nor did he seem inclined to quit that hospitable roof. He had written to his solicitor, telling him that he was unable to do anything definite for the present, but would communicate with him later. In the meantime, he hoped that the present occupant of "The Poplars" would continue there, at least for the present, until some arrangement could be come to with regard to his ward, and other pending matters.

Digitized by Google

This Ida was very glad of, for she had not yet secured an appointment as secretary, although she had made strenuous efforts to do so. Her youth and inexperience, too, stood much in her way.

She had been the almost constant companion of Arthur since he came to "The Poplars," finding him a most agreeable talker, for he had travelled a good deal in his capacity as journalist, and he was nothing loth to relate some of his adventures as war correspondent to his fair companion.

The days were now getting rather chilly, and the evenings drawing in, for the first week of November had already passed, It happened that, one evening, Ida was seated at the piano. singing softly to herself that lovely old ballad, "When Other Lips and Other Hearts," when Arthur entered the room silently, and stood behind her until she had finished the song, letting her hands linger over the keys at the concluding bars.

When she rose she was startled to find him standing there, and exclaimed laughingly:

"Whatever do you want to creep in so quietly for, Mr. James, like a thief in the night! Do you want to run off with something?"

"Yes," replied Arthur, with his soul in his eyes, "but I'm afraid it will be rather a difficult job!"

"You will never make a good burglar," laughed Ida, dropping her eyes and blushing vividly, "if that is the view you take of things, Sir Faintheart!"

That was quite sufficient for Hayes. In another moment he was by the side of the chair into which Ida had sank, exclaiming:

"Ida, can you give me the slightest hope, darling? You must know I love you, dearest. Dare I hope that you will consent to share my lot some day? Tell me you care for me just a little, dearest, and I will be content!"

Ida raised her eyes shyly to his face, and then dropped them again, while he pleaded:

"Ida, do not say me nay—not just yet, at least. Perhaps I have spoken too soon, or is it that you do not care to marry a struggling journalist? Oh! Ida, my darling, cannot you love me just a little bit?"

She looked up bravely now, murmuring in a sweet voice, which was scarcely audible:

"Not a little, dear, but a very great deal!"

"My darling!" exclaimed Arthur, "is it possible that you consent to become the wife of a poor man? Remember, dear, I have nothing beyond what I earn as journalist. It would mean, perhaps, waiting for years ere we could build a home."

"Yes," she replied, in the same tone, "I love you, Arthur, and I am young, you know, and can work too!" Then she looked up suddenly with: "But my guardian, dear. I do not know how he will take this. I have not even seen him, and you know I may not marry until I am twenty-one without his consent."

"Never mind the guardian, dear, we must overcome his objections somehow," said Arthur, feeling very guilty; "do not let any doubts sully our happinesss, dearest!"

Here he drew off a small signet ring from his little finger, and slipping it on her left hand, he said:

"That will serve until another is got, darling!" kissing her fondly the while.

The next day Arthur announced his intention of running up to London again, much to Ida's regret.

"You know, darling, my principals are getting impatient, and it would never do for me to get into their bad books now!" To which Ida was reluctantly compelled to agree.

Three days later, Arthur wrote apprising his solicitor (Mr. Ramsey) of his intention of going down to "The Poplars" in a day or two, if convenient, to which letter he received a reply that Miss Hayes would be very pleased to welcome her guardian on Thursday, and hoped that he would be well impressed with the place.

Arthur smiled somewhat at this reply, and took the morning train to Cranfield Glen the next day (Thursday), arriving at the familiar little station about two in the afternoon.

On ringing the bell, he was admitted by a new butler, much to his relief, for he did not want to be recognised yet. He sent his card up to Ida, who very soon came into the room.

"Arthur! Oh, I am so glad!" she exclaimed. "But," looking round, "where is my guardian? I was told he was here."

"And so he is!" replied Arthur.

"But I don't see him," said Ida.

"Darling, don't you understand? I am Sir Arthur Hayes, and——"

"But you said you were Mr. Arthur James, and a journalist?" she said wonderingly, but smiling mischievously the while.

"That is perfectly true, dear. My name is Arthur James Hayes, and up to the present I have been earning my living as a journalist. I thought of coming over here the day you upset the trap, but changed my mind as I thought I should like to have a look round first without being recognised. You know the rest, dear, and I—why, whatever are you laughing at, Ida?" as he looked round and saw that she was standing by the window, her shoulders shaking with suppressed laughter.

"Why, what a dear old simpleton you are!" she laughed. "You ought to have guarded your linen more carefully, sir, if you did not want to be discovered. Look," holding up a handkerchief, "I found this the other day, after you left!" pointing to the mark in the corner "A. J. Hayes."

"Then you knew all the time?" he questioned, colouring.

"Not all the time, dear; I only found this after you left us on Friday afternoon. Oh, base deceiver!"

But there was no trace of anger in her voice at the said deception, and Arthur sprang up, catching her in his arms, and kissing her repeatedly, exclaiming:

"You're not angry then, darling? I was afraid I should not win you in the rôle of Baronet and guardian, so I had to resort to the next best means of managing matters!"

"You know I always said you would never make a good burglar!" laughed Ida.

"You don't deserve her, my fine fellow!" was the comment of Dr. Bland, who was summoned the next day to attend one of the servants who had been taken suddenly ill.

"All the same!" retorted Arthur, "I've got her, and what is more, I mean to keep her!"

But Ida would have none of that, saying, as the worthy old doctor imprinted a kindly kiss on her cheek:

"I am not worthy of him, doctor, but I mean to try and make him a good wife, with God's help!"

Twelve months later they were married, and started off on a Continental tour for their honeymoon, the happiest pair that one could wish to see.

Una C. Brown.

A ROYAL PANTOMIME.

Admission—SIXPENCE.

IT isn't every day that you have an opportunity of seeing a pantomime for the modest sum of sixpence. But just now you have the opportunity of seeing Cinderella and the Magic Slipper—not the old Cinderella that you were told about as children, but quite a new one with a new slipper—and getting a lot of amusement and enjoyment out of it, for just that amount of money.

Cinderella and the Magic Slipper is the pantomime that was performed early this year at Chatsworth when the Duke of Devonshire entertained Their Majesties the King and Queen with regal magnificence. The little play was specially written for the occasion, and specially performed by a caste of well-known Royal and Society personages. It was a brilliant success, and thoroughly delighted the distinguished company who witnessed its production.

Therefore, get your sixpence ready and buy the May Pearson's Magazine, where it is reproduced for the benefit of the general public. And don't waste time, but make sure of an "early door" by making the best of your way to the nearest bookstall.

Digitized by Google

- A - Burglar's Romance.

Relating how Mr. Emley Changed his Name to Mr. Smith and Lived in Clover for a Short Time.

Mr. Emley was a burglar. He was, however, a select burglar, an artist in his profession.

On a very dark night one March he walked up the front steps of the finest house in Castletown. The house had been sold a few weeks before to a gentleman in France, and Mr. Emley's reasons for visiting the place before its owner returned from abroad were known only to himself.

He was a cool man, never taken unawares, prepared for any situation which might present itself, and if on that dark night he was surprised to see the door before him suddenly open, no one would have guessed it. Certainly the servant on the inside of the threshold did not. He started back in dismay, believing it to be his new and unknown master who stood confronting him.

"Good evening," said Mr. Emley, raising his hat.

"Wh-h-hy, we didn't expect you for several days yet, sir," stammered the servant.

"Indeed!"

"And nothing is ready, sir; but if you will come in, we can make hasty arrangements."

Mr. Emley stepped into the hall, and the servant turned on the electric lights. A sumptuously furnished room was revealed, a servant in correct uniform, and a tall, brown-eyed gentleman of about thirty-eight years of age.

He wore a tan overcoat and a high silk hat. The servant was greatly impressed with these evident proofs of gentility. He spoke reverently.

"The side room with the bay window is nearest ready, sir. If you would care to go in there——"

"It will do very nicely," said Mr. Emley. "I should have let you know I was coming, but really the idea never occurred to me."

The side room was eminently satisfactory. It was exactly the kind of a room that Mr. Emley had often, with pangs of envy, seen other men sleep in. To sleep in one himself had seemed an impossible dream, but it was fast assuming a reality, a common sureness, that charmed him.

"Would you like something to eat, sir?" suggested the servant.

"I am hungry, and ah—ah——"

"Jenkinson, sir."

"Thanks. If you have something to drink, Jenkinson! It is a trifle raw outdoors. And—by the way, has any letter come for me lately?"

This was an excellent stroke of diplomacy on Mr. Emley's part. He was anxious to know who he was. The address on the envelope would tell him.

"A letter came two or three days ago, sir, but we forwarded it immediately to Paris,"

"I must have missed it. How was it addressed?"

"Just 'F. M. Smith, The Grange, Castletown,' sir. I think it was an advertisement."

"Probably. I'll have supper here."

"Yes, sir."

The servant departed, and Mr. Emley gazed about with a fast swelling air of pompousness.

"Dick, old boy," he said to himself, "it isn't exactly what you came for, but it'll do. It's your infernal luck again, old man, and if you're asleep I don't care, but if you wake up I'll never forgive you."

When supper was finished, and the servant was about to retire, Mr. Emley called to him.

"Jenkinson! Be sure and look everything up securely. I have been told that burglars are very daring in this part of the country."

"Indeed, they are, sir," replied Jenkinson. "There's no telling what they'll do next. But it'll be a very cold day when they get the better of me, sir."

"It is rather chilly to-night," observed Mr. Emley.

* * * * *

By noon the next day Mr. Emley had in a large degree overcome the strangeness of his situation. He no longer had an almost ungovernable impulse to gather to his bosom all the silver on the sideboard, and noiselessly flit through the nearest window.

But it was still a novelty to step out of the front door in full sight of the servants and enjoy the view from the porch without being driven to the extremity of drawing a revolver or taking to his heels. It was a delight to his artistic nature to sit in the drawing-room and cut the pages of the latest magazine with a gold-handled, ivory paper-knife, replacing the knife on the table when finished with.

I must admit he tried this latter experiment several times before successfully accomplishing it, and in spite of his earnest endeavours his pockets were soon filled with a collection of small valuables. However, his environment was having a good effect upon his moral nature.

"I would be an honest man were I in reality Mr. Smith," he told himself, running his hand caressingly over a jewelled sword hilt that hung in the hall.

But the sword hilt held strong attractions not consistent with moral reform, and Mr. Emley strolled out of doors and down the gravel path towards the wrought-iron entrance gates. Through the gates came a messenger boy with an orange envelope in his hand.

"Good afternoon, my little man," said Mr. Emley.

"Good afternoon, sir," said the boy.

"You have a telegram? "For Who?"

"Mr. Jenkinson, sir."

Digitized by Google

"All right, I'll take it. I have charge of everything here, and will know just where to find Mr. Jenkinson should he not be at the house."

Mr. Emley coolly appropriated the telegram.

"Now, I wonder," said he, "whom this is from?"

He turned the message round and round in the brilliant sunlight, but no answer to his question shone forth.

"If I were in reality Mr. Smith, I'd take this to Jenkinson, but, as I am not——"

Mr. Emley tore open the envelope. The message was from Paris, and read:

"Bad accident. Return in a month.—F. M. SMITH."

"Hurrah! Mr. Emley, allow me the pleasure of bidding you a long adieu! Mr. Smith, make yourself perfectly at home for a month, and I think it's high time you became acquainted with your new neighbours."

Mr. Smith proved an exceedingly popular man. Castletown was rather a dull little place, and its elite society was rapidly boring itself to death. Therefore, the new owner of the Grange was welcomed, figuratively speaking, with wide open arms.

And this was not at all strange. Young, handsome, and possessed of great wealth, and a long, silky moustache, when moustaches were scarce, Mr. Smith was an unusually eligible man. Sweet girls smiled encouragingly upon him, and anxious mothers deluged him with invitations.

The older men said he was "a good fellow," and the younger men admired the way he spent his money—or, that is, ran up bills. Altogether his path was one of roses, and he went on his way rejoicing.

* * * * *

It was at a ball that he met the woman in the case. Two of the precious four weeks had flown by on swift wings, and festivities were at their height. Mr. Smith had flung himself into the new life with all the pent-up energy of his strong nature. It was his first taste of this kind of social pleasures, and there must have been a hidden strain of refinement in his unknown parentage, for he easily adapted himself to his new surroundings.

And it was no wonder that under the smile of Fortune he forgot he was wanted by the police of almost every large town in the country, and walked through the ballroom with head held proudly erect.

It was thus that she first saw him.

"Who is that?" she inquired of a friend.

"Where? Oh, that is Mr. Smith of The Grange."

"Of the Grange! Up here on the hill?"

"Yes. Haven't you met him yet?"

"No," she answered, looking curiously at him, "I have not."

She was introduced to him as Miss Lormer.

"She only got back from Paris a few weeks ago, too," said the friend who introduced them. "How strange you did not meet her over there, Mr. Smith."

"Well, ah! Paris is rather a large place, you know," said Mr. Smith.

"Were you there long?" inquired Miss Lormer, looking up with earnest eyes. She was a sweet, pretty, little creature with a delicate oval face filled with childish innocence and purity.

Mr. Smith felt uncomfortable. Fortunately, though, his conscience didn't trouble him much. His acquaintances used to say he didn't have any conscience, but then, of course, that was absurd.

"It all depends upon what you call long," he said, evasively replying to Miss Lormer's question.

He asked her to dance, and was charmed with her conversation and manner. They danced together several times, as was noticed and remarked upon by the eagle-eyed matrons. Miss Lormer's dancing was beyond criticism, and she had an artless way of accompanying her statements with an appealing upward glance that made Mr. Smith's brain whirl.

He lured her into the conservatory, but when he had found a divan small enough for two she seemed deeply interested in the mysterious arrangement of a tea rose she held in her hand. Mr. Smith adored her shy timidity, and planned to get possession of the rose. He was trained to patience.

"It is strange I have not met you before," he murmured, laying his arm on the back of the seat, and looking at the brown curls before him.

"I only came from London last night. Have you been here long?"

The earnest eyes were upliftcd, and Mr. Smith was glad he could tell the truth.

"No, only a fortnight."

"How dull it must seem to you after Paris, especially as you have no relatives here, nor anyone you know very well."

"I don't find it dull now," he said meaningly.

The grey eyes drooped, and the petals of the rose were cruelly mutilated. There was silence for a while.

"Are you going to make your home permanently at The Grange?" asked Miss Lormer, breaking the speaking stillness.

"Well, I can hardly tell yet," said Mr. Smith. "It all depends on circumstances."

"Yes?"

"Yes. But at present I haven't the slightest intention of leaving."

"You came rather unexpectedly, did you not?"

"Yes. It has never been my custom to herald my movements from the housetops."

"Well," said Miss Lormer, rising and breaking the flower to the ground. "I hope you weren't disappointed in your expectations."

"I did not imagine that anything could have so far exceeded them," replied Mr. Smith, picking up the rose, and pressing it to his lips.

They were constantly meeting after this, and although Mr. Smith was not in love, he was heading in the right direction.

* * * * *

The third week seemed hardly begun ere it was finished, and he was gazing with dismay upon the unavoidable ending of his adventure. Another telegram, announcing the exact date of the real Mr. Smith's return, threw him into a momentary whirlwind of passion and defiance.

"I will not give it up! I will not!"

But things finally re-adjusted themselves to their normal condition, and Mr. Smith was but a thin mask covering Dick Emley, smartest burglar that Scotland Yard had ever known.

"I have had my taste of high life, and it has been perfect," he soliloquised, "and the only thing to do now is to gain some lasting benefit from it; a sort of interest on my money, as it were."

Castletown was an old little town, and within its narrow limits treasured many priceless ancestral heirlooms. Family relics were its great distinction, and chief among these was silver. Every housewife recognised in society had her silverware, heavy with age and tradition.

It was strange no one had thought of a silverware exhibition before Mr. Smith proposed one, but nobody had, and the idea was hailed with delight.

"Having proposed the plan, the very least I can do," said Mr. Smith, "is to offer for the exhibition the use of my house and my service."

As he owned many rare pieces of silverware himself, and the public at large was curious to see the interior of his new home, he was gratefully thanked, and the offer accepted.

Digitized by Google

Two evenings the exhibition lasted, and all Castletown turned out. The affair was one of great social magnificence. Under nodding palms the silverware reposed upon rich velvet or ruby, green, and gold. Subdued lights flung their rosy radiance upon gleaming statuary, and soft strains of music throbbed through a bower of ferns and lilies.

The host was irreproachable. With a dignified and reserved yet cordial welcome, he put all at their ease, establishing for himself an enviable reputation. Such a social success had never before been known in Castletown. The real Mr. Smith was having a precedent established for him that he might find a difficulty in living up to.

As was to be expected, Miss Lormer was the object of Mr. Smith's most marked attention. The town had recognised this, and the feminine portion of it was honestly endeavouring to accept the fact graciously.

"Now, he will always live here," said the matrons, wisely nodding their heads. "If he had not fallen in love with one of our girls, he would probably grow weary of so small a place, and return to Paris."

On the last evening of the exhibition, Mr. Smith escorted Miss Lormer to her home. In the little outside vestibule he took a hesitating farewell of her.

"Think the best you can of me always," he said. "Although no man can be all a good woman thinks he is, still I would have been all I seem to be, had I always had the opportunities I have now."

Miss Lormer looked troubled, and was about to speak impulsively, when a slight cough was heard, and, blushing slightly, she said, "Good-night."

When Mr. Smith returned home, he found the servants busily packing up the silverware under the stern supervision of the trustworthy Jenkinson. Mr. Smith had expressed himself as disinclined to assume longer than was absolutely necessary the responsibility of the borrowed heirlooms, and had made all arrangements for their return the next morning.

It was very early the next morning when Mr. Smith rose. Indeed, it was still night. It was the day of the real owner's arrival, and with his customary thoughtfulness for others, Mr. Emley had decided to leave. But there were several small matters to attend to first.

All over the house he went, upstairs and down, and not a single sound did he make. It was now that his great art showed itself. Bolts and bars opened like magic before the touch of his slender fingers, and after he had passed it was though an army of strange ants had been at work. The walls and mantels, the cabinets, tables, and floors were bare and unsightly.

He had taken the precaution of having the silverware packed in small boxes, but even so, he found difficulty in loading it on to the cart he had driven out upon the lawn. But at three o'clock the cart was filled. Climbing into the high seat, and taking the reins, he turned back towards the house and smiled.

"It is a very cold day, Jenkinson," he said.

Then he chuckled softly to the horse and began his journey. It was a very little journey. The horse had not taken ten steps before someone stepped out from the shadows and caught hold of the bridle rein. Mr. Emley sprang to his feet, only to find himself looking into the barrel of a revolver.

"I beg your pardon," said a soft voice, "but could I speak to you for a few moments?"

For the first time in his life Mr. Emley was stunned, helpless, at the mercy of his opponent. The voice was that of Miss Lormer.

"If you will get down from the cart," she said, "I will put this revolver away. I am a very good shot," and she laughed, "but the thing makes me nervous."

"Who would have thought that you were in the profession, too!" Mr. Emley muttered in dazed tones as he mechanically climbed down from the cart.

Miss Lormer laughed again, more heartily than before, and it was then he saw that she was not alone. A man stood at the horse's head. One of his legs was bandaged, and he leant heavily on a cane. He was a tall, good-looking young man, and he returned Mr. Emley's survey with great interest.

Noticing the exchange of glances, Miss Lormer turned to Mr. Emley, slightly embarrassed.

"Allow me to introduce to you, Mr. Smith, my fiancé."

Mr. Emley started and flushed. Quickly recovering himself, however, he bowed low to the stranger.

"Thank you," muttered the real Mr. Smith.

"Yes," said Miss Lormer, reflectively, leaning her hand on one side, and looking down at the revolver which she held in one hand, and patted with the other; "you see, I met him in Paris, and we became engaged. I wanted a home here, where I was born, so he bought The Grange, and I picked out the servants. That is why you weren't known as an impostor at once. Mr. Smith was coming here with me, but had an accident, so I extended my visit to London, where I was waiting for him. When I came here I was rather surprised to see you, you know"—she looked up with a twinkle in her eye—"but you were such a good actor I hated to interfere. Of course, I had to tell Frank, but he always lets me do as I please, and here we all are."

She smiled triumphantly, as though having successfully gathered together a picnic party, and Mr. Smith stood leaning against the horse, evidently much amused with the situation. It was hard to realise that the gentlemanly Mr. Emley was a common burglar, as, indeed, he was not.

"And now that we are here, what are we going to do?" asked Mr. Emley.

His voice had a strange, unnatural sound that made Miss Lormer wince. Perhaps her conscience was not entirely untroubled as to her treatment of him.

She held out her hand.

"I think," she said gently, "you had better go."

Mr. Emley bowed low over the little hand. He lifted his hat to Mr. Smith, and, turning, walked away from them into the darkness. When he was far enough away to render conversation inaudible, Miss Lormer called to him:

"Wait a minute!"

He stood in the darkness waiting, and she fearlessly went up to him.

"I don't like to think of you going away without anything," she said; "here, take this."

She pulled a tea rose from her hair, thrust it into his hand, and ran back to her lover.

"Dick," said Mr. Emley to himself, "you have been awakened."

R. L. Saunderson.

He: "Are you sure that I am the only man you ever really and truly loved?" She: "Perfectly sure. I went over the whole list only yesterday."

George: "Do you think that your father will consent to our marriage, darling?" Ethel: "Oh, yes. He has always humoured my silliest wishes."

"Do you pay for poetry?" asked the pretty girl. "Y—yes," replied the editor with some hesitation. "What do you pay?" "Compliments."

Young Man: "Are there any—er—tunnels on your railway?" Railway Official: "Yes, three of them. The line is a favourite one with newly-married couples. Two tickets, did you say?"

Digitized by Google

A Very Suitable Servant.

Relating How an American Lady at Last Found a Butler that Suited Her, and the Consequences.

Mrs. Madison was an American lady, and she lived in New York.

It was Mrs. Madison's opinion that the servant question would be the death of her. The "question" with her meant, generally: How long will the newly-acquired domestic remain on the field of his or her usefulness—or uselessness?

Mrs. Madison was rich in this world's goods. She had an indulgent husband, charming children, a more than comfortable income, and enough beauty to make her very pleasant to look upon. But all these gifts of a kind Providence were as nothing weighed in the balance against the crushing fact that every one of the Madison butlers was worse than his predecessor. The poor lady had tried every nationality, as she said, except the Chinese; there she drew the line.

At the time when this veracious history opens, the latest venture in the pantry line had proved to be a complete failure, and was to depart on the morrow.

Mrs. Madison sat in her charming sitting-room, over a wood fire, with the hot-water kettle hissing genially among its companion tea-things, which had been brought in for the last time by the present incumbent.

Opposite to her was her sister, Sylvia Arden. She had just come in from walking, and her long sealskin garment was thrown open as she sat toasting her feet and drawing off her gloves.

She was one of the prettiest girls in New York—which means that she was very lovely indeed.

"Shall you have that dinner on the fifteenth, Maud?" asked the young lady. She rose as she spoke, and divested herself of her furs, and as she did so one saw what a lithe and shapely figure she had.

"It all depends on the butler," said her sister. "George will get somebody to-day—goodness knows what."

"Ah, there's George's key in the door," said Mrs. Madison. "Now we shall see what news he brings."

In a moment or two the master of the house entered.

He took the cup of tea which his wife had poured out. Then, seating himself, he said: "Well, I have got him."

"Whom?" asked his wife mischievously.

"John Parkins—an Englishman."

"Was there ever an Englishman who wasn't named John?" asked Sylvia.

"Good references, of course?" said Mrs. Madison, with grim sarcasm. "They always have."

"No," said her husband cheerfully; "none at all."

Mrs. Madison was quite quiet.

"You are tired of the silver, then?"

"Not at all; but he won't take the silver. If there is anything dishonest about John Parkins, then I am wofully mistaken."

"You generally are," said his wife drily.

"Thank you, madam. No; he may be a little green, but he is one of the finest-looking men I ever saw."

"Do you remember our British Adonis?" asked Sylvia. "And how he handed round the lobster sauce in a kitchen jug? And put himself into the dumb waiter instead of the empty dishes?"

"Am I likely to forget it?"

"Then why," said Mrs. Madison, with sudden asperity, "do you subject us to a similar experience? How can you bring a man without a reference into my house?"

"On the same principle," said Mr. Madison setting down his cup with perfect imperturbability, "that you once said you would advertise for an atheist, having tried every religion in the housemaid line and failed lamentably with all the sects represented. I am tired of the men who have lived with all the British aristocracy. Now, Parkins assured me that he hasn't lived with any of them. He has the face of an honest, steady man; and he tells me that he is willing to learn."

Mrs. Madison gave a mock groan.

"That means that I am willing to teach," said she.

"And are we to have the Bellingers on the fifteenth?" asked Sylvia.

"By all means," said her brother-in-law. And so the conversation ended.

The next day, it being the first of the month, promptly at the hour agreed upon, John Parkins presented himself to the lady of the house, with a modest, deferential bearing, which was quite delightful. He was a strapping fellow of about thirty, dressed in worn but well-cut garments. His features were rather handsome, and his smooth-shaven upper lip showed at times a glimpse of very good teeth.

"It is not our custom to engage anyone without a reference," said Mrs. Madison. "We are placing great confidence in you in taking you like this into our house."

"I am aware of that, ma'am," said Parkins. "I am very thankful for your kindness. I hope I shall suit you."

"I hope so," said Mrs. Madison, in a tone which hinted that the hope was a forlorn one. "Have you had much experience in waiting at table?" she continued.

Digitized by Google

"Not much, ma'am," said Parkins.

"May I ask where you lived last?"

The man hesitated for a moment.

"On a ranch, ma'am," he said, with a slight air of being unwilling to pursue the subject further. Then he added, with more alacrity:

"I was servant to a gentleman out in Wyoming."

"Ah!" said Mrs. Madison.

She had rather intended to bully John Parkins, but somehow the manner of the man forbade it.

Having this unaccountable feeling that further investigations would be almost an impertinence, she proceeded to instruct the new butler as to what would henceforth be expected of him. He showed great alacrity—zeal not according to knowledge. But in spite of a few awkwardnesses on his part, he produced a favourable impression on his new mistress.

Dinner that day passed off remarkably well, considering that Parkins was rather nervous, as servants are apt to be in new places.

Miss Arden could not help admiring his personal appearance and gentlemanly manner, and Mr. Madison sat at the head of the table, smiling blandly, and full of elation at the success of his latest venture.

When dinner was over, Mrs. Madison entered the pantry to ascertain how the new functionary was behaving. She was surprised to see a row of wet plates standing all round the room, leaning their backs against the wall.

"Why, Parkins, whatever are you doing with those plates?" she cried.

The butler regarded her with a deprecatory air.

"I was letting them dry a bit, ma'am," he said. "Have I done wrong?"

"Certainly," said Mrs. Madison. "The towels in that drawer are for drying the china."

Parkins blushed so brightly that she really pitied him.

"Beg pardon, ma'am," he stammered, "but you see a man gets so awfully rough in the West, ma'am. We hadn't many towels on the ranch. Thank you, ma'am. I'll use them in future. I'm very anxious to learn."

The drawing-room was henceforth entertained with the pantry episodes, of which this was the beginning.

In the main, however, Parkins gave satisfaction. He was sober, diligent, almost chivalrous in his attention to the wants of the ladies. The defects in his education as a butler were soon remedied, for Mrs. Madison was an excellent housekeeper, and was willing to take untold trouble to instruct anyone who was teachable. The fresh, handsome face of Parkins, his respectful and manly bearing, and his charming English accent, which was evidently not that of a cockney, ingratiated him with his employers and even their acquaintance.

Occasionally a new book or paper was missing from the sitting-room, and more than once it was found in the pantry among the rouge-cloths and plate-powder. In one case the missing volume was one of Lecky's, and Miss Arden, who had searched in vain, asked Parkins if he had seen it. He confessed to having borrowed it; and when Sylvia looked at him with obvious surprise, he made some confused remark about "bettering his education."

"If he can appreciate that book," said Miss Arden afterwards to her sister, "his education doesn't need much bettering."

One evening, when John Parkins had been with the Madisons for a month or more, several newly-arrived English people dined at the house. From the moment when the party sat down at the table, Parkins began to behave strangely. He became absent-minded and inattentive. His strongest desire appeared to be to get out of the room as quickly as possible.

Mr. Madison was annoyed, and thought for a moment that his butler might be under the influence of liquor; but after he had watched him for a minute or two he was convinced that the man was perfectly sober, though evidently labouring under great mental perturbation.

But, as one cannot watch one's butler all the evening, Mr. Madison's attention was soon diverted, and the circumstance passed from his mind.

One day in the early spring a letter came for George Madison from the British Legation at Washington.

It requested information in regard to the whereabouts of Mr. Cecil Finch, an English gentleman who was supposed to be in the United States at that time. Mr. Madison replied with polite brevity that he had never had the pleasure of knowing anyone of that name. Then he thought the matter would rest. But by return of post came another letter, which intimated that the Legation could not take Mr. Madison's reply as final, for Cecil Finch had been seen going in and out of Mr. Madison's house in New York.

Mr. Madison was by this time rather curious, and not a little indignant. He was not accustomed to having his word doubted.

He therefore wrote back somewhat sharply to the effect that the only Englishman who came and went in his household in the manner described was his butler, John Parkins.

"Upon my word," he said that night at dinner to his wife and sister-in-law, "I am tired of Mr. Cecil Finch without having seen him. The dogged pertinacity of the English diplomatists does them credit."

Parkins, who was handing a dish of sweets at the moment, started so violently that the dish almost slipped from his fingers.

This did not escape Mr. Madison, but he said nothing.

Afterwards, however, he remarked to his wife:

"If I am not mistaken, Parkins knows something about Mr. Cecil Finch."

In a day or two a third letter bearing the Washington post-mark arrived for Mr. Madison. It said:

"Strange as it may appear, we should be glad if you would interrogate the man whom you call John Parkins as to the whereabouts of Mr. Finch. Tell him that your reason for asking is that Cecil Finch has come into a title and a fortune by the unexpected death of his uncle."

Mr. Madison was now thoroughly excited. What if his butler were the new lord in masquerade? He laughed to himself as he pictured the faces of his wife and sister when they heard the news.

It so happened that this last letter from the Legation had been sent to Mr. Madison's house, and it was there that he read it. His wife was out with Sylvia.

His decision was quickly formed. He touched the bell. Parkins appeared, calm and correct as he was in his best moments when there was nothing to disconcert him.

"Parkins," said his master, "did you ever happen to hear of an English gentleman called Cecil Finch?"

"Yes, sir," said the butler. "I think I heard you mention his name, sir, at dinner, a night or two ago."

"Have you ever seen him?"

"Yes, sir, in Wyoming, sir."

"It would be a good thing for him, Parkins," said Mr. Madison carelessly, "if you could find him."

"How so, sir?" asked the young man, changing colour a little

Digitized by Google

"He has just come into his uncle's titles and estates; and he can't be found."

"By Jove! Is Lord Grinsmead dead?" cried the butler, in a voice very different from his usual guarded one.

Before he had time to pull himself together and apologise, Mr. Madison pounced upon him.

"Look here, Mr. Finch!" he said, quite sternly, "you are no butler! Your name isn't Parkins! Why did you lie to me, Cecil Finch?"

"No, Mr. Madison," said the man, "I am not a butler and my name isn't Parkins, and lie is not a word to use among gentlemen!"

"But, hang it, Parkins—Finch—whatever you are, I can't realise quite yet that you're not what I thought you five minutes ago. And I think I have a right to know why you have imposed upon me in this way," said Mr. Madison, still irate.

"Of course you have," said Mr. Finch, late John Parkins. "The story is simply this. I was pretty well down on my luck after having tried ranching and failed, as many a cleverer man than I am has done before. I was too proud to go home. There was no one of whom I could borrow, and I hadn't a penny. I saw your advertisement in the paper, and applied for the situation. I hadn't an idea that you'd take me, but I was touched by your confidence, Mr. Madison, and I've done the very best I could for you. I remembered our old butler at home, and I tried to model myself on him.

"The other night you thought, no doubt, that I was drunk. I wasn't; but the man who sat next to Mrs. Madison was a fellow who knew me well at Oxford, ten years ago."

Both men had been standing while they talked. Madison read candour and integrity in the handsome face of the other.

"Sit down, Mr. Finch," he said, "and tell me the rest."

"I would rather stand, thank you," said Finch. "How do you know that I'm telling you the truth? Is my Oxford friend in town still?"

"I believe so," said Mr. Madison.

"Will you go to him with me and get me identified?" asked Finch. Then he added, smiling a little: "I believe I've got one pretty decent coat."

* * * * *

About six o'clock the ladies came home. The drawing-room was full of Spring twilight.

"Why are no lamps lighted?" asked Mrs. Madison. "Where's Parkins? I never knew him to be so careless."

She rang the bell sharply. It was answered by her maid.

"Where is Parkins?" Mrs. Madison demanded.

"Gone out, ma'am, with Mr. Madison," said the maid demurely.

"With Mr. Madison? How extraordinary!"

"He said he might not come back," said the maid, rather enjoying Mrs. Madison's surprise.

Sylvia then entered.

"The table isn't laid, and I can't find Parkins anywhere," she said.

When the lady's-maid withdrew, the sisters expressed themselves more freely.

"Always the way with my butlers! Is this frightful servant-hunt going to begin again?" moaned Mrs. Madison.

"And really he was a man one could have loved, if he hadn't been a butler," sighed Miss Arden.

Presently Mr. Madison returned alone. Without giving his wife time for indignant questions, he said:

"Parkins wanted to come back and serve dinner, but I wouldn't let him."

"And pray why not?" asked his wife. "What has he done?"

"He has gone and got himself a title, and I thought that a dinner handed round by my Lord Grinsmead would choke us all."

* * * * *

The next day Lord Grinsmead, formerly Cecil Finch, alias John Parkins, modestly requested a few moments' conversation with Mrs. Madison.

She was less at her ease than he.

"I wanted to come back last night, Mrs. Madison," he said, coming forward without extending his hand, "but your husband would not hear of it. I am sorry that your proverbial bad luck with butlers has not been changed by me. I sail to-morrow, and I fear that you must supply my place, which will be easily done."

"There you make a mistake," she answered, motioning him to a chair. "You were the very nicest servant I have ever had in the house."

And then they both laughed long and heartily.

"May I see Miss Arden before I go?" he asked presently, with a decided deepening of his colour.

Mrs. Madison said "Certainly," and in a few moments Sylvia entered. He rose and gave her his chair, and she could not but notice how the obsequious alacrity of the butler had given way to the well-bred manner of the English gentleman.

"I want to say before I go," he said almost brokenly, "that I thank you for the happiest and most innocent months of my life. I have had constant kindness from you both, and I hope that you will all come to England some day that I may do something for you in return. I should like to show you the old park. It will be full of primroses in a few weeks." And a mist came before the eyes of the strong man as his heart turned towards his home.

Just before he went away he said very softly to Sylvia (her sister being somewhat in advance of them as they walked towards the door):

"Do you think that you can ever forget that I was your sister's butler?"

I don't know what she answered, but I do know that an account of Lord Grinsmead's wedding appeared in the Court Journal about a year later, and that the bride was a very lovely American. Another fact, also, I can tell you, which the Court Journal knows nothing at all about—to this day Lady Grinsmead calls her lord nothing but "Parkins."

N. Rothsay.

THE ETIQUETTE OF ENGAGEMENT AND MARRIAGE.

By G. R. M. DEVEREUX. Price 1s.

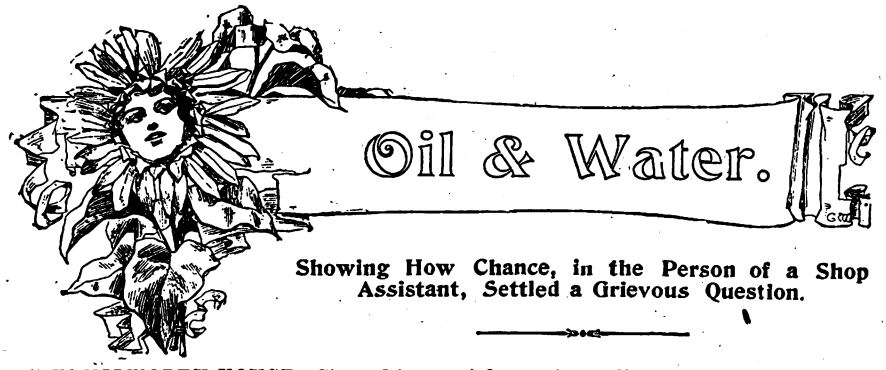
A Volume of Sensible Advice to all.

Some of the subjects dealt with are:

The Beginnings of Courtship—Favourable Opportunities—Social Intercourse—Different Ideas of Etiquette—Introductions—Recognition of Affinity, or Love at First Sight—How to Follow up an Acquaintance—Intercourse between Unconfessed Lovers—The Question of Presents—The Man who Lives at Home—The Man in Rooms—The Home Girl—The Bachelor Girl—The Business Girl—The Student or Professional Girl—Friends who become Lovers—Flirts, Male and Female—He Changes his Mind on the Verge of a Proposal—How she Accepts the Situation—How she may give Encouragement or Ward off an Unwelcome Offer—The Question of Age—Young Lovers—Proposals—Premeditated—Spontaneous, etc.—Some Things to Avoid—Vaguely Worded Offers—Engagements—The Attitude of Parents and Guardians—Making it Known—Congratulations—The Choice and Giving of the Ring—His Visits to her Home—The Engaged Couple in Public—In Society—Going about together—The Question of Expenses—Love Letters—Long or Short Engagements—Marriage—Fixing the Day—Preparations—Trousseau—Invitations—Wedding-Presents, etc., etc.

At Booksellers, or post free for 1s. 2d. from C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



Oil & Water.

Showing How Chance, in the Person of a Shop Assistant, Settled a Grievous Question.

"KENILWORTH HOUSE—Situated in one of the prettiest spots in the Lake District. Lake, stocked with fish, near by; excellent golf links; fruit and vegetables raised on our own farm.—For terms, address Thomas Kenilworth, Bushwick."

All three read the same advertisement on the same morning, in the same train, though none knew of the existence of the others. And all three were leaving on July 1st for their annual holidays.

Jack Dunning left the train first, and as he walked out of Cannon Street station he muttered: "Beautiful country! Good fishing! Just my style! I'll write for terms this morning!" And he did.

At Waterloo Roy Putnam stuffed the morning paper in his pocket, lit his pipe, and remarked meditatively: "Excellent golf links, and home-grown fruits and vegetables. Not a bad combination. I'll write to that man Kenilworth to-day." And he kept his word.

Helen Driscoll, continuing on to Charing Cross, furtively drew forth a hairpin, jabbed out the Kenilworth House advertisement, tossed aside her paper and rose, thinking: "Superb view! And I ought to do some sketching this summer. I am getting so rusty. I hope the terms are not too high. I'll write the first thing when I get to the office." So letter number three started on its journey to Bushwick.

On July 1st the three found themselves at the nearest station to Bushwick. Dunning carried his fishing tackle, Putnam his golf clubs, and Miss Driscoll a sketching outfit.

During the coach ride to Kenilworth House the acquaintance ripened rapidly. By the time they pulled up before it each man was asking why the dickens the other fellow had come, and Miss Driscoll, being wise in her day and generation, could foretell that there would be something more exciting on her hands during the next fortnight than making water-colour sketches.

The second day she made a sketch in colours of the lake, and Dunning lost interest in the speckled beauties—until the sketch was finished. The fourth day she painted a picturesque corner of the golf links, and Putnam might have charged up to profit and loss the sum he had paid his caddy for the morning's work.

The fifth day it rained, and Miss Driscoll very appropriately might have shut herself in her room to paint a pair of bleeding hearts. But, being a healthy, well-balanced young person, she merely laughed at what she termed "the antics of those two boys," and made herself popular with the unfortunate beings, huddled dismally in the sitting-room, whose barrenness no one noticed on clear days.

Dunning and Putnam retired, each vowing that if the other fellow had any sense he would see that his presence at Kenilworth House was not necessary to either general or individual happiness. But the next day being clear of sky and dry under foot, the three started out as usual, Dunning carrying her tin paint box, Putnam her portfolio.

"That's all very well," remarked one of the gossips from the vantage point of a wicker reclining chair. "That Driscoll girl will find she can't play with the hearts of two nice chaps like those much longer. One or the other will bring matters to a climax soon."

In just one respect the speaker erred. Both men brought about the climax, operating, so to speak, within ten minutes of each other.

It happened the night of the dance, and spoilt the evening for Helen. They were both such charming fellows. She had not thought seriously of marriage. She was happily situated in a business way in great, bustling London town. She was not sure whether she really wanted to marry, and absolutely certain that she did not dare select the man. Her dilemma was painful.

Like a defiant little pagan, she told them both that she did not know her heart, but would try to read the signs written therein before she left Kenilworth House. Whereupon she proceeded to turn the matter over to Fate, murmuring carelessly: "And may the best man win."

And Fate, in punishment of her foolhardiness and distinctly feminine frivolity, took a hand in the matter promptly. The very next afternoon Helen laid aside her sketch with a gesture of despair. Her carmine paint was exhausted. Her labour must cease until she could drive into Bushwick and purchase the precious pigment.

Within five minutes she found herself without either cavalier. Each had excused himself with a reckless disregard as to what the other fellow might do if left alone on Love's battlefield.

At half-past five Jack Dunning, dusty, footsore and red-eyed, strode into the stationery shop at Bushwick and paralysed the single assistant by demanding half a sovereign's worth of carmine paint.

"What kind?" inquired the assistant when he regained his breath.

"What kind!" echoed Jack dully.

"Why, yes; you didn't say whether you wanted oils or water colours."

Jack was in a quandary. He had been watching Helen's eyes rather than her painting.

"What do girls mostly use to paint with?" he asked, throwing himself on the mercy of the assistant.

That astute individual thought fast and hard. He had just sold the last tube of carmine oil paint to another young man, who had also appeared hurried, footsore and dusty.

"Is it a water scene, sir?" he asked cautiously.

"It is," answered Jack, greatly relieved. "She is painting the lake."

"Then," remarked the young assistant urbanely, "of course she'll use water colour paints, but we've only got five shillings' worth of carmine."

"Well, give me that. I can send to London for more to-morrow. And thanks very much for your good advice."

Both men were late for dinner. Both sent their precious packages to Helen's room by the page boy. Both put the momentous question for a second time later in the evening.

What Miss Driscoll said to Mr. Putnam is not recorded, but Dunning winked furtively but distinctly at the fair Lady Moon when Helen patted his arm lovingly and murmured:

"You don't know what you owe those cakes of carmine paint, dear. I really didn't know my own mind until you both sent me the paints. That opened my eyes to the fact that you were my affinity. You took a genuine interest in my work. Mr. Putnam is very lovely, but to think of a man's never noticing whether the girl he pretended he loved painted in oils or water colours. Now, you——"

Very gently Dunning drew her head down on his shoulder. And again he exchanged courtesies with Lady Moon, for if ever that goddess condescended to wink, it was a soulful response to his infectious greeting.

Walter A. Tice.

Digitized by Google

Her Reply.

They are sitting out a dance, and she delights in waltzing. He: "A penny for your thoughts." She: "They are not worth it. I'm thinking of you."

He's Going to be Rich.

He: "Dora, dear, do you think you could consent to be a poor man's wife?" "No; if he had me and still thought himself poor, I wouldn't want to be his wife."

They Were Faithful Sisters.

She: "I—I think I like you, Mr. Trotter, but I cannot marry and leave my twin sister alone. Wait until she is engaged." He: "Yes—but—er—that's just what she said when I proposed to her."

Both Their Wishes Were Fulfilled.

She (after breaking the wish-bone): "What did you wish?" He: "I wished that you would let me kiss you. What did you wish?" She: "I wished that what you wished should come true."

Too Candid.

Rich Fiancee: "Oh, this bouquet is too costly! You must take it back to the lieutenant." Valet: "Oh, that's all right, miss. Since my master is engaged to you he has been able to get things on credit."

Anxious to Know.

He: "I had a queer dream about you last night, Miss Louisa. I was about to give you a kiss when suddenly we were separated by a river that gradually grew as big as the Thames." She: "And was there no bridge and no boat?"

A Lesson in Punctuation.

Professor in English (to young man): "How would you punctuate the following: 'The beautiful girl, for such was she, was passing down the street'?" Student: "I think, Professor, I would make a dash after the beautiful girl."

Wealth Works Wonders.

Friend: "So yours was a case of love at first sight?" Mrs. Lovejoy: "Yes, indeed. I fell desperately in love with my dear husband the moment I set eyes upon him. I remember it all as distinctly as if it were yesterday. I was walking with papa on the promenade at Brighton, when suddenly papa stopped, and, pointing him out, said: 'There, my dear, is a man worth £120,000.'"

Unaccustomed Travelling.

Fwed: "Why, Cholly, dear boy, whatever is the mattah? You look awfully wowwied." Cholly: "Don't pity me, Fwed; I feel fwightfully upset." "But, Cholly, you weally must tell a fellah." "Well, Fwed, as you're a weal bwick, I'll tell yah. Fact is, I tumbled into the wong twain this mawning, and——" "Good gwacious, however was that?" "Why, I fell into a twain of thought, don't-cher-know?" "Bwute!"

Question for Question.

She: "Why does a woman take a man's name when she gets married?" He: "Why does she take everything else he has?"

An Interview in any Case.

"Emily, if William to-day asks you to marry him, you must tell him to speak to me." "Yes, mamma; but if he does not?" "Then tell him I want to speak to him."

Authoritative.

Big Sister: "Dick, I think it is time little folks were in bed." Little Dick (on Mr. Nicefellow's knee): "Oh, it's all right; mamma said I was to keep this seat until she came downstairs."

A Stern Truth.

Returned Traveller: "Is Mr. Goodheart still paying attentions to your daughter?" "He isn't paying her any attention at all." "Indeed? Did he jilt her?" "No, he married her."

He is Looked Upon with Favour.

Mrs. Matchmaker: "Mr. Wise, I take it from your interest in my daughter Pearl that you're a gem connoisseur." Mr. Wise: "It's due, madam, to my great admiration for mother of Pearl."

The Exception That Proves the Rule.

Albert: "All the world loves a lover, you know." Mildred: "You wouldn't say that if you had heard papa's remarks when he found, yesterday morning, that you had taken his hat by mistake."

He Was Negligent.

"You are not angry with me because I threw a kiss to you, are you?" he asked. "Yes, I am," she replied. "Why?" he inquired. "Because there was no impenetrable barrier between us that made it necessary."

How, Indeed?

She: "A doctor in Berlin, after a great deal of study, has discovered that married men live longer than bachelors." He (imploringly): "Save my life!" She (joyously): "Oh, Clarence, how did you guess that I loved you?"

Then and Now.

Wife (drearily): "Ah, me! the days of chivalry are past." Husband: "What's the matter now?" Wife: "Sir Walter Raleigh laid his cloak on the ground for Queen Elizabeth to walk over, but you get cross simply because poor, dear mother sat down on your hat."

Rather Mixed.

"George," she screamed, "my neck!" "What's the matter?" "There's a pillacatter——" "A what?" "A taperkiller——" "What in the world do you mean?" "Oh, dear!" she moaned, as she clutched him frantically. "A kitterpaller! You know, George! A patterkiller!" "Oh!" said George, with evident relief, and he proceeded to brush the caterpillar away.

The Circumstances that Altered Cases.

"I am sensible of the honour you do me, Mr. Spoonamore, in the proposal of marriage you have just made," said the young woman, with a slight curl of the lip; "but circumstances over which I have no control will compel me to decline the honour." "What are those circumstances, Miss Grimshaw?" fiercely demanded the young man. "Your circumstances, Mr. Spoonamore!"

His First Love.

"Dearest," cooed the sweet girl, "you have told me so often that I am your first love! But should Fate ever part us, promise me you'll never show my letters to your next." "How can you speak so, darling?" broke in the young man. "You know I'd never show them. Why, have I ever shown you the letters written me by——" Here the youth suddenly paused. And the chilling silence could be heard reigning on the roof outside.

Digitized by Google

A Story of Love and Crime.

By ARNOLD BENNETT.

NINETEENTH CHAPTER.

Royalty at the Grand Babylon.

THE Royal apartments at the Grand Babylon are famous in the world of hotels, and indeed elsewhere, as being, in their own way, unsurpassed. Some of the palaces of Germany, and in particular those of the mad Ludwig of Bavaria, may possess rooms and saloons which outshine them in gorgeous luxury and the mere wild, fairy-like extravagance of wealth; but there is nothing, anywhere, even on Fifth Avenue, New York, which can fairly be called more complete, more perfect, more enticing, or more comfortable.

The suite consists of six chambers—the ante-room, the saloon or audience chamber, the dining-room, the yellow drawing-room (where Royalty receives its friends), the library, and the State bedroom—to the last of which we have already been introduced. The most important and most impressive of these six is, of course, the audience chamber, an apartment fifty feet long by forty feet broad, with a superb outlook over the Thames, the Shot Tower, and the higher signals of the South-Western Railway. The decoration of this room is mainly in the German taste, since four out of every six of its Royal occupants are of Teutonic blood; but its chief glory is its French ceiling, a masterpiece by Fragonard, taken bodily from a certain famous palace on the Loire. The walls are of panelled oak, with an eight-foot dado of Arras cloth imitated from unique Continental examples. The carpet, woven in one piece, is an antique specimen of the finest Turkish work, and it was obtained from an impecunious Roumanian Prince.

The silver candelabra now fitted with electric light, came from the Rhine, and each has a separate history. The Royal chair—it is not etiquette to call it a throne, though it amounts to a throne—was looted by Napoleon from an Austrian city, and bought by Félix Babylon at the sale of a French collector. At each corner of the room stands a gigantic grotesque vase of German faïence of the sixteenth century. These were presented to Félix Babylon by William the First of Germany, upon the conclusion of his first incognito visit to London in connection with the French trouble in 1875. There is only one picture in the audience chamber. It is a portrait of the luckless but noble Dom Pedro, Emperor of the Brazils.

In one of the window recesses of this magnificent apartment, on a certain afternoon in late July, stood Prince Aribert of Posen. He was faultlessly dressed in the conventional frock-coat of British civilisation.

He seemed to be fairly amused, and also to expect someone, for at frequent intervals he looked rapidly over his shoulder in the direction of the door behind the Royal chair. At last a little, wizened, stooping old man, with a distinctly German cast of countenance, appeared through the door, and laid some papers on a small table by the side of the chair.

"Ah, Hans, my old friend!" said Aribert, approaching the old man. "I must have a little talk with you about one or two matters. How do you find his Royal Highness?"

The old man saluted in military fashion. "Not very well, your Highness," he answered. "I've been valet to your Highness' nephew since his majority, and I was valet to his Royal father before him, but I never saw——" He stopped, and threw up his wrinkled hands deprecatingly.

"You never saw what?" Aribert smiled affectionately on the old fellow. You could perceive that these two, so sharply differentiated in rank, had been intimate in the past, and would be intimate again.

"Do you know, my Prince," said the old man, "that we are to receive the financier, Sampson Levi—is that his name?—in the audience chamber? Surely, if I may humbly suggest, the library would have been good enough for a financier?"

"One would have thought so," agreed Prince Aribert, "but perhaps your master has a special reason. Tell me," he went on, changing the subject quickly, "how came it that you left the Prince, my nephew, at Ostend, and returned to Posen?"

"His orders, Prince," and old Hans, who had had a wide experience of Royal whims and knew half the secrets of the Courts of Europe, gave Aribert a look which might have meant anything. "He sent me back on an—an errand, your Highness."

"And you were to rejoin him here?"

"Just so, Highness. And I did rejoin him here, although, to tell the truth, I had begun to fear that I might never see my master again."

"The Prince has been very ill in Ostend, Hans."

Digitized by Google

"So I have gathered," Hans responded drily, slowly rubbing his hands together. "And his Highness is not yet perfectly recovered."

"Not yet. We despaired of his life, Hans, at one time, but, thanks to an excellent constitution, he came safely through the ordeal."

"We must take care of him, your Highness."

"Yes, indeed," said Aribert solemnly; "his life is very precious to Posen."

At that moment Eugen, Hereditary Prince of Posen, entered the audience chamber. He was pale and languid, and his uniform seemed to be a trouble to him. His hair had been slightly ruffled, and there was a look of uneasiness, almost of alarmed unrest, in his fine dark eyes. He was like a man who is afraid to look behind him lest he should see something there which ought not to be there. But at the same time, here beyond doubt was Royalty. Nothing could have been more striking than the contrast between Eugen, a sick man in the shabby house at Ostend, and this Prince Eugen in the Royal apartments of the Grand Babylon Hotel, surrounded by the luxury and pomp which modern civilisation can offer to those born in high places. All the desperate episode of Ostend was now hidden, passed over. It was supposed never to have occurred. It existed only like a secret shame in the hearts of those who had witnessed it. Prince Eugen had recovered; at any rate, he was convalescent, and he had been removed to London, where he took up again the dropped thread of his princely life. The lady with the red hat, the incorruptible and savage Miss Spencer, the unscrupulous and brilliant Jules, the dark, damp cellar, the horrible little bedroom—these things were over. Thanks to Prince Aribert and the Racksoles, he had emerged from them in safety. He was able to resume his public and official career. The Emperor had been informed of his safe arrival in London, after an unavoidable delay in Ostend; his name once more figured in the Court chronicle of the newspapers. In short, everything was smothered over. Only—only Jules, Rocco, and Miss Spencer were still at large; the body of Reginald Dimmock lay buried in the domestic mausoleum of the palace at Posen; and Prince Eugen had still to interview Mr. Sampson Levi.

That various matters lay heavy on the mind of Prince Eugen was beyond question. He seemed to have withdrawn within himself. Despite the extraordinary experiences through which he had recently passed, events which called aloud for explanations and confidence between the nephew and the uncle, he would say scarcely a word to Prince Aribert. Any allusion, however direct, to the days at Ostend was ignored by him with more or less ingenuity, and Prince Aribert was really no nearer a full solution of the mystery of Jules' plot than he had been on the night when he and Racksole visited the gaming tables at Ostend. Eugen was well aware that he had been kidnapped through the agency of the woman in the red hat, but, doubtless ashamed at having been her dupe, he would not proceed in any way with the clearing-up of the matter.

"You will receive in this room, Eugen?" Aribert questioned him.

"Yes," was the answer, given pettishly. "Why not? Even if I have no proper retinue here, surely that is no reason why I should not hold audience in a proper manner? Hans, you can go." The old valet promptly disappeared. "Aribert," the Hereditary Prince continued, when they were alone in the chamber, "you think I am mad."

"My dear Eugen," said Prince Aribert, startled in spite of himself. "Don't be absurd."

"I say you think I am mad. You think that that attack of brain fever has left its permanent mark on me. Well, perhaps I am mad. Who can tell? God knows that I have been through enough lately to drive me mad!"

Aribert made no reply. As a matter of strict fact, the thought had crossed his mind that Eugen's brain had not yet recovered its normal tone and activity. This speech of his nephew's, however, had the effect of immediately restoring his belief in the latter's entire sanity. He felt convinced that if only he could regain his nephew's confidence, the old brotherly confidence which had existed between them since the years when they played together as boys, all might yet be well. But at present there appeared to be no sign that Eugen meant to give his confidence to anyone. The young Prince had come up out of the valley of the shadow of death, but some of the valley's shadow had clung to him, and it seemed he was unable to dissipate it.

"By-the-way," said Eugen suddenly, "I must reward these Racksoles, I suppose. I am indeed grateful to them. If I gave the girl a bracelet, and the father a thousand guineas—how would that meet the case?"

"My dear Eugen!" exclaimed Aribert, aghast. "A thousand guineas! Do you know that Theodore Racksole could buy up all Posen from end to end without making himself a pauper. A thousand guineas! You might as well offer him sixpence."

"Then what must I offer?"

"Nothing, except your thanks. Anything else would be an insult. These are no ordinary hotel people."

"Can't I give the little girl a bracelet?" Prince Eugen gave a sinister laugh.

Aribert looked at him steadily. "No," he said.

"Why did you kiss her—that night?" asked Prince Eugen carelessly.

"Kiss whom?" said Aribert, blushing and angry, despite his most determined efforts to keep calm and unconcerned.

"The Racksole girl."

"When do you mean?"

"I mean," said Prince Eugen, "that night in Ostend when I was ill. You thought I was in a delirium. Perhaps I was. But somehow I remember that with extraordinary distinctness. I remember raising my head for a fraction of an instant, and just in that fraction of an instant you kissed her. Oh, Uncle Aribert!"

"Listen, Eugen, for God's sake. I love Nella Racksole. I shall marry her."

"You!" There was a long pause, and then Eugen laughed. "Ah!" he said. "They all talk like that to start with. I have talked like that myself, dear uncle; it sounds nice, and it means nothing."

"In this case it means everything, Eugen," said Aribert quietly.

Some accent of determination in the latter's tone made Eugen rather more serious.

"You can't marry her," he said. "The Emperor won't permit a morganatic marriage."

"The Emperor has nothing to do with the affair. I shall renounce my rights. I shall become a plain citizen."

"In which case you will have no fortune to speak of."

"But my wife will have a fortune. Knowing the sacrifices which I shall have made in order to marry her, she will not hesitate to place that fortune in my hands for our mutual use," said Aribert stiffly.

"You will be decidedly rich," mused Eugen, as his ideas dwelt on Theodore Racksole's reputed wealth. "But have you thought of this," he asked, and his mild eyes glowed again in a sort of madness. "Have you thought that I am unmarried, and might die at any moment, and then the throne will descend to you—to you, Aribert?"

"The throne will never descend to me, Eugen," said Aribert softly, "for you will live. You are thoroughly convalescent. You have nothing to fear."

"It is the next seven days that I fear," said Eugen.

"The next seven days! Why?"

"I do not know. But I fear them. If I can survive them——"

"Mr. Sampson Levi, sire," Hans announced in a loud tone.

Prince Eugen started. "I will see him," he said, with a gesture to Hans as if to indicate that Mr. Sampson Levi might enter at once.

"I beg one moment first," said Aribert, laying a hand gently on his nephew's arm, and giving old Hans a glance which had the effect of precipitating that admirably trained servant through the doorway.

Digitized by Google

TWENTIETH CHAPTER.

Mr. Samuel Levi Bids Prince Eugen Good-Morning.

"WHAT is it?" asked Prince Eugen crossly. "Why this sudden seriousness? Don't forget that I have an appointment with Mr. Sampson Levi, and must not keep him waiting. Someone said that punctuality is the politeness of princes."

"Eugen," said Aribert, "I wish you to be as serious as I am. Why cannot we have faith in each other? I want to help you. I have helped you. You are my titular Sovereign; but on the other hand I have the honour to be your uncle; I have the honour to be the same age as you, and to have been your companion from youth up. Give me your confidence. I thought you had given it me years ago, but I have lately discovered that you had your secrets, even then. And now, since your illness, you are still more secretive."

"What do you mean, Aribert?" said Eugen, in a tone which might have been either inimical or friendly. "What do you want to say?"

"Well, in the first place, I want to say that you will not succeed with the estimable Mr. Sampson Levi.'

"Shall I not?" said Eugen lightly. "How do you know what my business is with him?"

"Suffice it to say that I do know. You will never get that million pounds out of him."

Prince Eugen gasped, and then swallowed his excitement. "Who has been talking? What million?" His eyes wandered uneasily round the room. "Ah!" he said, pretending to laugh. "I see how it is. I have been chattering in my delirium. You mustn't take any notice of that, Aribert. When one has a fever one's ideas become grotesque and fanciful."

"You never talked in your delirium," Aribert replied; "at least not about yourself. I knew about this projected loan before I saw you in Ostend."

"Who told you?" demanded Eugen fiercely.

"Then you admit that you are trying to raise a loan?"

"I admit nothing. Who told you?"

"Theodore Racksole, the millionaire. These rich men have no secrets from each other. They form a coterie, closer than any coterie of ours, Eugen, and far more powerful. They talk, and in talking they rule the world, these millionaires. They are the real monarchs."

"Confound them!" said Eugen.

"Yes, perhaps so. But let me return to your case. Imagine my shame, my disgust, when I found that Racksole could tell me more about your affairs than I knew myself. Happily, he is a good fellow; one can trust him; otherwise I should have been tempted to do something desperate when I discovered that all your private history was in his hands. Eugen, let us come to the point; why do you want that million? Is it actually true that you are so deeply in debt? I have no desire to improve the occasion. I merely ask."

"Do you think I'm mad, Aribert?" said Prince Eugen.

"And, what if I do owe a million?" said Prince Eugen with assumed valour.

"Oh, nothing, my dear Eugen, nothing. Only it is rather a large sum to have scattered in ten years, is it not? How did you manage it?"

"Don't ask me, Aribert. I've been a fool. But I swear to you that the woman whom you call 'the lady in the red hat' is the last of my follies. I am about to take a wife, and become a respectable Prince."

"Then the engagement with Princess Anna is an accomplished fact?"

"Practically so. As soon as I have settled with Levi, all will be smooth. Aribert, I wouldn't lose Anna for the Imperial throne. She is a good and pure woman, and I love her as a man might love an angel."

"And yet you would deceive her as to your debts, Eugen? Is that a very honourable thing to do?"

"Not her, but her absurd parents, and perhaps the Emperor. They have heard rumours, and I must set those rumours at rest by presenting to them a clean sheet."

"I am glad you have been frank with me, Eugen," said Prince Aribert, "but I will be plain with you. You will never marry the Princess Anna."

"And why?" said Eugen, supercilious again.

"Because her parents will not permit it. Because you would not be able to present a clean sheet to them. Because this Sampson Levi will never lend you a million."

"Explain yourself."

"I propose to do so. You were kidnapped—it is a horrid word, but we must use it—in Ostend."

"True."

"Do you know why."

"I suppose because that vile old red-hatted woman and her accomplices wanted to get some money out of me. Fortunately, thanks to you, they didn't."

Digitized by Google

"Not at all," said Aribert. "They wanted no money from you. They knew well enough that you had no money. They knew you were the naughty schoolboy among European Princes, with no sense of responsibility or of duty towards your kingdom. Shall I tell you why they kidnapped you?"

"When you have done abusing me, my dear uncle."

"They kidnapped you merely to keep you out of England for a few days, merely to compel you to fail in your appointment with Sampson Levi. And it appears to me that they succeeded. Assuming that you don't obtain the money from Levi, is there another financier in all Europe from whom you can get it—on such strange security as you have to offer?"

"Possibly there is not," said Prince Eugen calmly. "But, you see, I shall get it from Sampson Levi. Levi promised it, and I know from other sources that he is a man of his word. He said that the money, subject to certain formalities, would be available till——"

"Till?"

"Till the end of June."

"And it is now the end of July."

"Well, what is a month? He is only too glad to lend the money. He will get excellent interest. How on earth have you got into your sage old head this notion of a plot against me? The idea is ridiculous. A plot against me? What for?"

"Have you ever thought of Bosnia?" asked Aribert coldly.

"What of Bosnia?"

"I need not tell you that the King of Bosnia is naturally under obligations to Austria, to whom he owes his crown. Austria is anxious for him to make a good, influential marriage."

"Well, let him."

"He is going to. He is going to marry the Princess Anna."

"Not while I live. He made overtures there a year ago, and was rebuffed."

"Yes; but he will make overtures again, and this time he will not be rebuffed. Oh, Eugen! can't you see that this plot against you is being engineered by some persons who know all about your affairs, and whose desire is to prevent your marriage with Princess Anna? Only one man in Europe can have any motive for wishing to prevent your marriage with Princess Anna, and that is the man who means to marry her himself."

Eugen went very pale.

"Then, Aribert, do you mean to convey to me that my detention in Ostend was contrived by the agents of the King of Bosnia?"

"I do."

"With a view to stopping my negotiations with Sampson Levi, and so putting an end to the possibility of my marriage with Anna?"

Aribert nodded.

"You are a good friend to me, Aribert. You mean well. But you are mistaken. You have been worrying about nothing."

"Have you forgotten about Reginald Dimmock?"

"I remember you said that he had died."

"I said nothing of the sort. I said that he had been assassinated. That was part of it, my poor Eugen."

"Pooh!" said Eugen. "I don't believe he was assassinated. And as for Sampson Levi, I will bet you a thousand marks that he and I come to terms this morning, and that the million is in my hands before I leave London."

Aribert shook his head.

"You seem to be pretty sure of Mr. Levi's character. Have you had much to do with him before?"

"Well"—Eugen hesitated a second—"a little. What young man in my position hasn't had something to do with Mr. Sampson Levi at one time or another?"

"I haven't," said Aribert.

"You! You are a fossil." He rang a silver bell. "Hans, I will receive Mr. Sampson Levi."

Whereupon Aribert discreetly departed, and Prince Eugen sat down in the great velvet chair, and began to look at the papers which Hans had previously placed upon the table."

"Good morning, your Royal Highness," said Sampson Levi, bowing as he entered. "I trust your Royal Highness is well."

"Moderately, thanks," returned the Prince.

In spite of the fact that he had had as much to do with people of Royal blood as any plain man in Europe, Sampson Levi had never yet learnt how to be at ease with these exalted individuals during the first few minutes of an interview. Afterwards he resumed command of himself and his faculties, but at the beginning he was invariably flustered, scarlet of face, and inclined to perspiration.

"We will proceed to business at once," said Prince Eugen. "Will you take a seat, Mr. Sampson Levi?"

"I thank your Royal Highness."

"Now as to that loan which we had already practically arranged—a million, I think it was," said the Prince airily.

"A million," Levi acquiesced, toying with his enormous watch chain.

"Everything is now in order. Here are the papers, and I should like to finish the matter up at once."

"Exactly, your Highness, but——"

"But what? You months ago expressed the warmest satisfaction at the security, though I am quite prepared to admit that the security is of rather an unusual nature. You also agreed to the rate of interest. It is not every one, Mr. Levi, who can lend out a million at five and a half per cent. And in ten years the whole amount will be paid back. I—er—I believe I informed you that the fortune of Princess Anna, who is about to accept my hand, will ultimately amount to something like fifty million of marks, which is over two million pounds in your English money." Prince Eugen stopped. He had no fancy for talking in this confidential manner to financiers, but he felt that circumstances demanded it.

"You see, it's like this, your Royal Highness," began Mr. Sampson Levi, in his homely English idiom. "It's like this. I said I could keep that bit of money available till the end of June, and you were to give me an interview here before that date. Not having heard from your Highness, and not knowing your Highness' address, though my German agents made every inquiry, I concluded that you had made other arrangements, money being so cheap this last few months."

"I was unfortunately detained at Ostend," said Prince Eugen, with as much haughtiness as he could assume, "by—by important business. I have made no other arrangements, and I shall have need of the million. If you will be so good as to pay it to my London bankers——"

"I'm very sorry," said Mr. Sampson Levi, with a tremendous and dazzling air of politeness, which surprised even himself, "but my syndicate has now lent the money elsewhere. It's in South America—I don't mind telling your Highness that we've lent it to the Chilian Government."

"Hang the Chilian Government, Mr. Levi," exclaimed the Prince, and he went white. "I must have that million. It was an arrangement."

"It was an arrangement, I admit," said Mr. Sampson Levi; "but your Highness broke the arrangement."

There was a long silence.

"Do you mean to say," began the Prince with tense calmness, "that you are not in a position to let me have that million?"

"I could let your Highness have a million in a couple of years' time."

The Prince made a gesture of annoyance.

"Mr. Levi," he said, "if you do not place the money in my hands to-morrow you will ruin one of the oldest of reigning families, and, incidentally, you will alter the map of Europe. You are not keeping faith, and I had relied on you."

"Pardon me, your Highness," said little Levi, rising in resentment, "it is not I who have not kept faith. I beg to repeat that the money is no longer at my disposal, and to bid your Highness good-morning."

Digitized by Google

And Mr. Sampson Levi left the audience-chamber with an awkward, aggrieved bow.

It was a scene characteristic of the end of the nineteenth century—an overfed, commonplace, pursy little man who had been born in a Brixton semi-detached villa, and whose highest idea of pleasure was a Sunday up the river in an expensive electric launch, confronting and utterly routing, in a hotel belonging to an American millionaire, the representative of a race of men who had fingered every page of European history for centuries, and who still, in their native castles, were sursounded with every outward circumstance of pomp and power.

"Aribert," said Prince Eugen, a little later, "you were right. It is all over. I have only one refuge——"

"You don't mean——" Aribert stopped, dumfounded.

"Yes, I do," he said quickly. "I can manage it so that it will look like an accident."

TWENTY-FIRST CHAPTER.

The Return of Felix Babylon.

On the evening of Prince Eugen's fateful interview with Mr. Sampson Levi, Theodore Racksole was wandering somewhat aimlessly and uneasily about the entrance hall and adjacent corridors of the Grand Babylon. He had returned from Ostend only a day or two previously, and had endeavoured with all his might to forget the affair which had carried him there—to regard it, in fact, as done with. But he found himself unable to do so. In vain he remarked, under his breath, that there were some things which were best left alone; if his experience as a manipulator of markets, a contriver of gigantic schemes in New York, had taught him anything at all, it should surely have taught him that. Yet he could not feel reconciled to such a position. The mere presence of the princes in his hotel roused the fighting instincts of this man, who had never in his whole career been beaten. He had, as it were, taken up arms on their side, and if the Princes of Posen would not continue their own battle, nevertheless he, Theodore Racksole, wanted to continue it for them. To a certain extent of course, the battle had been won, for Prince Eugen had been rescued from an extremely difficult and dangerous position, and the enemy—consisting of Jules, Rocco, Miss Spencer, and perhaps others—had been put to flight. But that, he conceived, was not enough; it was very far from being enough. That the criminals—for criminals they decidedly were—should still be at large, he regarded as an absurd anomaly And there was another point; he had said nothing to the police of all that had occurred. He disdained the police, but he could scarcely fail to perceive that if the police should by accident gain a clue to the real state of the case he might be placed rather awkwardly, for the simple reason that in the eyes of the law it amounted to a misdemeanour to conceal as much as he had concealed.

He asked himself why he had adopted a policy of concealment, why he had become in any way interested in the Posen matter, and why, at this present moment, he should be so anxious to prosecute it further? To the first two questions he replied, rather lamely, that he had been influenced by Nella, and also by a natural spirit of adventure; to the third he replied that he had always been in the habit of carrying things through, and was now actuated by a mere childish, obstinate desire to carry this one through. Moreover, he was splendidly conscious of his perfect ability to carry it through. One additional impulse he had, though he did not admit it to himself, being by nature adverse to big words, and that was an abstract love of justice, the Anglo-Saxon's deep-founded instinct for helping the right side to conquer, even when grave risks must thereby be run, with no corresponding advantage.

He was turning these things over in his mind as he walked about the vast hotel on that evening of the last day in July. The Society papers had been stating for a week past that London was empty, but, in spite of the Society papers, London

Renewed Beauty for the Stout.

After years of suffering and humiliation, excessive stoutness and all the malaise and depression which accompany that condition may be cured with surprising ease by a careful course of "Russell," and the restored beauty of proportions is not merely temporary but permanent. The "Russell" treatment is the one true and scientific means of lastingly ridding the system of all superfluous fat, both internal and abdominal, whilst at the same time assuring a return to robust health and strength. The effects of the course show themselves within twenty-four hours of starting it. In that time there is a reduction varying from ½lb. to 2lb. (in extreme cases even more), and the subsequent daily decrease is steadily progressive until complete return to normal weight and beautiful proportions, when the treatment may cease. The chief agent employed is a pleasant, harmless, tonic liquid, purely vegetable in composition, and the recipe is published in "Corpulency and the Cure," Mr. Russell's standard work. The appetite is greatly improved, with increased digestive power; and as no drastic restrictions as to food are required, the increased amount of wholesome nourishment taken enriches the blood, solidifies the muscles, revivifies nerve power, and goes to promote brain force as well. Hence the wonderful recuperative and reductive effect combined of the famous "Russell" treatment. Those who desire to learn all about it should certainly procure a free copy of "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages), by the discoverer of the treatment. For this they have only to address three penny stamps (for postage under private envelope) to Mr. F. Cecil Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., when a copy of the book will be sent them by return post.

Can Corpulency be Cured?

Yes, most emphatically; corpulency can be cured, and permanently cured, by means of the pleasant and easy treatment now known all over the world as the "Russell" treatment, which has once and for all replaced all the old-time exhausting and dangerous methods of fat reduction which have wrought so much harm to past generations of stout people. Those of our readers who are afflicted with too much "embonpoint" are most earnestly recommended to give a few hours' careful study to the lucidly-written little book, "Corpulency and the Cure," by the founder of the "Russell" treatment, Mr. F. Cecil Russell. A perusal of this useful and comprehensive work of 256 pages, now regarded as the standard authority, may be of untold advantage to many who have suffered for years from an uncomely and depressing burden of fat, which has withstood every kind of treatment. Many hundreds of extracts from personal statements of those who have gone through the "Russell" régime are printed in the book, and afford overwhelming evidence of the unique efficacy and the permanent benefits to be derived from the treatment, which is tonic, strengthening and vitalising, as well as wonderfully powerful as a permanent fat-reducing remedy. Within twenty-four hours of beginning the course, from ½lb. to 2lb. of superfluous fat is eliminated from the system, and this surprising reduction is followed by a consistent daily loss of weight until perfect proportions and normal weight are attained, when the treatment may cease. Meanwhile the appetite is greatly increased, and requires to be satisfied, the digestion is improved, and health and strength and energy become permanent possessions. There are no irrational restrictions as to food and drink. "Corpulency and the Cure," which also gives the recipe of the principal preparation—a harmless liquid of a purely herbal nature—used in the treatment, may be obtained by any of our stout friends by sending three penny stamps (for postage under sealed envelope) to Mr. F. Cecil Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

persisted in seeming to be just as full as ever. The Grand Babylon was certainly not as crowded as it had been a month earlier, but it was doing a very passable business. At the close of the season the gay butterflies of the social community have a habit of hovering for a day or two in the big hotels before they flutter away to castle and country-house, meadow and moor, lake and stream. The great basket-chairs in the portico were well filled by old and middle-aged gentlemen engaged in enjoying the varied delights of liqueurs, cigars, and the full moon which floated so serenely above the Thames.

Here and there a pretty woman on the arm of a cavalier in immaculate attire swept her train as she turned to and fro in the promenade of the terrace. Waiters and uniformed commissionaires and gold-braided doorkeepers moved noiselessly about; at short intervals the chief of the doorkeepers blew his shrill whistle and hansoms drove up with tinkling bell to take away a pair of butterflies to some place of amusement or boredom; occasionally a private carriage drawn by expensive and self-conscious horses put the hansoms to shame by its mere outward glory. It was a hot night, a night for the summer woods, and save for the vehicles there was no rapid movement of any kind. It seemed as though the world—the world, that is to say, of the Grand Babylon—was fully engaged in the solemn processes of digestion and small-talk. Even the long row of the Embankment gas-lamps, stretching right and left, scarcely trembled in the still, warm, caressing air. The stars overhead looked down with many blinkings upon the enormous pile of the Grand Babylon, and the moon regarded it with bland and changeless face; what they thought of it and its inhabitants cannot, unfortunately, be recorded. What Theodore Racksole thought of the moon can be recorded—he thought it was a nuisance. It somehow fascinated his gaze with its silly stare, and so interfered with his complex meditations. He glanced round at the well-dressed and satisfied people—his guests, his customers. They appeared to ignore him absolutely. Probably only a very small percentage of them had the least idea that this tall, spare man, with the iron-grey hair and the thin, firm, resolute face, who wore his American-cut evening clothes with such careless ease, was the sole proprietor of the Grand Babylon, and possibly the richest man in Europe. As had already been stated, Racksole was not a celebrity in England. The guests of the Grand Babylon saw merely a restless male person, whose restlessness was rather a disturber of their quietude, but with whom, to judge by his countenance, it would be inadvisable to remonstrate. Therefore Theodore Racksole continued his perambulations unchallenged, and kept saying to himself, "I must do something." But what? He could think of no course to pursue.

At last he walked straight through the hotel and out at the other entrance, and so up the little unassuming side street into the roaring torrent of the narrow and crowded Strand. He jumped on a Putney 'bus, and paid his fair to Putney, fivepence, and then, finding that the humble occupants of the vehicle stared at the spectacle of a man in evening dress but without a dust-coat, he jumped off again, oblivious of the fact that the conductor jerked a thumb towards him and winked at the passengers, as who should say, "There goes a lunatic." He went into a tobacconist's shop and asked for a cigar. The shopman mildly inquired what price.

"What are the best you've got?" asked Theodore Racksole.

"Five shillings each, sir," said the man promptly.

"Give me a penny one," was Theodore Racksole's laconic request, and he walked out of the shop smoking the penny cigar. It was a new sensation for him.

He was inhaling the aromatic odours of Eugène Rimmel's establishment for the sale of scents when a gentleman, walking slowly in the opposite direction, accosted him with a quiet, "Good-evening, Mr. Racksole." The millionaire did not at first recognise his interlocutor, who wore a travelling overcoat, and was carrying a hand bag. Then a slight, pleased smile passed over his features, and he held out his hand.

"Well, Mr. Babylon," he greeted the other, "of all persons in the wide world you are the man I would most have wished to meet."

"You flatter me," said the little Anglicised Swiss.

"No, I don't," answered Racksole; "it isn't my custom, any more than it's yours. I wanted to have a real good long yarn with you, and lo! here you are! Where have you sprung from?"

"From Lausanne," said Félix Babylon. "I had finished my duties there, I had nothing else to do, and I felt homesick. I felt the nostalgia of London, and so I came over, just as you see," and he raised the handbag for Racksole's notice. "One toothbrush, one razor, two slippers, eh!" He laughed. "I was wondering as I walked along where I should stay—me, Félix Babylon, homeless in London."

"I should advise you to stay at the Grand Babylon," Racksole laughed back. "It is a good hotel, and I know the proprietor personally."

"Rather expensive, is it not?" said Babylon.

"To you, sir," answered Racksole, "the inclusive terms will be exactly half a crown a week. Do you accept?"

"I accept," said Babylon, and added, "You are very good, Mr. Racksole."

They strolled together back to the hotel, saying nothing in particular, but feeling very content with each other's company.

"Many customers?" asked Félix Babylon.

"Very tolerable," said Racksole, assuming as much of the air of the professional hotel proprietor as he could. "I think I may say, in the storekeeper's phrase, that if there is any business about I am doing it. To-night the people are all on the terrace in the portico—it's so confoundedly hot—and the consumption of ice is simply enormous—nearly as large as it would be in New York."

"In that case," said Babylon politely, "let me offer you another cigar."

"But I have not finished this one."

"That is just why I wish to offer you another one. A cigar such as yours, my good friend, ought never to be smoked within the precincts of the Grand Babylon, not even by the proprietor of the Grand Babylon, and especially when all the guests are assembled in the portico. The fumes of it would ruin any hotel."

Theodore Racksole laughingly lighted the Rothschild Havana which Babylon gave him, and they entered the hotel arm in arm. But no sooner had they mounted the steps than little Félix became the object of numberless greetings. It appeared that he had been highly popular among his quondam guests. At last they reached the managerial room, where Babylon was regaled on a chicken, and Racksole assisted him in the consumption of a bottle of Heidsieck Monopole, Carte d'Or.

"This chicken is almost perfectly grilled," said Babylon at length. "It is a credit to the house. But, why, my dear Racksole, why in the name of Heaven did you quarrel with Rocco?"

"Then you have heard?"

"Heard! My dear friend, it was in every newspaper on the Continent. Some journals prophesied that the Grand Babylon would have to close its doors within half a year now that Rocco has deserted it. But of course I knew better. I knew that you must have had a good reason for allowing Rocco to depart, and that you must have made arrangements in advance for a substitute."

"As a matter of fact, I had not made arrangements in advance," said Theodore Racksole, a little ruefully; "but happily we have found in our second sous-chef an artist inferior only to Rocco himself. That, however, was mere good fortune."

"Surely," said Babylon, "it was indiscreet to trust to mere good fortune in such a serious matter?"

(Another long instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY!

This Phenomenal Offer is made to the readers of "Short Stories," 14/5/1904. On receipt of Postal Order for 5/-, we will forward, Direct from our Looms to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in 30 different patterns and art colourings, to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for our goods below the actual cost of production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms thus saving the purchasers all middle profits.

OVER 200,000 SOLD DURING THE PAST 12 MONTHS.

GIVEN AWAY! GIVEN AWAY!

With every Carpet we shall Absolutely Give Away a very handsome Rug to match, or we will send 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs for 9/6

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.
Thousands of Repeat Orders and Unsolicited Testimonials Received.

Illustrated Bargain Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Table Linen Curtains, &c., post free.

F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.) Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants.
WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Sale Price: 3/6 Postage 4d. extra.

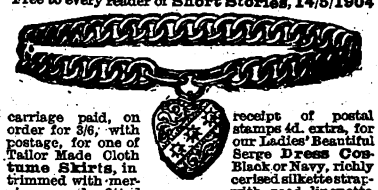
Free Gifts. Sizes: 38, 40, 42-

F. HODGSON & SONS, City of Leeds, will Present Free to every reader of Short Stories, 14/5/1904



carriage paid, on receipt of postal order for 3/6, with stamps 4d. extra, for postage, for one of our Ladies' Beautiful Tailor Made Cloth Serge Dress Costume Skirts, in Black or Navy, richly trimmed with mercerised silkette strappings, and fitted with good linenette pocket. We shall include FREE with each Skirt a Massive 18-ct. Gold Pattern Curb Bracelet, with Heart Pendant, mounted with Pearls and Turquoise, and scented with Forget-me-Nots. Cased with Pure Gold.

Money willingly returned if not approved. Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Curtains, &c., post free.

Address: F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.), Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

A course of this famous remedy will, as certainly as water quenches thirst, impart new vigour to the Stomach and Digestive Organs. The Liver and Kidneys will be cleansed and regulated, the Blood purified, and the general health soundly re-established.

BEECHAM'S PILLS have done this for many thousands of suffering and distressed people; why should they not do as much for you?

BEECHAM'S PILLS are specially suitable for the ailments peculiar to Females of all ages.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

TEN DAYS' FREE TRIAL

Allowed on every cycle bought of us. Your Money with carriage charges refunded without question if not perfectly satisfactory.

Highest grade fully warranted

BRITISH MADE CYCLES

LATEST MODELS £2-10 to £6

New Departure Free Wheel and Hub Brake, BEST MAKES Tyres, and best British-made equipment.

200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES all makes, good as new, £1 to £2-10

Factory clearing sale at half prices.

EARN A CYCLE taking orders from sample machine furnished by us. Active Agents wanted in each district. Large profits easily made. Write at once for free catalogues and our special offer. Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonos half prices.

MEAD CYCLE CO. Dept. 44E,
85-97, Paradise Street, Liverpool,
19, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

FREEMAN'S

TRADE MARK

THE ORIGINAL & ONLY TRUE

CHLORODYNE

Best Remedy for Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 6s., or postage free by the INVENTOR, R. FREEMAN, 70 KENNINGTON PARK ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

RECOMMENDED BY MEDICAL MEN.

N.B.—Lord Chancellor Selborne, Lord Justices James and Mellish, decided in favour of Freeman's Original Chlorodyne, and against Browne & Davenport, compelling them to pay all costs.
—"Times," 24-7-73.

A Good Cycle

At a FAIR price is cheaper than a poor Cycle at ANY price. Buy the best and avoid risks.
"CENTAURS," "COVENTRY CHALLENGE," "HUMBERS," "PREMIERS," "ROVERS," "SWIFTS," "SINGERS," &c.
Their names guarantee their quality.

FROM 8/- MONTHLY.

WITHIN YOUR REACH

A HIGH-GRADE COVENTRY CYCLE FOR £6
On approval. Two Years' Warranty.
Write for Lists (Free).
EDWARD O'BRIEN Ltd. (Dept. S3),
World's Largest Cycle Dealers, COVENTRY.

GIVEN AWAY

with next week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 540)

A PAPER PATTERN of this

GIRL'S FROCK.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents

PRICE ONE PENNY.

IF YOU WANT

to make your Old Blouse into a New Blouse for 4d.

Buy a cake of
MAYPOLE SOAP
Dyes any Colour
No MESS — No TROUBLE

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Two Brothers—Same Girl.

"I AM seventeen," writes "TRUE LOVE." "I am in love with a girl. My brother is also paying his attentions to her, but is rather a flirt. The young lady has a liking for both of us. I am not sure which of us she really likes the better. I also doubt whether there is any real love between her and my brother. How am I to find out the facts?"

* * * * *

It seems that the case of the young lady is "How happy could I be with either." Evidently she has not made up her own mind about the matter. The thing for you to do is to ask your brother definitely what are his own intentions. Is he really in love with her? If, as you say, he is not, then can you not ask him to desist from going further? It is fairly certain that so long as both of you continue to pay the girl attentions, so long will she keep her own counsel as to which she prefers. One or other of you must make a declaration.

The Workman's Wife Question.

THE best kind of wife, "M. R. E.," in my opinion, for a working-man, is not, as you seem to think, either a servant or a working-girl. A servant, though used to housework, has had no practice in economy, but rather the reverse, for living in the household of those wealthier than herself, she has gained ideas of life which are very often beyond her own station. A working-girl, too, has had no experience of actual housework, as from an early date she has worked out. Besides, she is not very often strong in health, owing to the nature of her life. The best kind of girl is one used to working at home for her own family, and if you could meet such a girl, who has been brought up in the country, you will have hit on the ideal wife for a working-man.

Red Hair and True Love.

"AFFLICTED."—What a funny love affair. You are nineteen, and engaged to a young lady. But you will not be able to marry until you are thirty. Your hair is of a distinct red, and much to the distress of your sweetheart, it seems to get redder and redder as time goes on. She does not say anything about it, but you can see it pains her. Do I think you ought to bind her to wait eleven years?"

* * * * *

Well, if your hair goes on reddening at such a rate, it is terrible to think what it may be like in eleven years' time. It seems a pretty severe test to ask a girl to wait so long for any man, but for you to ask her to wait until a time when your hair must become a public danger, seems like cruelty. There is, however, an old-fashioned way out of the dilemma. Tell her you will dye for her—and keep your promise.

The Friendship of Actresses.

"I WAS very friendly," writes "FREDDIE," "with a lady two years my junior. In a foolish moment we had a row, and have not spoken for some time. She has plainly told her girl friends that she wishes we had never quarrelled. In the meantime, however, I have met several ladies on the stage who have much attracted me. I have not the courage to break off with them and go back to the lady I quarrelled with. Meanwhile, she has not flirted or taken walks with anybody else. What would you advise?"

* * * * *

As there are several "ladies on the stage," I suppose one may say there is safety in numbers. You have not fallen in love with any special lady, but are merely attracted by all of them, so why should you not resume your former friendship with the other young lady? Take pity on her, and see how constant she has been to you, even though you have quarrelled, and try to make it up. The fascination of "ladies on the stage" is not a serious affair, and happens to most young men once in their lives. It is a very different thing from real love, however, and you should not confuse the two.

On Leaving a Dance.

"BERTIE."—If you find you have to leave the dance when you are still down on three ladies' programmes, it would be the correct thing for you to try to find the ladies, and make your apologies in person. If, as you say, you cannot recognise the ladies, then it might be permissible for you to request your host or hostess to apologise for you to them. It is, of course, very impolite for a partner not to turn up when his dance is due, even if he is very pleasantly occupied with another than his partner. However, ladies sometimes forgive the missing one—when they, too, are pleasantly occupied with another.

An Unhappy Engagement.

"I HAVE recently met a young man," writes "NAN," "who is engaged to another girl. It is a very unhappy engagement, as she is very unkind to him—only sees him when she likes, and sometimes says she can't come at the last moment, without any explanation. I am violently in love with him, and he comes to see me once a week. He has never said he is in love with me, but tells me all about his miserable affair with the other girl. He thinks she is tired of him, but does not care to say so. How can I act?"

* * * * *

As he seems to confide everything in you, it really seems as though he is fond of you. Men don't usually confide their love affairs to other girls otherwise. While, of course, you must not interfere in his own engagement, however unhappy it may be, by continuing to show your sympathy his feelings towards you may grow to such an extent that he will break off the engagement for you. Don't attempt to force matters, but rest content with the present state of affairs, until things develop.

The Troubles of Entertaining.

"WHY do I feel so awkward and ill at ease," writes "RECENTLY MARRIED," "whenever my husband brings any friends home to tea or supper? I am very nervous, and cannot think of anything to say to my guests. My husband, I am sure, is much annoyed about it."

* * * * *

I am sure "RECENTLY MARRIED," that if you think less about your feelings, and remember that you, as hostess, should be the one to try and put your visitors at their ease, you will soon get over your nervousness, and will forget that you ever were so shy.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildin, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

MISCELLANEOUS ADVERTISEMENTS.

Will be inserted in this column at the rate of 6d. per line of 8 words or part thereof. All advertisements should be addressed to Advertisement Manager, "Short Stories," 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., 11 days prior to date of appearance.

Pawnbroker's Clearance Sale. 10/6. Lady's 18-Carat Gold-Cased Keyless Watch, Jewelled movement, exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also long Watch-guard, 18-Carat Gold (stamped) filled; two together only 10/6; approval.

10/6. Gent's 18-Carat Gold-Cased Chronograph Stop Watch, Jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper; 10 years' warranty; also 18-Carat Gold (stamped) filled Double Curb Albert, Seal attached; three together, 10/6; approval before payment.

19/6. Lady's Six-Guinea Solid Gold Keyless Watch, richly engraved; splendid timekeeper; 10 years' warranty; week's trial; sacrifice 19/6.

10/6. Lady's Solid Gold (hall-marked) Five-Guinea Diamond and Emerald Doublet Half-hoop Ring; large lustrous stones, 10/6; approval.

8/6. Handsome Long Watch-guard.—Real 18-carat gold (stamped) filled; ditto, heavier (extra long), exceptionally choice design, 10/6; approval.

10/6. Field Glass, Four-Guinea Military Binocular; 50 miles' range; 10 Achromatic Crystal Lenses, Wide Field; saddler-made sling case; sacrifice, 10/6; approval.

E. C. DAVIS, 26 Denmark Hill, London.

Lace Curtains.—Maker's Stock; thousands of pairs; beautiful designs; buy at 25 per cent. below shops; catalogue free.—Milner's, 28 Hyde Park, Leeds.

"Poultry Keeping for Pleasure and Profit," by F. E. Wilson. A thoroughly reliable and practical handbook. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (P. K. Dept.) 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Walking," by C. Lang Neil, is a thoroughly practical guide to pedestrianism, contains information as to how to train in order to become an expert walker, &c. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (W. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Small Gardens, and How to Make the Most of Them," by Violet Biddle, is just the book for those desirous of procuring the best possible results from their gardens. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (S. G. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Cricket," Edited by G. L. Jessop, contains practical instructions as to how to play the game by K. S. Ranjitsinhji, C. B. Fry, G. L. Jessop, and others. Price 1/2, post free, from the Publisher (C. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Photography.—"How to Take and Fake Photographs," by Clive Holland, contains all information required by the beginner. Price 1/2, post free, from the Publisher (P. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Private Work.—Authors' MSS. carefully typewritten, 10d. 1,000. Many unsolicited testimonials.—Mrs. Wells, High Street, Uppingham.

Old Artificial Teeth Bought.—Call or forward by post; full value per return, or offer made.—Messrs. O. Browning, Manufacturing Dentists, 133 Oxford Street, London. (Established 100 years.)

Field Glasses.—Extremely fine pair Regulatio Glasses (Army pattern) very long (30 mile) range, purchased for officer's use in Transvaal, not now required; leather case and strap; worth 75/-; will sacrifice for 11/9; approval before payment proof of genuineness.—F. Barker (Quartermaster), "Durdans," Brixton, S.W.

Baldness Cured. Free Trial.—A French Specialist who has devoted his life to the study of Hair Diseases, having cured thousands of almost hopeless cases, will send a genuine inexpensive treatment to all who write enclosing 2 stamps. New Hair grows in 4 to 10 days.—K. Henri-Francis, Brixton Road London.

Rabbits.—The best book on the subject is "Rabbit Keeping for Pleasure and Profit," by George Gardner. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (R. Dept.) 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Swimming," by Montagus Holbein, the celebrated Channel Swimmer, is a splendid book for those who wish to become good swimmers. Price 1/2 from the Publisher (S. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Eczema and all Skin Eruptions.—A victim who was cured after 5 years' suffering will gladly send full particulars of an inexpensive guaranteed Cure on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Address: F. M. Pacidarma, 3 Swallow Street, Piccadilly, London.

Lady's Dress Ring, Florida Rubies & Diamonds, 18-carat gold (stamped) filled, 3/-. Approval before payment.—C. D. J., 41a Coventry House, South Place, London, E.C.

Art.—Work at home, tinting prints, post-cards, etc.; easily acquired; good prices. Addressed envelope, Art Company, 6 Gt. James Street, London, W.C.

Tents, Marquees!—40 feet from 24s. 9d. Particulars free.—Brennan, Water Lane, Tower Street, London.

Teeth Bought, Gold and Platinum. Banker's reference.—Apply, Teeth by Instalments Institute, 48 Edgware Road, W.

SYMONDS' SAFE CYCLES

Women, men, girls and boys in all vocations are riding Symonds' Cycles. Greatest value ever known. Prices £4 to £8. Easy payments. No guarantors required. Catalogue free.

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128, City Rd., London, E.C.

TO CURE DRUNKARDS

with or without their knowledge. Send Stamp for FREE TRIAL PACKAGE of a wonderful remedy that has saved homes. Send no money. Address in confidence: WARD CHEMICAL Co., 51 Century House, Regent Street, London, W.

TELL COOK

KEATING'S POWDER

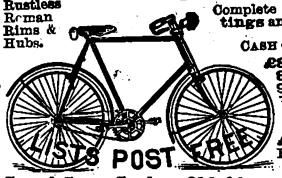
KILLS

BLACK BEETLES

This Only 5½ 6½ & 8½

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN

Rustless Rims & Hubs.



Complete with All Fittings and Carriage Paid.

CASH OR 12 MONTHLY PAYMENTS of

£3 0 0 „ 15/- ea.
3 3 0 „ 1 /10 „
9 0 0 „ 16/3 „
10.0 „ 1 /6 „

JUNO Motor Cycles, 3 H.P., £34, or Monthly Payments.

LISTS POST FREE.

JUNO Two-Speed Gear Cycles, £12 12s., or 12 Payments of 23/4 each. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories; over 130 pages and Hundreds of Illustrations, sent post free.

Metropolitan Machinists' Co. Ld., S.S. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London E.C.; and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

From 6/- Monthly. Special Offer. 500 New Cycles £3 10s. 500 Genuine B.S.A. £6 10s. Sample Victory Motor Cycle £26. Sent carr. paid before payment. Agents Wanted

Dereham Rd. Cycle Co., Norwich

"No Better Food."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED

"Strongest and Best."—Health

Cocoa

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"MENE"

A SAMPLE ½ DOZEN OF THESE FAMOUS SANITARY TOWELS IN ASSORTED SIZES, WILL BE SENT POST FREE FOR SIX STAMPS.

NONE EQUAL THEM FOR CLEANLINESS COMFORT & ECONOMY.

SOLD BY ALL UNDERCLOTHING HOUSES AND CHEMISTS.

LADIES SHOULD WRITE FOR SAMPLE TO MISS HAYNES 57 FARRINGDON ST LONDON E.C.

FENDERS

AND BEDSTEADS of Every Description Direct from Works.

Also CURBS, FIRE IRONS, BRASSES, FIRE GUARDS, &c.

Send particulars of your requirements.
Sketches and Prices can be sent on at once.

SPARKHILL FENDER AND BEDSTEAD CO.,
B88 DURHAM ROAD, BIRMINGHAM.

BABY CARS.

Buy direct and save 5/- in the £. Easy Payments from 3/6 Monthly. Good discount for cash. Every Car sent carriage paid, on approval. Our Catalogue shows many lovely styles, send for it.

DIRECT PUBLIC SUPPLY CO., COVENTRY.

ORDER

and Brightness Prevail where

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH is Used.

BRITISH ALL THROUGH.

Free from Acid, Poison, and Grit.

PRODUCES QUICKLY A LASTING BRILLIANCY.

Manufacturers: The "MATCHLESS" Metal Polish Co. Ltd., Liverpool.

"The pickle of pickles."

THE MILITARY PICKLE.

A choice condiment of Oriental Fruits and English Vegetables.

HAYWARD BROS. Ltd., 319 KENNINGTON ROAD, S.E.

SAVOUR TO THE FOOD AND STRENGTH TO THE BODY IS CONTAINED IN

CEREBOS SALT

THE "SIRDAR" RUG-WOOL

FIRST & BEST FOR RUG & MAT MAKING

ENDLESS WEAR.

BRIGHT IN FINISH! OF SUPERIOR QUALITY!

May be had in 30 Art Shades from the principal dealers. Insist on having the "SIRDAR" & TAKE NO SUBSTITUTE.

PLAIN DIRECTIONS FOR RUG & MAT MAKING FREE.

WHOLESALE ONLY FROM

HARRAP BROS. BECTIVE MILLS, WAKEFIELD

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID WHITSUN HOLIDAY NUMBER.

SHORT STORIES

"Promise to marry me," she cried, "or your pursuers below shall capture you!"

(An Intensely Dramatic Incident from the Magnificent Complete Story, "The Greed of Gold." See inside.)

No. 803. Week ending May 21, 1904. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

FOR THE COMPLETE ENJOYMENT OF YOUR HOLIDAY
YOU WILL WANT A

KODAK

Whether for a cycling or walking tour, or for any other holiday, a KODAK will furnish that recreative change you require.

If you travel alone the KODAK is the best of all companions.
If you go with friends a KODAK adds to their enjoyment as well as your own.

A serviceable
KODAK
may be bought for 5/-
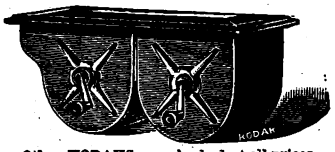
and a complete Photographic Outfit for the beginner, including a



KODAK Daylight Developing Machine, for £1.

Other KODAKS may be had at all prices to suit every pocket.

Ask your Dealer for full particulars of these, as well as of the great £1,000 KODAK AMATEUR COMPETITION, or write direct to
KODAK Limited,
41-43, CLERKENWELL ROAD, LONDON, E.C.; and Branches.
As the hall-mark on silver is the name "Kodak" on Photographic Goods.
Refuse all imitations.

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

A medicine of which the people have long known the remedial value in
BILIOUS AND LIVER DISORDERS,
SICK-HEADACHE, FAILING APPETITE,
LANGUOR AND WANT OF TONE,
caused by depressed conditions of the nervous system. In all such cases it is not too much to say that the benefit to be derived from a judicious use of
BEECHAM'S PILLS
is practically known all over the world.

BEECHAM'S PILLS
are specially suitable for Females of all ages. Every woman who values health should read the instructions wrapped round each box.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1s. 1½d. (56 pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 pills).

"NO BETTER FOOD."
Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's
Pure Concentrated
Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

ONE DOSE of
Kaputine cures in Ten minutes the most violent Headache or Neuralgic Pain no matter what the cause of the attack.

KAPUTINE is not an aperient, but is for one purpose only—to cure Headache and Neuralgia.
KAPUTINE
Cures in Ten Minutes.
Kaputine goes right to the seat of the trouble—the Nerves—it puts the Nerves right, that is why it cures almost instantly
Headache or Neuralgia.
Refuse dangerous white Headache Powders, such as have been condemned by the press. Demand Kaputine, the remedy that is backed up by medical testimony—the Safe Remedy.
Packets of 18 doses 1s.; Samples 1d. each. Of all Medicine Dealers.
Samples Free from Proprietors:
C. G. Kaputine, Huddersfield.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

BODLEIAN LIBRARY 18 OCT 1904
Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 803.] [ONE PENNY.

Week Ending May 21st, 1904.

THE GREED OF GOLD.

A Thrilling Tale of Love, Passion, and Hate.

Containing the Incident Depicted on the Cover.

"WHAT! Marry the daughter of a country rector! And you ask me to give my consent! Do you think me as profound a fool as yourself?"

Andrew Conway found it difficult to proceed. His anger seemed to deprive him of the power to speak the words that foamed to his lips. But his hearer was in no way abashed. Roy Conway faced his uncle without flinching.

"Yes," he said calmly, "I am no schoolboy now, and I believe I have the undisputed right to choose whomsoever I will in a question which so nearly affects my future happiness. I am sorry to find you so quick to oppose me in my choice of a wife. But, in justice to myself, I must abide by the decision to which I have come. Miss Laura Merrivale, though but the daughter of a country rector, is equal to me in all other respects than that of birth. Nay, she is, in many respects, by far my superior. And as to fortune, what have I to boast of? I have no separate income of my own, save a few hundreds a year bequeathed to me by my dead father, and I owe all else to your indulgence."

Andrew Conway brought his hand down upon the table with a mighty thud. His anger was terrible to witness and his voice could be heard outside the room in which the two men sat.

"You fool!" he burst out. "Have you not sense enough to see that it is this very fact which makes it imperative—do you hear me, sir?—imperative that you should marry a woman of means? The bulk of my money goes to my son in India. He can choose a wife wheresoever he will. But you—you will have a few more paltry hundreds added to those you already have—nothing more. I have spent money on your education with a lavishness that was due to this one hope. You are well born, and poor. A wealthy marriage is the only possible course for you to take. Please consider this as final, sir, and let me hear no more of this rector's daughter."

He waved his nephew aside, as though the matter were concluded. Roy Conway passed out through the French windows that led from his uncle's study to the smooth grass-grown lawn.

"It's likely to be a battle royal," he said below his breath. "But love will conquer in the end. Poor little Laura! I wonder what she would say could she hear the old fellow. He's been awfully good to me; but, ah, there's the rub! Well, I must try to win him over in time."

All rights reserved.]

Musing thus, he crossed the lawn and passed out on to the high road. After such a scene, it was as well to seek the soothing society of Laura Merrivale.

* * * * * * *

Ralph Warner was sitting by the writing-table in the study of his tasteful but miniature villa. With an exclamation of surprise, he broke the seal of a thin packet which bore the Indian postmark. True, he had written to his cousin, Egbert Conway, a couple of months back, but he had scarcely looked for a reply. Opening the letter, he read as follows:—

"Illawarra, India.

"DEAR SIR,—I have to announce the sad and unexpected death of a young gentleman travelling through this neighbourhood. From letters found in his possession I gather that his name is Mr. Egbert Conway, a cousin of your own. His father is, I believe, still living, and residing in the same district as yourself. I deemed it wise, therefore, to write first to you, in order that you may have the opportunity of more gently breaking the sad news to the bereaved father. The circumstances of Mr. Egbert Conway's death are most painful. As you are doubtless aware, he revelled in big-game hunting, and it was while on a solitary expedition of this kind, and accompanied only by a few natives, that he lost his life. It is, I fear, but a poor satisfaction that we have succeeded in killing the tiger who was responsible for this sad affair.—Yours very sincerely,

"M. J. CAREW."

Ralph Warner uttered an exclamation, not of sorrow, but of surprise. For some time he sat there, silently thinking of all this would mean. His face was not a pleasant one. Greed, avarice, covetousness, self-indulgence—all were plainly to be seen there. Presently he began to speak, in a low undertone that was full of dark, mysterious significance.

"So!" he whispered softly to himself. "The road is being cleared. Andrew Conway cannot live for ever. His only son is dead, struck down by a tiger. His nephew Roy is therefore the present heir to all his great wealth. After him—ah, then comes my turn! It's fortunate the old man regards me favourably. I, too, am his nephew, and—some day—well, we shall see."

Again he mused, but presently resumed his monologue.

"The old man's heart is none of the strongest," he whispered. "If I were to break this news to him—suddenly——"

Once more he paused, and a different idea flashed through his brain

Digitized by Google

"Suppose—suppose—he should be—murdered—and—and Roy should be accused of the crime. Suppose—Roy should be—hanged!"

He started, looking nervously about him. Then he put on his hat and went out for a walk in the wood hard by.

* * * * * * *

It was night. Dark clouds were hurrying across the sky, blotting out the moon with their thick, impenetrable pall. The hour was late, and Ralph Warner's little villa stood dark and silent by the side of the road.

Presently the figure of a girl came stealing along amid the many shadows till she reached the gate of the villa. Entering silently, she approached the window of the dark study and tapped softly on the pane. There was no response. The window was open a few inches, and, after a moment's hesitation, the girl lifted it still higher and climbed into the room. Closing the window again, she drew down the blind, and striking a match, lit the lamp which stood upon the table. The next instant her eyes fell on the letter which Ralph Warner had that day received from India, and, picking it up, she read it through. When she had finished, the expression on her face was a curious mixture of horror, fear, hope, craft, dread, and anticipation. It was a beautiful face, but the beauty was that of a woman in whose breast all the passions of life are allowed to revel unchecked—beauty that fascinated, yet repelled.

"Ah!" she said, sinking into a chair. "So one hindrance is removed from his path! He may play a desperate game now—nay, if I know the man, he will! Well, he mustn't forget me!"

A smile of cruel triumph came into her dark, gipsy eyes—a smile that showed all the possibilities of her fierce, uncontrollable nature—that made one instinctively remember the tiger—and shudder.

"He's been trying to shake me off of late," she went on. "He doesn't know what such love as mine can be when it turns to hate. You are a masterful man, Ralph Warner, but you may carry it too far with me. I have played the weak woman long enough. It will be wise not to rouse me into the fiend I can be. I wonder where he is gone. Perhaps——"

She started to her feet. A moment, and she had extinguished the lamp, and was once more hurrying through the darkness of the night.

Presently she came to the gates of Andrew Conway's great house. Passing these, she slipped through a gap in the hedge, and, stealing among the tall trees, came at last to the lawn before the house. A light was burning in the study, whence the sound of angry voices reached her ear. Was Ralph Warner with his uncle? Was he breaking to him the news of his son's death? If so, why this angry uproar? She was just about to creep still closer to the house when the French windows were thrown suddenly open, and Roy Conway, flushed and irritated, burst out of the room and hurried across the lawn to the road beyond.

For a few minutes Julia Tempest stood where she was. She was just in the act of moving away when she saw a dark shadow come between her and the light of the study lamp. An instant later she saw a quick flash, and a sharp report rang out through the night. Then, almost before she could realise it, the figure of a man dashed past her in the darkness. He did not see her as he flew by. But she both saw and recognised him. For the man was none other than Ralph Warner.

* * * * * * *

The court was crowded to the doors. From far and near the people had come to hear the trial of a case that was regarded as the most remarkable and sensational of their generation. For upwards of a year the prisoner had been in custody. Remand had followed remand, till the indictment of murder had to be abandoned and the charge of wounding with intent to kill substituted in its place.

Amid the whispering of the many spectators and the cries of the court ushers, the judge took his seat, the prisoner was placed in the dock, and the evidence began. It was shown that one, Andrew Conway, had been fired at with a revolver more than twelve months before. The object of the crime was unquestionably one of murder. Yet, by a curious circumstance, the bullet, which had lodged in the victim's brain, had not effected his death, but had produced a state of coma, indefinitely protracted, and the unhappy gentleman was still alive. Not once in all the past year had he recovered consciousness, but lay there in his bed, uttering no sound, with his eyes half closed, his face white and ghastly.

The law decrees that, should a man live beyond a year and a day after his life has been attempted, the charge of murder shall not be brought against his assailant. Week by week the death of Andrew Conway had been expected. But he still lingered in a state of living death, and Roy Conway, his nephew, stood arraigned for the crime of wounding with intent to kill.

The court was hot and stifling. Wearily the many witnesses took their places in the box and gave their evidence. From the very first, the case looked black against the accused. Servants swore to the repeated quarrels between Andrew Conway and his nephew Roy, and the evident unwillingness with which they gave their evidence told strongly against the prisoner. Angry threats, spoken during these quarrels and now repeated by the servants, seemed to possess a terrible significance in the light of the subsequent tragedy. And then the revolver was produced in court and shown to them one by one. No one attempted to deny it. It was the property of Roy Conway. It had been sent to the gunsmith's two days before the tragedy for some repairs, and had been returned late in the afternoon of the day preceding the night of the crime. Roy Conway was out when it arrived, and the butler had taken it in and laid it upon the hall-table ready for Roy when he should return.

No one seemed to think it worth while to state that Andrew Conway's other nephew, Ralph Warner, had called that same afternoon, while the revolver lay upon the hall-table. The weapon was Roy's.

A violent scene had taken place between the two men—a scene that had terminated, on one side at least, in blows. A few moments later, the sound of a shot was heard, and, rushing in, they found their master prone upon the floor with a wound in his head. The fateful revolver was picked up outside the French windows, and, later, Roy Conway was discovered pacing agitatedly beneath the park trees. A piece of his tweed coat was tightly grasped in his uncle's hand. But from that day to this, poor Andrew Conway had spoken no word.

It all came to an end at last. And, amid the profoundest stillness in the crowded court, Roy Conway received his sentence of fifteen years' penal servitude.

* * * * *

Once more Ralph Warner was seated in his study, and again it was night. He was reading an account of his cousin's trial, and, as he finished, a sigh of relief escaped his lips. But it quickly changed to one of vexation. All his plans seemed to have gone awry. What strange fate had kept his uncle alive so long? Had he died, all would have gone well. But now——

There was a stealthy tap at the window, and his face darkened at the sound.

"Confound her!" he muttered. "Shall I never be able to shake her off?"

He went to the window, threw it open, and assisted Julia Tempest into the room. There was a smile on his face now, but the smile was an ugly one.

"You honour me," he said, placing a chair for her. "Truly you have one virtue which many would do well to emulate. You are a perfect paragon of constancy."

He sneered as he spoke the words, and the girl flashed him a look that told him she understood.

"Yes," she said; "I am constant. You can thank your stars for that, Ralph Warner."

"What do you mean?" he demanded.

Julia Tempest laughed mockingly.

"Ah, I've interested you!" she said. "Well, I've only spoken the truth. Better for you to find me constant than that I——"

Digitized by Google

She paused. He was watching her narrowly, almost apprehensively.

"What?" he demanded.

"Than that I—who know you so well—should go over to the enemy. Don't you think so, my lord?"

He forced a laugh and tried to appear at his ease.

"What could you do with the enemy?" he said.

"Ah, that is my affair," she replied. "Well, Ralph Warner, I have come to you to-night for the last time. Are you, or are you not, willing to redeem your promise to me of marriage?"

He opened his eyes in affected astonishment.

"My dear girl," he said, "you surely must be joking! You are a sufficiently woman of the world to be aware that such promises are never kept—under such circumstances."

His tone was insolent in the extreme. In an instant, the colour had leapt to her cheeks, the dark, gipsy eyes flashed, and she was upon her feet, with clenched hands and heaving bosom, facing him where he sat.

"You cur!" she hissed. "Very well—let it be so! You have defied me—cast me off! Now you shall learn the fierceness, the fiendishness, of a woman's hate!"

Without another word she sprang to the window and was gone.

* * * * *

The sun was beating down on the bare, hot quarries whose stony strata have felt the print of the feet of so many of the central figures in the history of crime. A gang of men were busy hewing the stone from its primitive bed. Armed warders, watchful and alert, stood near at hand, ready to frustrate any attempt at escape. Yet they were not so vigilant but that some apparently trivial incidents passed by unnoticed. As one of the convicts went to his place, he stealthily turned over a piece of stone, and from it took up a small scrap of paper. Watching his opportunity, he read it softly to himself:

"To-night — just before the whistle sounds—make a dash for the trees to the north-west. I will meet you and help you to escape. Don't fail."

That was all. The convict put the slip of paper in his mouth, chewed it to a pulp and spat it out.

"I suppose it's that girl I see hanging about here sometimes," he mused to himself. "I wonder who she is. I seem to recall her face somewhere. Well, whatever the mystery is, it's pretty evident she means to help me. So I'll trust her and make a dash for liberty."

As the day drew in, the sky became dark and threatening. The warders looked apprehensively at the approaching storm. A few minutes and the whistle would sound for the ceasing of work. Suddenly there was a cry, and a man dashed out of the rank of convicts and ran like a deer to the distant trees. Two shots rang out, but still the man ran on. In an instant, confusion took the place of order. The remaining convicts, sympathising readily with their escaping comrade, showed signs of rebellion, and the warders were forced to abandon the runaway. As speedily as they could, they marched the men back to the gloomy prison, and a party of pursuers were dispatched with all speed to recapture the fugitive.

Meanwhile the flying convict had reached the shelter of the wood. A girl was there, awaiting him. She carried a man's long cloak, and a soft, felt hat. Then they hurried on, the storm gathering about them as they went. Great drops were beginning to fall, and ere they had reached their destination the storm had burst above their heads in all its fury.

Some miles had been covered when they arrived at a small town, and the girl led the way to a house that appeared deserted. Entering, they went to an upper room, and threw off their soaking cloaks.

"Now," she said at last, "I am going to make you a proposal. I have helped you so far without imposing a single condition. But my future actions depend upon you."

The man looked at her curiously.

"Speak," he said. "I am ignorant both as to your motives and intentions. But I am in your hands."

Again the girl turned to listen. The faint sound of voices reached her, and for a moment she stood still, as though petrified. The voices sounded nearer, then ceased altogether. But she knew the men had not disappeared. Once more she turned and faced the fugitive, her finger pointing out of the window.

"Consent to marry me, and I will help you to escape," she cried. "Refuse, and your pursuers below shall capture you!"

The man uttered an exclamation of astonishment. Mechanically he put one hand to his brow.

"What is this?" he cried. "What purpose can you have in imposing such a condition?"

The girl's eyes flashed. But she moved a step nearer.

"Listen, Roy Conway," she said in low, concentrated tones. "I have that within my hands which will establish your innocence. I know something else, too, of which you little dream. My motive! Ah, you will learn that also—in time! But, tell me—what is your answer? Will you give me your word of honour to marry me, if I, on my part, establish your innocence and help you to escape until that innocence shall be proven?"

For a few moments Roy Conway made no reply. And then the sweet, trustful face of Laura Merrivale, as he had seen it that day in the crowded court, seemed to rise up before him, and he resolutely put away the temptation which beset him.

"No," he said, "I will not. I love another woman, and my faith is plighted to her. I cannot consent to marry you."

A grey shade came over the face of Julia Tempest, and she moved a step nearer the door.

"Choose ere it is too late!" she urged. "Remember, there is no retreat when once your recapture is effected. Once more—will you marry me?"

"I cannot. You must do your worst. But why have you helped me to escape, only to mock me thus? Who are you?"

But the girl was gone. As the wife of Roy Conway, sole heir of his dying uncle, she could have tasted a revenge such as would have contented even her. But he, too, had refused her, and her heart hardened again. Only as his promised wife would she consent to reveal all that she knew of the crime committed that dark night.

Recovering himself, Roy Conway moved towards the door. But footsteps were already on the stairs; and, a moment later, he was surrounded and again conveyed to the great prison where he had spent so many weary months.

* * * * *

Ralph Warner had just been up to his uncle's house to inquire into the condition of the invalid. For upwards of two years and a half the case had baffled all medical and surgical skill. During all that time there had been no change. An insensibility that was half death held the sufferer in its lethargic arms. But now a slight change was perceptible. There were evidences of approaching dissolution, and Ralph Warner was uneasy, though why he did not know.

He had turned into the wood not far from his own house, and his feet were leading him to a sequestered spot where once he was wont to meet the girl whom now he treated so indifferently. To his unqualified surprise, he found Julia Tempest, stretched upon the grass, her chin in her hands, and with an angry light in her black eyes. She looked up as he came near, and her lip curled disdainfully. Upon Ralph's face, however, dawned an expression of mockery that stung the girl into speech.

Digitized by Google

"Ah!" she said bitterly. "You think you have it all your own way, Ralph Warner. But wait. My time is coming soon."

Ralph uttered a low, derisive laugh.

"I've been reading an account of the escape of one of the convicts at Portland," he said. "Fortunately they recaptured the fellow. The authorities seem to think the man was assisted by a woman, who later deserted him. It's a funny story and has set me thinking. If I remember rightly, you were away at the time?"

He looked jeeringly down at the recumbent figure of the girl. But Julia was on her feet in an instant.

"What do you mean?" she demanded.

A different shade was stealing into Ralph Warner's dark face—a look of malevolent fury that almost transformed it. But the girl did not flinch.

"Look you," he hissed, coming close up to her. "You are playing a deep game, my beauty. But don't carry it too far, do you hear? I don't know how much, or how little, you know of my plans. But if you go too far, I'll treat you as I do all my enemies. At present you are only a silly little fool. Be content to remain a fool. It's the safest plan by half."

Not an eyelash quivered as Julia Tempest listened to the man's threat. Her blood was up.

"That I am not a fool you will very soon discover," she said defiantly, "and to your cost, Ralph Warner. You speak truly when you say you do not know how much or how little I know of your plans. And it is not my purpose to enlighten you. Only remember—a dark night is not always the safest time to choose for an adventure, since the darkness may conceal others beside yourself."

Ralph Warner stood motionless, rigid, speaking no word. What did the girl mean? But ere he could question her, she turned, and, with a rippling laugh of scornful triumph, disappeared among the trees.

For a moment he thought of going after her. But, with an oath, he turned on his heel and took an opposite direction.

* * * * *

There was stillness in the darkened room wherein lay the unconscious form of Andrew Conway. Two nurses moved silently about the room and, near the bed, stood the two eminent men—physician and surgeon—who were watching the case with so profound an interest. Signs of an approaching change were apparent, and both men waited eagerly for what should occur.

There was a stir in the doorway and Ralph Warner entered the room. As he came in, both doctors looked up with an expression of surprise. His face was white and ghastly, his hands were trembling visibly, and his eyes had in them a hunted look that made his face look still more drawn and haggard. But he paid no heed to the glances of the two men, and sat himself down beside the bed.

For two hours he never moved. His eyes wandered continually from the bed whereon his uncle lay to the window overlooking the lawn. At times, too, he appeared to listen, as though in dread, to voices beneath the window. And then the change, so long expected, so long deferred, came at last, and the sick man opened his eyes. Consciousness was returning. Slowly he moved his head, gazing from one to another in mute bewilderment. At last his eyes rested on the face of Ralph Warner and a look of unspeakable horror and aversion crept into the white face.

Suddenly the sick man made a violent effort and sat upright in his bed. His eyes were still fixed on the face of his nephew, and he pointed to him with one weak, trembling hand.

"Murderer!" he gasped. "Murderer!"

No one spoke. The words seemed to have petrified all present. A ghastly hue had crept into the face of Ralph Warner, but he never stirred. Once more the old man spoke.

"Murderer!" he gasped again. "I saw your evil face when you shot at me through the French windows of the study. Where's my boy—my nephew Roy? Where is he, I say? I was angry with him, but he's a good lad. Send for him. I want to see him and ask his forgiveness for striking him that night. Where is he, I say?"

Still no one spoke. Presently the surgeon, who knew the story of the crime as it had appeared in the papers, turned to the sick man.

"Sir," he said, "do you realise that you have accused of crime a man whom all the world believes to be innocent?"

He pointed, as he spoke, to Ralph Warner.

"I do," came the unfaltering reply. "That man is the man who attempted my life."

Quickly the two medical men made their examination. Finally the surgeon said.

"Mr. Conway, it is my painful duty to acquaint you with the fact that you have but a few hours to live. As medical men, we are able to testify that you are of sound mind. As a magistrate, it is my duty to ask you to make a formal declaration of the statement to which you have just given utterance."

He drew a table to the bedside and prepared to write. Ralph Warner rose hastily from his seat and made as though to leave the room. But the two men detained him, and he sank back into his chair.

Slowly the dying man dictated the story of that terrible night—the quarrel with his nephew, how he had struck him, and, in attempting to forcibly eject him from the room, he had torn Roy's tweed coat. And then—the sight of Ralph Warner's dark face through the glass, the glimpse of a revolver, a flash, and—darkness. And when the story was told, he affixed his signature and the pen dropped from his hand on to the table. His strength was failing. He lay back once more upon his pillow and his voice was feeble and husky.

"Roy!" he gasped. "Where is my boy? And my son Egbert? Will no one send for him?"

Egbert! Ah, there was but one man in that room who knew where Egbert Conway was. Search had been made for him by the dying man's solicitors, but, by a strange accident of fate, they had learnt nothing of that fatal tragedy with an Indian tiger.

And then the end came. Andrew Conway's feeble voice ceased, his eyes closed wearily, and the life that had flickered so long in the prostrate form went out for ever.

There was a great stir downstairs. A moment later the door was flung open and two police officers entered the room.

"We hold a warrant for your arrest, Ralph Warner, on a charge of wounding Andrew Conway some two and a half years ago. Also with the murder of Julia Tempest, from whom we have just obtained a deposition incriminating you."

Ralph Warner stood up. His knees shook and his face was livid with fear.

"I am ready," he said.

They turned to go. Suddenly there was a flash, a report, and the sound of a heavy fall. Ralph Warner, taking advantage of the momentary movement, had drawn a revolver and sent a bullet through his brain.

And Roy? Well, his prison career came speedily to an end. Release came to him when he almost despaired. And when at last the gates of the great gloomy gaol were flung wide open for him to step out again into God's sunlight, the first face that greeted him was the face of Laura Merrivale, smiling, yet with the tears in her blue eyes, to tell him again and again how she had always known he was guiltless and how dearly—how very dearly—she loved him.

So all's well that ends well, and Roy Conway and his sweet wife went at length to live in the great house where his uncle had lived so long. For Egbert's sad fate was discovered at last, and Roy came into all his uncle's great wealth.

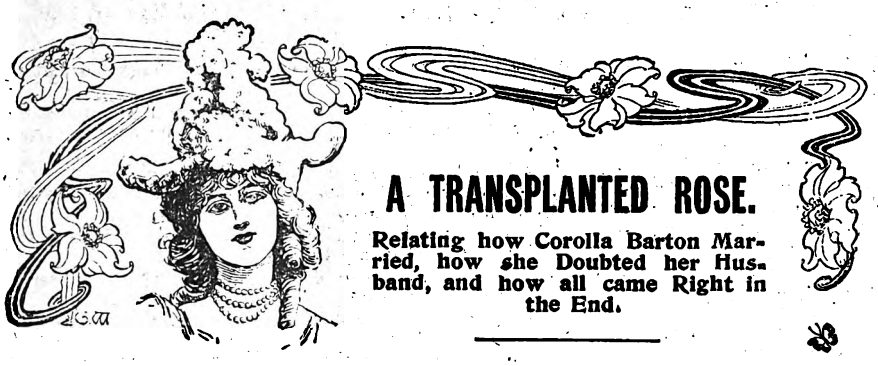
Walter J. Mowbray.

THE RAPID REVIEW

No. 4

IS NOW ON SALE.

Digitized by Google



A TRANSPLANTED ROSE.

Relating how Corolla Barton Married, how she Doubted her Husband, and how all came Right in the End.

AFTER her father's sudden death, Fate threw Corolla Burton in the way of Mrs. Douglas, a wealthy American lady, who wished to engage an English governess to take back with her.

Corolla was a graceful, lovely girl, only eighteen years of age, and a blue-eyed, sunny-tempered creature. She had been thoroughly well-educated, and was too high-spirited to remain dependent upon her relations, so she looked naturally for a situation as governess.

"Mamma, mamma," cried little Gilbert Douglas and his sister Minnie, with their arms clasped round Corolla's neck, "please do engage Miss Burton—please do!"

Mrs. Douglas' mother instinct urged her to secure Corolla, f possible, seeing the children were so fond of her.

"But, my dear girl, how can I part with you?" lamented Mrs. Burton. "You are all I have in the world!"

"I know it, mamma," said Corolla cheerfully, and stroking the silvery hair while she spoke; "and I am going away to earn money for you. Mrs. Douglas is very rich, and will give me a large salary. By-and-bye you shall cross over to America and live with me."

Mrs. Burton had a quiet interview with Mrs. Douglas, and grew more reconciled. The lady seemed very kind, and Corolla would be happy with the children. America is not so far away in these days, and if anything happened unexpectedly, Corolla could easily return to England.

They had a pleasant passage, and, later on, were comfortably settled in the handsome home of Mrs. Douglas, who, finding Gilbert Lysle, her bachelor brother of thirty-five, still unmarried, invited Miss Carew, a second cousin of theirs, to spend some weeks with her, for the express purpose of bringing them together.

Miss Carew was a handsome, stylish woman of twenty-six, fond of dress and Society, and not at all averse to be brought within the sphere of her wealthy cousin.

Mrs. Douglas' worldly wisdom prompted her to keep Corolla out of the way as much as possible. "There is no accounting for men's vagaries," she told Miss Carew confidentially.

That lady was arranging some pink rosebuds with the soft white lace at her throat. Her ripe, lovely lips curled in scorn at the idea of the unformed girl, without a particle of style, or knowledge of Society, becoming her rival. But neither of the conspirators counted upon the extreme wilfulness of man.

Lysle suspected his sister's designs. With masculine contrariety he made a point forthwith of seeking the society of the governess. He joined her in her walks with the children, making a pretence of botanising and needing her aid; went into the schoolroom to hear them at lessons; volunteered to read Tennyson to her, and was soon over head-and-ears in love. She was so innocent and natural, so charming in her wild-rose loveliness, in such direct contrast to the women who had so long angled for him, that he was enchanted.

Miss Carew was superb and disdainful. Mrs. Douglas was exasperated. This was the cloud that had appeared dimly above her horizon when she engaged Corolla. She accused her now of artfully inveigling her brother, and of teaching the children to call "Uncle Gilbert" into the nursery. At this, Corolla's British blood was roused. She resented the injustice with a good deal of spirit. Then Mrs. Douglas threatened to pack her off home to her mother in disgrace. Corolla rose equal to this also, and signified her willingness to leave.

Mrs. Douglas over-reached herself, for Gilbert brought matters suddenly to a climax, by asking Corolla to marry him. She was surprised. She had not dared to believe that such a handsome, aristocratic-looking gentleman could care for her in that way. She had looked upon his attentions as merely friendly ones, and taken herself sharply to task when she found she was growing fond of him. Her face was dyed with blushes at the unexpected question. She did not find an answer readily.

"What do you say, little one? Will the English wild-rose bloom beside my hearth, keeping all its sweetness for me? Do you love me, Corolla?"

It would have been useless for her tongue to deny what her fair, blushing, happy face revealed so eloquently. He took her in his arms, and pressed his first kiss upon her lips.

They were married very quietly, went on a short honeymoon trip, and Gilbert installed his wife mistress of his well-appointed home, about a mile from his sister's.

For a while Corolla lived in a blissful dream.

At the first, she had written a glowing letter to her mother, inclosing his photograph. Before long she followed it by another. "By-and-bye you are to come out and live with us," she wrote. "I spoke of it to him one day when I could gather courage, and he said he should be pleased, if it would add to my happiness.

The first six months of their married life were very happy ones. They went but little into Society. Mrs. Douglas refused to countenance her brother's wife, and people looked upon the marriage as a sort of mésalliance. Lysle cared but little. He had reached the age when the delights of Society grew stale. Corolla was only too happy to remain in retirement. Lysle had short office hours in his place of business. These over, he hastened home to Corolla, caring only for her wifely welcome and sweet, shy kisses.

After awhile, Mrs. Douglas began to unbend a little, calling occasionally upon Corolla, and inviting her to spend the day with her. Miss Carew, being a relative, joined her, and before long came—upon Gilbert's invitation—for a three weeks' visit, seconded perforce by Corolla, who shrank from her, she knew not why.

Miss Carew was delighted. She had never forgiven Gilbert for slighting her. He would now have a chance to institute comparisons between Corolla's and her own beauty.

Corolla could not understand it, but somehow Miss Carew seemed to draw her husband away from her. She monopolised him in the evenings completely. She could talk well and brightly upon subjects of which Corolla knew very little.

She felt uneasy about this; then took herself to task. She must not expect to engross all his attention, as she had done hitherto. He must love her, else why had he married her? Besides, Miss Carew was his cousin.

One evening, while she was out alone in the garden, Mrs. Douglas called. Corolla had left Miss Carew and her husband in the drawing-room. She was aroused from her sad reverie by the voice of Mrs. Douglas.

"I knew how it would be. Gilbert is tiring of bread-and-milk diet. Men do such idiotic things for a mere fancy. If his wife hopes to retain her hold upon him, she must make him feel proud of her. Mere sentiment is short-lived."

"I wish I had the chance back again," Miss Carew said, in a low, resolute tone. "I would bring him to my feet."

Digitized by Google

Corolla, hidden from their view by some foliage, felt the blood forsake her cheeks, and her limbs grow suddenly weak. What if their words were true! Gilbert was changed certainly. She had never before suspected that Miss Carew wanted to marry him. The thought made her heart-sick.

"He must have preferred me, or he would not have asked me to marry him," she thought.

But why were his attentions declining? Was he really growing tired of her?

* * * * * * *

Corolla stood by her open chamber window in the warm glow of the August sunset. She was not happy. A reserve was creeping in between her and her husband.

She heard voices below somewhere. By-and-bye her husband and Miss Carew walked slowly along a shaded path. From her elevated position she could see them plainly. They stopped, and sat down upon a rustic bench, apparently engrossed in conversation. While Corolla watched them jealously, he threw his arm over her shoulder; then bent his head, and kissed her.

Corolla drew back with a sudden revulsion of feeling. Her sadness changed into hatred of Miss Carew, and anger against her husband. A sense of isolation came over her—of being alone in a strange country, with even her own husband untrue to her. She dropped down on a low seat, and covered her face with her hands. A longing for England and mother swept over her.

"No love like mother-love," she thought, the trite remark coming home to her as it had never done before.

A servant tapped at the door, and gave her a letter, which had just arrived.

The letter read:

"My health is failing rapidly. In a few weeks, at most, I believe I shall be at rest. I long to see you, Corolla. I cannot die in peace, without one more look at your face. You are all I have on earth, dear child! Cannot you come to me for a few weeks, that yours may be the last face I look upon before I go to meet your father?"

In this strain the letter ran on, sometimes almost illegibly, as if the fingers were too weak to guide the pen.

Corolla dropped the letter in her lap wearily. There was a dull, aching pain at her heart. This, then, was the end of her bright dreams for the future. Her mother had figured in all of them; now she was to die. Corolla shuddered at the thought. In her first longing for sympathy her heart turned to her husband. But, no; her confidence had been shaken. He could not be her resting-place. She was utterly miserable.

"Mother—mother!" she sobbed. "I wish I could die with you!"

While she sat there her husband entered.

"What is the matter, my child?" he asked, in a tone of concern, sitting down beside her, and looking into her tear-stained face.

"Mother is very ill—I fear dying, and wants me to go to her," she said, in a voice that sounded cold and calm, as she passed the letter to him.

"My poor child!" he said, when he had read it, drawing her within his arms, and caressing her flushed cheek.

She shrank from his touch. The words of Mrs. Douglas and Miss Carew—the scene she had witnessed that night—were rankling in her mind.

"Do you feel that you must go?" he asked.

"Yes, yes. If I did not I should never have a happy moment. Poor, dear mamma! It was so hard for her to part with me, and now——"

"If you think it will be a comfort to both of you, I should advise you to go," he said. "I only wish my business would permit me to accompany you."

She looked up quickly.

"Are you quite sure it would not?" she questioned.

"It is simply impossible at present," he returned; "but I think I can arrange things so that you will not be unprotected."

"He would rather stay where he can be near Miss Carew," she thought bitterly, drawing herself away from his sheltering arm.

"The British Queen sails for Liverpool on Thursday," he remarked, after a few moments of thought. "I am acquainted with the captain. He is a capital fellow. I can give you into his care."

"Is it Captain Lester, of whom I have heard you speak?" she asked listlessly.

"Yes. Do you really want to go so soon? Shall you be able to complete your preparations? This is Tuesday, remember."

"I shall not need much preparation," she said; and so it was arranged.

She felt heart-sore because he did not take her in his arms, and protest that he could not part with her for so long a time. "One short month ago he would have done so," she thought.

She made her preparations with a heavy heart. She had the reticent pride that would not allow her to mention her doubts to her husband.

* * * * * * *

The British Queen was within fifteen minutes of sailing. Gilbert had introduced Corolla to the captain, and had left a handsome fee in the hands of the good-natured stewardess in her behalf. They were together now in her state-room for the last good-bye. A great wave of tenderness swept over her in these last moments. She clasped her arms about his neck tightly. It seemed to her like a farewell for ever. He, perceiving how nervous she was, without guessing the prime cause, tried to maintain a cheerful demeanour. His manner made her still more unhappy. "If he loves me, why does he not express more regret at parting from me?" she thought.

Lysle was not by nature demonstrative. Love's first ardour had surprised him into a lover's tenderness; now he was the careful husband, more anxious for her comfort than to overburden her with caresses.

"Good-bye, dear child," he said at parting. "It will not be long until we meet again. Keep up your courage!" And so they parted.

"I hope you are not allowing home-sickness to attack you, Mrs. Lysle?" said Captain Lester one day.

She looked up at him with a smile that he could see was a little forced.

"I believe it has, and is drawing me in opposite directions at once."

"Ah, you are divided between England and America, I see. One holds the mother—the other the husband. I suppose it is rather hard to determine which has the stronger claim. Well, we are having a quick passage. Don't be melancholy. In a few days you will have a sight of merry England if all goes well."

* * * * * * *

Corolla felt a warmth and glow about her heart when she looked upon the spires and roofs and smoke of Liverpool, as the good ship made the port.

It was a bright, sunny September day when Captain Lester bade her good-bye, having attended to her luggage and seen her comfortably ensconced in the railway carriage that was to convey her to her mother.

"I hope when I meet you again I shall be better able to thank you for your kindness," she said.

"No thanks are required. Good-bye again. God bless you!"

Corolla had sent a telegram; so when three hours later she alighted at the station her uncle was there to meet her.

"Prepare yourself to see her much changed!" he told her as they drove home through the village, past the churchyard, with its carefully-tended graves, over which flowers bloomed lovingly and birds sang joyously, while the slanting rays of the afternoon sun smiled in benediction, and kindled the church spire and the stained windows with its glow.

Mrs. Burton, in a soft grey dress, with delicate lace round her neck and wrists, was propped up by pillows in an easy-chair.

"Mamma—dear mamma! you will live many years yet," she whispered, entwining her arms about her lovingly. And she retired to rest that night under the dawn of this hope, and slept soundly until late the next forenoon.

Digitized by Google

"Tell me about your home and husband," her mother whispered; "it will rest me to hear you talk. It was the longing to see you that exhausted me."

Corolla had to give her minute particulars, and to mask her own unrest with a cheerful face.

That night in her room she told herself she must carefully guard every word and look. She longed for the privilege of laying her head upon her mother's breast, as she had done in childhood, and telling all her trouble. But it would not do. Her mother's last hours must not be embittered by doubts of her daughter's happiness.

Through the stimulus of Corolla's presence, Mrs. Burton kept up for some days. Then the reaction set in. She could not be removed from her bed. Corolla hovered round her, wearing a smile rather sad and pathetic, and soothed her last days lovingly.

The end came gently and sweetly.

"Kiss me, Corolla," she whispered. "You will come, too, before long, and we shall be together."

Corolla complied. Then, as she moved her fan gently, the mysterious change passed over the face, and it was still. Corolla laid down the fan, and a quiet awe stole over her. She could not remove her eyes from the sight. A sweeter smile than they had worn in life was settling over the features. She could not realise that it was death.

But after the funeral a dreadful loneliness settled upon her. Life stretched before her so long and so desolate. Her thoughts would turn involuntarily to her husband, only to be beaten back by the remembrance of her shaken faith. She had received a cablegram and but one letter from him, which seemed to her cold and unsatisfactory. She could not understand a half-way love. Her own was so fresh, genuine, unalloyed, that she expected the same from her husband.

"He would not care to soothe my sorrow," she thought. "Miss Carew has engrossed his attention."

She had no heart to leave England, yet she told herself she must go. The letter which was due from her husband did not come; but she had money enough for her home passage, and felt so wretched and unsettled, that she resolved to start.

"Corolla has some trouble on her mind, in addition to her mother's death," her aunt said to her husband confidentially. "If she has such a good husband, why isn't she more anxious to return to him? She has been here two months now."

Mr. Frothingham, Corolla's uncle, accompanied her to Liverpool. He saw her safely on board the Peerless, and sent a cablegram to her husband to that effect.

It was late in the evening when they sailed. Before they were fairly out into the Channel a thick fog rose. They lost their bearing. Some time towards morning the sleeping passengers were awakened by a terrific crash, the ship shivering and groaning like some human monster in mortal pain. They were on the rocks, not far from the coast, they judged.

The blow was fatal. The ship went to pieces rapidly. A fire broke out in the engine-room, adding fresh horrors. All was confusion. There was no chance to get the boats out. Some jumped overboard, in terror of the flames. There was a universal panic. Corolla afterwards remembered how, in the confusion, a gentleman had given her a life-preserver, secured one himself, and bidding her follow his example, had jumped overboard. Fear of the spreading, mounting flames had nerved her to make the plunge. The last she could recollect was of floating over the heaving waters, which were "dyed with an awful but glorious light"; while through the lurid shroud of fog that enveloped everything, she could hear the shouts and shrieks of men and women belonging to the doomed ship.

Corolla overheard a conversation that made her heart sick.

* * *

"And you think now she will really recover, doctor?"

"Yes; I think she will awake from this long, refreshing sleep to a new life. Her good constitution and your careful nursing have saved her."

"I am very, very thankful," Miss Newton said. She was a lady of middle age, with a pure, earnest face, from which all selfishness and passion had been swept away by a great, purifying sorrow.

Dr. Chudleigh looked at his watch. "I have an engagement at three," he said. "Good afternoon, Miss Newton."

They had been standing in the hall. She re-ascended the stairs, and noiselessly opened the door of a pleasant, roomy chamber. In one corner, on a low, white bed, Corolla lay, breathing softly, her senses all locked in the life-giving slumber. The furniture was tasteful; the windows draped with long lace curtains. A bouquet of hot-house flowers stood on a round marble table. The curtains of the windows near the bed were closely drawn; but across the room a square of sunlight lay on the soft drab-and-green carpet. Miss Newton sat down near the sunny window to wait. The doctor had said she would soon awake.

Digitized by Google

* * * * * * *

Corolla's eyes unclosed, wandered round the room, and closed again. Consciousness, confused at first, was returning. The unfamiliar room furnished no peg of association. Suddenly the fiery scene, which had burnt itself into her memory, flashed into recollection. In its light the foregoing events returned to her: Her dead mother—her sorrow—her husband—Miss Carew—Mrs. Douglas. How long had she been lying on that bed? Was she in England or America? She had a Rip-Van-Winkle feeling about herself.

She drew a long, deep sigh, which reached Miss Newton's ears, who stepped lightly across the carpet to her bedside. Corolla opened her eyes again, to meet the sweetly earnest face bending over her.

"Where am I?" she asked.

"Among friends," was the answer, with a quiet smile. "Let me give you this," dipping a spoon into the glass of dark-coloured liquid which she held.

Corolla swallowed it quietly. It felt cool and grateful to her parched lips.

"Am I in England?" she asked, when Miss Newton had set down the glass.

"Yes, in Ryeport. You were found floating about on a life-preserver. Some fishermen picked you up."

"I remember," she said. "The Peerless went on the rocks in the fog—the fire broke out—I, with others, jumped overboard." She paused a moment. "This is not a fisherman's house?" she said.

"No, it is mine," returned Miss Newton, with a smile.

"How long have I been lying here?"

"Four weeks. You were insensible for a long time after they brought you ashore. Soon after you showed signs of life, fever set in."

Corolla improved rapidly. She was reticent about her past life, and Miss Newton did not ask many questions.

"'Corolla,' a rare, but very pretty name," she said, when she heard it. "Have you no message to send to your friends? They will be anxious."

"I have no friends who will care to hear. My mother died shortly before I sailed for America. My father is dead. I have neither brothers nor sisters."

Miss Newton detected the ring of pain in her tone. She said no more for the time.

When Corolla lay convalescent, a strange thought was shaping in her brain. The news of the loss of the Peerless had reached America. The papers had announced that only one man had reached shore, Miss Newton told her. Her husband would believe her dead. Why go back now, an unwelcome interloper?

"Gilbert could marry Miss Carew, and be happy," she thought. His attentions to her, that kiss in the twilight, were proofs to Corolla that he loved her.

The more she pondered, the higher seemed the barrier between them. The fact that she was his lawful wife, and had a right to his home and protection, if she could not command his love, had no weight with her. She must be everything or nothing to him. An inherited pride, which disdained to enter where she was not warmly welcome, furthered her resolve. "How foolish I was to accept his offer of marriage so eagerly," she thought. "I ought to have reflected."

The scheme seemed more and more practicable. Her aunt and uncle, with others, would think she was lost. She would be Corolla Burton again, and go out as a governess. She loved children. It would not be a heavy cross.

Miss Newton guessed she had an unhappy secret, and, out of kindness, made several attempts to elicit it. Corolla at last begged her not to question her, and asked her aid in procuring a situation.

"You can have a home with me as long as you choose," said Miss Newton.

"I have had a home with you too long already," she returned with a sad smile. "I love children. If I could get a situation as governess, I should be so grateful."

"After you are strong again, my dear, we will see what can be done; that is, if you think you will be better contented."

"I should feel more independent," said Corolla; and she added, "I hope to be able some day to repay your kindness."

"Do not mention it," said Miss Newton. "It has been a positive pleasure to me to have you here. I find all my happiness now in such things. Like yourself, I am without near relatives in the world. When I was not much older than you are, an act of selfishness on my part deprived me of a noble lover. With him went all that made life desirable. I was rebellious for a long time, but came back to life at last, to find that there was something besides self to live for. It is a luxury to me to make others happy. My life would be intolerable without it."

A few weeks later Miss Newton received a letter from a friend in Manchester, in which she mentioned that she was looking for a governess for her little Lulu. "I can send you, I think, a perfect treasure," Miss Newton wrote in reply.

Preliminaries were arranged. In a week Corolla was domiciled in Mrs. Erskine's cheerful home, with light duties, and treated in all respects as an equal. Miss Newton's patronage was all-potent.

This took place at the beginning of the New Year. Six months, that might have been happy ones had she been Corolla Burton in reality, passed over her head. Then Mrs. Erskine sickened and died. Lulu was motherless.

At Mr. Erskine's invitation an elderly aunt of his came to preside over his home. He begged Corolla to remain in charge of Lulu, who had grown warmly attached to her. Corolla was glad to comply. She shrank from going out into the world again.

* * * * * *

"Miss Burton, I love you. Will you be my wife?"

It was a year since the death of Mrs. Erskine. The air was full of the tender sweetness of Maytime—the season when, according to Tennyson, "a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love."

Corolla looked up into the face of the handsome young widower. Her face flushed hotly, then became very pale. She shrank away from him. In her surprise and agitation she had almost spoken the words, "I am a wife already."

Digitized by Google

"Have I startled you? Perhaps I have been abrupt," he said, apologetically, not understanding the pained, scared look in her eyes. "Your sweet face has grown very dear to me," he went on in a low tone, "and my motherless child loves you. Will you not make us both happy?"

"I—I——" she commenced in confusion. "Please forgive me, Mr. Erskine. You must not speak of love to me."

He looked at her searchingly. She had never seemed to him to be a happy person. There was very often a shadowy unrest in the sweet violet eyes, a pathetic expression about the delicate mouth, while the roses in her cheeks had faded away.

"If you could love me a little, ever so little, I would try to make you so happy," he persisted, not sufficiently warned by her words. "We would go to Italy, and your roses would come back. I am afraid you are low-spirited, too. You have kept too close with Lulu."

He moved towards her. She lifted her hand with an appealing gesture. A low cry broke from her, then she left the room abruptly, leaving him standing there the picture of astonishment.

She went to her room. How her heart ached! Not because this man had touched it. Oh, no. His words had broken down the barriers of self-repression. They had opened the floodgates; and the love for her husband, which she had resolved she would crush out altogether, overflowed its imposed boundary. She felt a mad, unquenchable longing to see his face once more.

"It is my wife, come back from the dead!" cried Gilbert.

In what a false position she had placed herself! Palming herself off as a girl, she was, of course, open to offers of marriage; while she was a wife, with neither the right nor the inclination to listen to words of love.

To get away from there before Mr. Erskine could renew his pleading, was her first thought; her next was to go over to America quietly, secretly, and, without making herself known, see her husband again. "If I could see his face, and not be seen!" she said.

A tiny hope, which she scarcely dared whisper to herself, had sprung up in connection with this powerful reaction. Might there not be some flaw in the chain of circumstantial evidence she had woven? It was so easy to be mistaken. Might he not be yet mourning for her loss? This hope once admitted, the uncertainty was maddening. She had saved quite a big sum of money from her liberal salary. There was nothing to prevent her from going. She lay until nearly morning, revolving her plans, then fell into a light slumber.

The next day she sought Mr. Erskine, and told him, in tremulous tones, with averted face, that she must leave at once.

"Are you going away on my account?" he asked, seizing her hands gently, but firmly, to detain her.

"No—oh, no! I cannot tell you the reason I am going. I am very unhappy. If you are my friend, please do not question me."

He saw that he must desist.

"Will you tell me, at least, where you are going?"

"I would rather not," she said, and, seeing her distress, he would not urge her.

She spent the rest of the day in packing her trunk, and disposing of the things she did not want to take with her. Lulu was disconsolate, and hung round her tearfully. With tears in her own eyes, Corolla kissed her, and tried to comfort her.

Corolla journeyed to Liverpool. The speed of the iron horse seemed a snail's pace to her impatient fancy. She was fortunate in the time of her arrival there. A steamer was to sail that evening for America.

Safely aboard, in the snug state-room which she had been fortunate enough to secure, although so late in taking her passage, her thoughts flew back to the ill-fated Peerless. But all nervous fear was swallowed up in the one overmastering anxiety that filled her mind. When she made that resolve upon her sick bed, she did not fully understand upon what an unquiet and momentous path she had voluntarily entered.

The ship made a quick, delightful passage, and one fair morning in June it glided up New York Harbour. Corolla's heart throbbed violently as she stood on deck with others and looked once more upon the great city. Before twenty-four hours she would know the worst. Any certainty would be better than this consuming suspense.

The train steamed out through the early twilight into the suburbs, and stopped at the little wayside station of Heath. Corolla alighted and walked slowly along the platform. The memory of the day when she left there, a little less than two years ago, came back to her vividly. She was very quietly dressed, and a thick veil concealed her features. The same station-master was there, who, as he passed her on the platform, eyed her narrowly. She hurried along out of the glare of the station lights, and walked in the direction of her former home.

The shadows of the June twilight were fast deepening. The trees in the avenue loomed up darkly against the sky. A dewy sweetness seemed to enfold everything. The evening star glimmered in the west. The drowsy hum of happy insects sounded in her ears. She was surrounded by finest harmonies of nature. She alone was out of tune.

She reached the borders of the grounds, which were surrounded by a low stone wall, on the inside of which was a closely-clipped thorn edge. The gate stood open. She stole through it like a guilty thing, and ventured up the walk.

A step sounded ahead of her on the gravel. She shrank behind some tall-growing shrubs until it passed; then pressed on towards the house, which showed tall and imposing in the twilight. She was trembling in every limb. Her own heart had made a coward of her.

Digitized by Google

She drew nearer and nearer. The fountain murmured musically, as in the old, happy days. The outline of the marble Graces in the garden showed faintly. The air was full of the fragrance of roses and other odorous flowers of June. The sweetness sickened her.

A breeze stirred the leaves of the horse-chestnuts. They seemed to whisper:

"You have come on a fruitless quest. Another reigns queen of his heart."

A light glimmered through the half-closed blinds of one of the bay-windows of the drawing-room. Summoning all her courage, she tottered up to it. The couchant lions on each side of the broad stone steps in front of the house seemed to leer at her through the semi-gloom. She pushed aside the clustering roses and sweet-brier, wounding her delicate hands unconsciously, and looked in, for the curtains were undrawn.

The room seemed unchanged. The same tall, costly lamp stood upon the table, its light shining through the white globe, soft and subdued. A handsome painting of Mount Willard, with a blue, transparent mist clinging round its sides, hung opposite the window, as when she left. The easy-chairs stood here and there carelessly, as of yore.

She pushed nearer, to get a view of the sofa in the corner. Gilbert Lysle was stretched at full-length upon it. He was passing his hands slowly and thoughtfully through his hair, in the fashion she remembered so well. No one else was in the room. Was he really true to her? Still living alone and heart-whole for her sake? The faint hope that had brought her there grew stronger.

She half turned away, thinking she would go to the front door, and ring the bell. Her movement was arrested. A door was thrown open, giving her a glimpse of the spacious, lighted hall, and a girl entered with a beautiful child in her arms—of five or six months seemingly. He crowed with delight, and stretched out his chubby hands towards Gilbert, who sat upright at once, and took him into his arms. Corolla could not distinguish any words; but she saw him kiss and fondle the child, and toss him aloft in his strong arms. His child! The thought was agony. His, and not hers! The girl went out, leaving the child in the care of Gilbert Lysle.

A few moments later, a lady, with sweeping skirts, came through the open door. Corolla strained her eyes. It was Miss Carew, beautiful and stately as ever. Corolla felt a cold perspiration on her forehead, and the objects in the room seemed to dance before her eyes.

Miss Carew, or "Mrs. Lysle" now, Corolla told herself, walked to the sofa, and held out her hands towards the child, who made attempts to reach the diamond in her bosom, crowing all the time in baby fashion.

The desolate wanderer at the window saw it all. She had come across the seas in vain. Her husband had forgotten her, and that very soon. He had crowned another in her place queen of his life. She was the mother of his child. She remembered vaguely that she had intended to take the eleven o'clock train back to New York again, if her worst fears should be confirmed. She turned to leave the place, under cover of the darkness.

"No husband's kiss for me," she told herself hopelessly. But her trembling limbs refused to support her weight. Her will power forsook her. The starry heavens above her seemed fading into blankness. A deep groan burst from her lips; she reeled, and fell down among the dewy roses, crushing some of them into shapelessness.

The sound was heard inside through the open windows.

"What was that?" Gilbert asked hastily. He gave the child into the arms of his companion, and stepped through a side door that opened into the garden.

"Nero! Nero!" he shouted, for the dog had bounded out, and now with short, disturbed barks, was sniffing round Corolla's insensible form.

He procured a lantern, and went hastily out. Nero stopped barking, and began to whine piteously. Corolla's hat was pushed forward, concealing her face as she lay. He lifted her in his arms, and carried her into the house.

"A woman in a fainting-fit, I think," he said concisely, in answer to the startled inquiries of a lady with a pleasant, matronly face, who met him in the doorway.

He carried her across the room to the sofa which he had just left, and laid her down. Miss Carew stood speechless. The girl, with the child in her arms, looked on in open-eyed wonder.

"Poor creature!" said the matronly lady, stepping forward, and removing the hat and veil from the still, white face.

Gilbert Lysle looked, then started forward, and scanned the face closely.

"Good Heavens!—what a striking likeness!" came from his lips. Trembling, he lifted one delicate hand that lay limp and cold, and drew off the gold band that incircled one of the fingers. He scanned the inside a moment by the lamplight, then turned again to the sofa. "Corolla! It is my wife, come back from the dead! Corolla, darling, open your eyes; speak to me, your husband!"

The others drew near. The elder lady applied restoratives, only half understanding Mr. Lysle's strange actions. He seemed unconscious of their presence.

Miss Carew scanned the quiet face closely for a few moments, then left the room abruptly.

"The prize has slipped from my grasp again, just as I was on the eve of securing it," she hissed, in impotent anger. "What power has raised her from the dead, and sent her back here, with her hated doll-face and yellow hair, to mar my plans a second time?"

Under the influence of the restoratives, Corolla's white eyelids fluttered. She drew a long, deep, shuddering sigh, and her blue eyes unclosed wearily. Gilbert's face was very near hers.

"I—I could not help coming back," she whispered. "I was dying for one more sight of your face. I did not mean to faint. I will go away again, and let you be happy with her."

He thought her mind was wandering.

"Go away, my darling?" he said soothingly, while he stroked her cheek fondly. "Go away, when my heart has ached for you so long? Never again, while these arms have power to enfold you!"

"But the child?" she whispered. "Miss Carew is your wife now, isn't she?"

"Her mind is still wandering," he thought. The others had left him alone with her. "You—not Miss Carew—are my wife," he told her.

"But the child I saw in your arms?" she persisted, with a clear, steady look now in her eyes.

"My brother's child. He and his wife are on a visit here. Miss Carew is spending a day or two with us."

"And there is nothing to separate you and me."

Digitized by Google

"Nothing," he returned, repressing, until she should recover her strength, the thousand questions that rose to his lips regarding the past two years.

Too much exhausted to question further, Corolla raised her arms, and drew his face down close to hers. They lay quiet for some time in a close embrace. Corolla's eyes closed. She had not dared to dream of such a glad reunion. Her heart was full of an unutterable content.

* * * * *

When she grew strong, there was a long talk, and many explanations. Corolla confessed all her doubts and fears from the beginning.

"How could you voluntarily stay away from me, if you loved me?" he asked.

"It was my foolish pride," she returned. "I knew I was not your social equal, and thought you had begun to realise and regret it. But, after all, I was not strong enough to maintain my resolve, and succumbed weakly."

"For which weakness I am very thankful," he said gravely. "I am very, very sorry that my little wife did not trust me fully."

"But their conversation in the garden; your attentions to Miss Carew; that kiss I saw you give her, which I supposed was one of many; your willingness to let me go away; your one short, cool letter, instead of writing to me every week!" pleaded Corolla. The reproof in his tone grieved her.

"I was not to blame for their idle talk. As regards the kiss, I remember, now, that Laura made some laughing, bantering remark, which caused me to do it. I now suspect she saw you at the window, and wanted to annoy you. I was willing to let you go to England, because I saw it was for your happiness. If my letter seemed cool, it was because I was very much worried about my business just then, and, as I have told you, I wrote others, which must have been lost. The coolness was on your side. I remember you repelled me more than once, at which I wondered."

"Forgive me," Corolla said penitently.

Viewing the matter in a new light, she felt ashamed of her too sensitive, jealous pride.

Mrs. Douglas and Miss Carew held a private indignation meeting over the—to them—untimely return of one they had deemed safely out of the way. They could not again disturb Corolla. Her two years' experience had taught her wisdom.

With her husband's approval, she dispatched two letters to England—one to Miss Newton, the other to Mr. Erskine, in which she told her true story. She was afraid she had compromised herself in their eyes, and wished to retain their respect.

Isabel Harrod.

"ARE you popular with the young ladies of your set?" "Yes, I flatter myself that I am. I can have the refusal of any of their hands in marriage." "Do you really think so?" "I'm sure of it. I have already received the refusal of several of them."

"Now, Tommy," said the spinster aunt, with theories upon the bringing up of other people's children, "now, Tommy," setting her small nephew down hard on the chair, "look me straight in the eyes." Tommy looked. Then, "What beautiful eyes!" he said. He was diplomatic.

SHE: "Did you ever study the question of aerial navigation?" He: "Yes, to some extent." She: "And from what you have read do you believe it possible that we shall ever fly?" He (with a side glance of anxiety): "I think I shall, Alice; I hear ominous footsteps overhead."

"YES, sir, I have come to ask you for the hand of your daughter." "For Mabel's hand?" "Yes, sir. It is a mere formality, I know, but we thought it would be pleasing to you to have me go through with it." "What's that—a mere formality?" "That is what I said—a mere formality." "And may I inquire who suggested that asking my consent to my daughter's marriage was only a mere formality?" "It was Mabel's mother, sir." "Mabel's mother? Then I have nothing further to say."

Your Editor Chats.

Your Editor's Wish

WHITSUNTIDE is generally one of the most enjoyable of our periodical holidays, and, provided the weather be fine, many of my readers will doubtless be travelling by train to country or seaside. They, of course, will be taking their Whitsun Short Stories with them, as there is no companion for a railway journey more delightful than this little paper. Nevertheless, there are almost sure to be fellow-travellers in the same carriage who have been unwise enough to neglect to purchase a copy, so I take this opportunity of reminding my readers that it would be a gracious and a kindly act on their art if they would, after having read S.S. from cover to cover, pass it on to one of those persons who have armed themselves with the best possible antidote against weariness on the line. In conclusion, I trust that you all will have the happiest Whitsun that your heart can crave for.

Competition Results.

NEXT week I shall publish the name of the winner of the guinea offered in connection with the Twelfth Unsolved Love Problem, "The Test of Ruth Lawson."

I also hope to be able to announce in the same number the result of the recent Signature Competition.

Next Week's Number.

READERS should note that the next number of Short Stories, dated May 28th, will be on sale in the country on Saturday, May 21st, instead of Tuesday, the 24th, as usual.

Empire Day.

NEXT Tuesday, May 24th, is the anniversary of the birth of our late greatly-beloved sovereign, Queen Victoria.

It is a Royal day and should be celebrated as such.

Here is a way in which you yourself can celebrate it and also help others to do so. Great efforts are being made by the organisers of the FRESH AIR FUND to collect a big sum of money on May 24th—Empire Day—so that a larger number of the poor children of the slums than usual may this year have a happy day in the country. All contributions received on May 24th will be kept specially for the "Empire Day" outings.

All amounts to go to this special fund should be sent, in envelopes with "Empire Day" plainly marked in the top left-hand corner, to the Hon. Sec. of the FRESH AIR FUND, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

By Contract Sealed.

The Tale of a Borrowed Love.

THEY were sitting in the library of her home in Kensington. The warm glow from a tall lamp fell slantingly over her, and brought out the deep morocco greens and reds of a heavy portière behind her. He was sitting looking straight ahead of him. They were both silent. There was only the swishing, silky frou-frou of her skirt as she swayed one daintily-slippered foot back and forth with a pretty impatience.

"But, my dear child," Franklin said at last, very patronisingly, "it is absurd! Indeed, it would be quite wrong, you know, for me to pretend I was in love with you."

The soft frou-frou stopped suddenly. She narrowed her wide blue eyes and bit her lip an instant. Then she rose, went over, and sat upon a low chair in front of him, so as to meet his eyes.

"But it is only for a month. Just to make Tom jealous. Ah, please do!"

Franklin moved back uneasily in his chair and faced her eyes.

"But, my dear Miss Dorothy, how could I?"

She only continued to meet his glance with her great, wide eyes. He shifted uncomfortably.

"You see, I had my love affair when I was young. It would be utterly absurd for a man of the world like me to begin again—and on so youthful a plan," he added, with a self-pleased smile.

Franklin was just thirty. He did have a few grey hairs, to be sure, of which, together with his experience, he was vastly proud.

She did not answer. For a full moment she looked the other way, then she turned to him again, and, still fixing him with her wide eyes, said sadly:

"Here you have always professed such interest in me, ever since I was a child. You used to send me flowers ages ago, and you took me to my first ball, and all that—and now when I ask you a tiny little thing like this——"

"You know quite well," he said, very seriously, with his eyes on his boot toes—"you know quite well that I would be glad to do anything in the wide world to please you; but this idea of being deeply in love with you for a month! My dear child——"

She rose and turned away with impatience.

"Oh, as if I wanted you really to love me!" she said petulantly. "I only want you to pretend you do. You do take things so hopelessly seriously."

"And you do place a fellow so hopelessly difficultly," he said, drawing his brows down. "Come now, Miss Dorothy, do you really want me so very much to do it?"

"There now, that's a dear," she said, coming out of her pout instantly, and reseating herself on the low chair before him. "And I promise not to make it the least bit difficult for you. You will only have to lend, not really give, me your affection, you know. You will have to come to see me—well, we will say, four times a week, and you will have to look pensively at me sometimes—sometimes very pensively, the way Tom does—and—that's all."

"Miss Dorothy," he said slowly, with his eyes again on his boot toes, "it does seems such an absurd proceeding for a man of my years and experience! For a month to—why it seems such——"

"Yes," she interrupted quickly; "for only a month. That isn't much, is it? And of course there must be no hedging. You must promise! There now, don't object. I think we shall have to have a contract," she added, laughing a little.

She went to the little Louis Quinze escritoire, seated herself, drew out a sheet of note paper, opened it, and with great seriousness wrote something across it.

"There," she said triumphantly, holding it before him by the tips of the paper, "that is the contract. You must sign it."

He glanced over the sheet and saw written in her bold, girlish hand:

"LENT: To Dorothy Marshall, for a period of one month, beginning on May Day, the undivided affection of James R. Franklin."

With great seriousness she dipped the pen in the ink and gave it to him, and stood over him very gravely while he signed it.

"You shall have this contract back this day month, at which time you will be released from it," she said, folding it carefully, and locking it in a small drawer of the escritoire.

When she turned to him again he was fingering his tie absently and looking into the fire.

It all seemed so absurd to him. He felt with a secret disgust for himself that he, a man of the world and of experience, was being easily outdone now by a wide-eyed, blue-eyed child of eighteen. To be sure, if he could help her with her love affair, why ought he not to do it? Tom Prosser was desperately in love with her already; and yet she had owned frankly that she wanted to make him jealous. That was a peculiar admission.

He looked up and found her looking at him with her wide, persistent eyes. He stopped fingering his tie, and rose to go.

* * * * *

Franklin thought it had been a somewhat trying and awkward evening, though her spirits seemed never to have failed for an instant. It was a night or so before a grand ball, and they were both calling upon her.

"You are going with me to the Cavendishs' ball, are you not?" Prosser said, rising to leave.

"No," she said indifferently, pinning a wilful lock of hair close against her temple; "Mr. Franklin is taking me, aren't you, Jim?"

Digitized by Google

Franklin started uneasily. It was the first time she had ever called him "Jim."

"Yes," he answered awkwardly, "I believe you did wish me to go."

"How very stupid you were!" she said, after Prosser had gone. "Of course I did suggest your taking me, but you should not have given Tom that idea."

"Well, you should not have called me 'Jim,'" he said, a little sullenly.

"Don't you like it?" she said, laughing in spite of herself. "I thought you would."

"Yes; but somehow it was so sudden," he answered, still rather sullenly.

"Oh, don't say that!" she laughed again. "It sounds exactly as though I had proposed to you."

He was looking intently at his patent-leather boots. There was something peculiarly martyr-like and meek about his face as the lamplight, making deep shadows, fell across it. He raised his head suddenly. The fine lines of his face came out sharp and severe.

"Miss Dorothy!" he broke out, with a sudden fierceness. Then he stopped abruptly, and fixed his eyes again on the tips of his boots. The light fell slantwise again down his face. He was going to tell her that he could not keep to the contract, because it had grown hateful to him; because it seemed dishonourable for him to devote himself to making another man jealous, while he himself was not really in love with—— And then he stopped abruptly at the thought.

"Well?" she said, smiling, her face tilted upward like an impertinent flower. "I thought you were going to say something."

"Well, I don't like it!" he blurted out.

"You mean my calling you 'Jim'?" she said, lowering her head instantly, and with only wonder in her face and eyes.

"Good Heavens, no! Don't think that I mind that," he said. "It is the whole thing, the whole contemptible thing! For me to devote myself to making another fellow jealous and miserable when he is head-over-ears in love with you, and I am not in the least in——" He stopped abruptly. He hesitated at this each time, like an unwilling hunter before a six-barred gate.

Her lips were parted a little, and her whole attitude that of waiting.

"And I am not in the least in——" he repeated; and then he ran wide of his first thought, and wide of the truth as well —"and I am not in the least in the mood for such a thing."

"Oh!" she said. "You mean it has become a bore to you to come to see me so often."

"No," he said, coming back to the truth again—"no, it has not. But can't you understand——"

"Why, no!"—shaking her head—"not if it is not boring or disagreeable to you."

He stood before her and looked down at her a while without a word, then he turned and walked away from her. "That is just it. Can't you see? If I did not care a pin myself about you it might be easy enough. But each day I care more. And he cares, too. And don't you see what a mess it is?"

He came and stood before her again. The colour died down slowly from her face.

"Then you don't want to take me to the Cavendishs' ball?" Her brows were lifted a very little, her lips haughty, and her head tilted up proudly towards his.

"Yes, of course I do," he said inconsistently.

"Then I shall be ready at half past nine. We won't want to go before then," she said calmly, rising.

A moment later, when Franklin had gone, the flush came back slowly to her face.

* * * * *

It was Sunday, and Franklin and Dorothy were walking home together from morning service. In all the buoyant life of sound and colour and breathing sunlight they were strangely silent. Franklin's eyes were straight ahead of him, and there were stiff, severe lines about his face. It had grown white and a little worn during the past few weeks, so that the sharp, fine outlines of it were sharper than usual. There was something very child-like and grave about Dorothy's lips. Her face almost equalled his in seriousness, except that her eyes seemed to smile.

Franklin was bitterly reviewing the past month. He had gone into the thing solely for her sake, to make Prosser jealous, and now, what was the outcome? That he had succeeded only too well he was perfectly aware; for instead of making Prosser jealous, and through that jealousy more devoted; instead of drawing Prosser's affections more strongly to her, as he had meant to do, had he not succeeded only in drawing them from her? For Prosser, once well roused, once well jealous, had completely dropped Dorothy, and was now apparently consoling himself with the charms of Edith Barclay, a pretty little pink-and-white girl of a type that Franklin secretly despised.

In the midst of these thoughts he was conscious that Dorothy was bowing to someone. He was just in time to catch Edith Barclay's radiant smile and nod and to see Prosser's rather stiff bow as they brushed past him and Dorothy. He bit his upper lip fiercely and glanced down at his companion. Her face had flushed swiftly. A strange, miserable thrill came over Franklin and stopped and stuck with a dull little ache at his throat. His heart beat heavily.

What a miserable affair it all was! And to think that he had been the means of bringing unhappiness to her for whose least happiness he felt he would so gladly lay down his life. She never spoke to him nowadays of Tom Prosser! His face stiffened and the lines deepened about his mouth. There came to him with intense bitterness the thought that she was wasting her love on a man fickle enough to transfer his affections, almost at a moment's notice, to a girl, in no wise her equal, and for mere jealousy's sake. He noticed, with the same dull ache at his throat, the absent smile with which she greeted his occasional remarks. For her very pride's sake he dared not sympathise or speak to her of it. He walked beside her, realising that in that month he had learnt to love more dearly than he had ever loved before, than he would ever love again.

They had reached her home. He went slowly up the steps behind her and followed her absently into the library. The library had grown to be such a familiar, dear place to him. It was so natural for him to be there with her. She stood idly by a great mahogany table, pulling off her gloves. He stood beside her, looking down at her absently. She removed her hat and ran the hat pins through it.

"Deadly weapons!" she said lightly, drawing one out and running it back again. He held out his hand, not noticing.

"I suppose I must say good-bye?"

"Well, of course, the month is up," she said, without taking his hand.

"Yes, thank Heaven!" he answered.

She raised her brows slightly, and turned her head with a pretty, bird-like movement which brought him quickly to his senses.

"You know perfectly well why I'm glad," he said doggedly.

"No, I don't," she said lightly; "but, at any rate, it is hopelessly ungracious of you. During the month under my training you really ought to have learnt some tact. I am afraid the month has been of no use."

"You know I can't help saying what I mean," he said almost under his breath; "only, this time you have said it for me. You are right, the month has been of no use."

She coloured quickly up to the soft brown hair lying close to her temples.

"Yes," he hurried on; "you've got to let me speak of it. I know I've only hindered, not helped, you. I know I have only brought grief to you, whom to spare the slightest grief—you know what I mean. Don't try to misunderstand me"—for her eyes were wide and his lips opened slightly. "I have made him jealous just as you wanted I should."

"Yes?" she said, as though waiting for him to continue.

"Yes, and you know what I mean—you know just what a mess I've made of it. I've overdone it; it has gone too far.

Digitized by Google

And I didn't have the honest decency to get out of it long ago!"

"What do you mean?" she said very gently, still running the hat pin in and out.

"Oh, you will make me say it, will you?" he said fiercely, and gaining courage now that her eyes were lowered. "Well, I've made him too jealous, and now, like the fool he is, he doesn't care a fig for you."

She raised her eyes, glanced thoughtfully about the room from one thing to another, then at last her glance found his, and she smiled.

"Why, of course he doesn't," she said gently, "and I am glad. That is just it."

"Oh, you brave little thing!" he said, with a thrill of pity in his voice. He had a strong impulse to stoop and fold her closely in his arms. "Don't I know how brave you are! Haven't I seen you trying! But, my dear, a man—you can't deceive a man of my experience."

"I see now what you mean," she said thoughtfully, after a long pause. "And you really thought I loved him? You really thought his waning love was breaking my heart?"

She sat down on the arm of a little low chair, then she looked up at him brightly and continued:

"Why, don't you know, if I wanted Tom's love now, it would take ten, perhaps fifteen minutes to get it back. That is just why I asked your help—because I did not love him—because I do not love him—because I—I love someone else. You see," she hurried on, "I wanted to let him down as easily as possible. I knew the best way to do that was to touch his feelings, to rouse his pride, to make him jealous. I have heard him say he considered it beneath a man's dignity to fight chances with another man for love. He does not love me now; no, of course not; nor does he suffer; that is better still."

She paused. Jim Franklin was looking down at her with a peculiar, half dazed look. She laughed lightly.

"It is so funny! And you thought I wanted you to help me make him jealous so he should love me more. Ah, but that would have been so superfluous, for at that time he was loving me with a changeless and eternal love, you know."

Jim did not answer; he did not even see the funny side of it all, nor smile. He had dropped down into a big armchair, and sat with his head bent. When he looked up his face was white and tired.

"I see," he said slowly; "I am a fool. I am glad I was so mistaken. I can't imagine how I ever thought you need try to win any man's love. But it doesn't much matter. Things are no better as they are. And after all, the month has been of no use—to me, at least. You have accomplished your purpose, and—you love someone else; and I—you know what I mean. I have no purpose now the month is up. You know—you have known since the night of the Cavendishs' ball. In helping let another fellow down easily, I've cut myself pretty badly, that's all. Don't say anything, please!"—as she began to speak. "I won't permit you to say anything. I won't make it hard for you. I know it would pain you to hurt a fly. If you were anxious to let down easily a man who could forget you like that, I won't bother you with myself. Good-bye! You must not think I suffer so much. And yet"—he folded her hand in both his—"and yet, Dorothy, you must know I can't help suffering deeply. I can stand it—just for the sake of loving you. Don't worry over a fellow like me. Good-bye, dear." He stooped and pressed his lips to her hand and left her.

Astonished and dismayed, she stood with the colour dying out of her hot cheeks. For an instant only she was irresolute, then with a swift movement she followed him, reached him just as with bent head he was stepping into the hall, and with a quick, girlish impulse took his hand and led him back into the library.

"You shouldn't have blundered so badly, and you were stupid, of course, not to see, but I don't mind. I've not given you the contract yet; you must have that back before you go."

Her perfect self-control seemed leaving her. It was he who was perfectly calm now. She sat down at the escritoire and unlocked the drawer, and took from it the paper.

"You were to be released to-day."

She was signing her name hurriedly.

"There is no use releasing me. I understand—I know I am no longer needed." Taking the paper she handed to him, he began slowly to tear it.

"Oh, don't!" she pleaded, stopping him. "Read it over first."

"And be released, and then try to forget everything," he said bitterly.

He opened the paper and glanced over it.

"Lent: To Dorothy Marshall for a period of one month, beginning on May Day, the undivided affection of James R. Franklin. Which is herewith returned.—"DOROTHY MARSHALL."

"Ah, Dorothy," he said, turning to her passionately, "what need of releasing me! For I shall never be free again! Yet for your happiness I shall try to forget. But at my years—a man of my——"

"Oh," she gasped, half laughing, "but don't you see? Oh, you are stupid. Don't you see?"

There were tears in her voice.

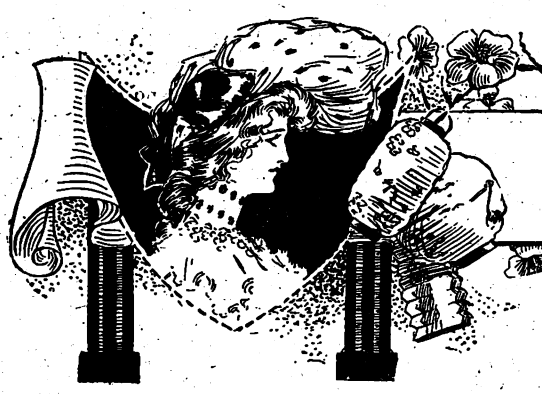
He glanced over the paper more carefully, then keenly at her an instant. The tears had followed swiftly into her eyes.

Then a sudden light came into his face, and he took her in his arms.

"Oh, Dorothy!" he said, kissing her many times.

Ralph Burdett Elliott.

Digitized by Google



A BID FOR FORTUNE.

Telling How a Clever Scheme was Frustrated.

"THERE seems to be too much work on this job; it isn't worth the trouble."

The speaker threw away the half-smoked cigar in disgust. He was about twenty-five; he had an attractive appearance, and was called good-looking by some and handsome by others. To those better acquainted with human nature, however, there was at times a something in his face that tended to mar the first impression. His name was Lester Mayle, and he was in the company of two other men, one of whom was near enough his own age, while the other was forty at least.

"Not enough in it?" echoed the older man, John Waller. "Well, it means five hundred pounds between three of us, and that's equal to three pounds a week for a whole year. If this thing takes a month to work, we can lie low for the next eleven. That's good enough for me!"

"I'd be satisfied," said the third man quietly. His name was Harry Bennett. "But Lester is more aristocratic. I say, my boy, can you do anything better for the present? That's the question, as Shakespeare says!"

Lester Mayle twisted the ends of his moustache impatiently. "I suppose I cannot," he observed, after a pause. "Yet I feel like higher game than this. Well, it comes to this: Harold Gainsford fetches the cash from the bank on Friday afternoons in order to pay the men at the boot factory where he is assistant manager; every fourth week the amount is heavier, it is five hundred instead of four hundred, because certain salaries have also to be paid and other current monthly expenses met. We take him in hand on the fourth Friday, and relieve him of his burden!"

"That's it," said Waller complacently. "It is easy enough, but the time and trouble necessary to carry out the task come in through finding out the details and in waiting for the most favourable Friday. That's all. You're too impatient, Lester."

"On the whole, you have had less work to do than either of us," interposed Bennett, just a little tartly. "You have had the easy part of discovering details connected with the banking arrangements of the firm, which you could do with your aristocratic appearance; but we have had to loaf about and make arrangements under less easy conditions."

"Then I ought to have the lion's share of the spoil!" laughed Mayle grimly. "I have an aristocratic appearance to keep up."

Bennett would have retorted angrily, but Waller interposed: "That will do. Lester has a fit of the blues to-day; they are growing quite common. Each man does his work and shares with the others. Let us have a game of cards."

Lester sat moodily staring at nothing through the window of the hotel. All three men were well dressed and would have passed for men endowed with fair means. They were living in good style, and they calculated that their money would hold out long enough for their purpose. They had changed their lodgings during the "investigation period," as Waller termed it, more than once, going from town to village and so forth, in order to conceal their doings. Mayle looked up with a bored expression as Waller began to handle the pack.

"You two can play, I don't care about it. Look here, are we bound to stay in Northampton any longer? Haven't we collected all the data we want? At any rate, I think I have done all I can do, and we must wait a solid week. Can't we look round elsewhere?"

"Exactly," replied Waller. "Bennett and I have a little more to do, but we can leave to-morrow. Then we make our appearance on the scene again on Friday next; we meet at the appointed spot at the appointed time."

"I'll wait till then," said Mayle, picking up a London morning paper. "I've got a hazy scheme floating in my head which may bring us more money than this. You chaff me about aristocracy, but I am connected with a titled family, and it occurs to me that there may be something to be got out of it."

He began to read, but within two minutes he laid the newspaper down with a whistle.

"Look here, you fellows," he cried. "Sir James Langford, Baronet, is lying dangerously ill; so is his son; and both are suffering from blood-poisoning, due to something eaten at a foreign hotel. They have just come back from the Continent, and were taken ill on the way."

"What's Sir James Langford to do with us?" asked Waller.

"Just this," went on Mayle. "Neither father nor son is likely to recover; it's about a hundred to one against it, according to this paper. There are no other sons, and—and the successor to the baronetcy will be a son of another branch. I am a son of another branch, but I know that there is someone in front of me, if he is still alive! Query: Is he still alive?"

"What's it worth? Is the family rich?" demanded Waller.

The players had thrown their cards on the table at this interesting intelligence, and gazed curiously at Mayle, who was in a brown study. His brows were knit; he was searching the recesses of his memory. Presently he banged his fist on the table with an exclamation which need not be reproduced.

"It's a strange coincidence, but I feel positive of it!" he cried. "That clerk, Harold Gainsford, must be the next-of-kin! And I come after him. I wonder if he knows it? I wonder if any of them know it just off-hand?"

"Pity it isn't you!" growled Bennett. "What's the rent-roll?"

"Ten to twelve thousand a year!" said Lester Mayle, as coolly as he could, looking meaningly at Bennett. "If I were only the next-of-kin instead of being next after that!"

"Oh, well, it's no use worrying about it. It's your luck, said Bennett, picking up the cards again. "Perhaps they won't die, after all."

"Perhaps not," agreed Mayle, with additional moodiness, but there had been a rapid exchange of glances between him and Bennett which had escaped Waller's notice

Digitized by Google

The game ended, Bennett said he would go for a stroll; it was a cold night, bitterly cold, but it would freshen him up before going to bed. Waller expressed his intention of going into the smoking-room, while Mayle said he would go to his room and might go out for a stretch in a few minutes. Thus it came about that Bennett and Mayle met in a quiet street outside the hotel.

"Well?" inquired Bennett significantly.

Lester Mayle glanced round fearfully.

"If it should turn out as I think, and the Baronet and his son should die, then Harold Gainsford would take the title, changing his name to Langford," returned Mayle, "unless——"

He paused. His lips were dry; he had never dared to go so far as this, even in thought. Robbery and swindling were his limits, so far.

"Unless, in the scuffle that ensues next Friday, he gets an unlucky knock on the head?" concluded Bennett. "Well, he might get one, if I were paid well enough for it! What's it worth?"

"It would have to be done very cautiously," declared Mayle, with pallid face.

"What's it worth?" demanded Bennett impatiently. "I say five thousand a year for three years!"

Mayle protested that it was too much, and Bennett turned fiercely upon him.

"Then do it yourself. Think it over, and decide to-morrow."

They parted, for the simple reason that Bennett left his accomplice. Mayle pondered the matter; he did not sleep a wink, but tossed about in bed, thinking it over. He saw all that it meant; riches and ease, instead of plotting and scheming with the police ever in the background, and a prison just a little more in the background. As he meditated, his fears left him; the plan seemed to be safer and easier, and when he met Bennett again his mind was made up. It was a contract. It only remained for Mayle to ascertain that Harold Gainsford was really the successor, and to see if the Baronet and his son died.

Mayle went up to town and made inquiries; he returned on Tuesday, satisfied that there was no hope of the son's recovery, and very little chance of the father getting over it. As for Harold Gainsford, his kinship was also certain.

Already the newspapers were speaking of the missing heir, for the history of the different ramifications was not so well-known to others as to Mayle, who had traded on his relationship for the purpose of getting various sums of money from the Baronet.

All Mayle's scruples had disappeared; he was cool and collected once more, and entered into details with Bennett as calmly as if planning a trip to Brighton. Waller was the obstacle, but Bennett undertook to take him in hand. Waller was likely to be squeamish.

"So that's settled," said Bennett. "Waller will be off with the cash, while we attend to the man."

But the best laid plans go wrong, and something happened which had not been foreseen.

That very evening Mayle slipped over a piece of orange-peel carelessly thrown on the frosty pavement; he fell heavily and broke one of the small bones of the left leg. He was taken to the infirmary, where he was detained. And that piece of orange-peel changed the destinies of several persons.

His leg was set and bandaged by a surgeon, who gave him a sleeping draught. In the morning he felt better; the pain had almost disappeared, and his chief discomfort was that he would be confined to his bed for three weeks or so—and how would his plan go on? Bennett, on receiving a message, visited him, and assured him that all would be well.

"Waller will help me, as you are laid aside; don't fear," he said.

Mayle settled down to wait, it having been arranged that neither Bennett nor Waller should visit him again lest suspicion should attach to Mayle after the—the event of Friday.

Mayle found the time hang heavily, but he tried to pass it comfortably by day-dreaming. He had no mind for reading. What a change it would be when he was Sir Lester Mayle Langford, Baronet. It pleased him, delighted him. He forgot all the probable awkward points, and thought only of the advantages. He would marry——

"Are you comfortable?" asked a sweet voice by his side, and he turned with a start to see a young nurse standing at the bedside.

"I knew you were not asleep," she told him, with a smile. I saw your eyes opening and shutting occasionally, and I thought you were dull or uncomfortable. Can I do anything for you?"

"No, thank you, nurse!" he replied in a hesitating voice.

How sweet she looked, and what a soothing voice she had! She was a born "ministering angel." The face was not beautiful; some would have felt disinclined to describe it as even moderately pretty; yet it had a charm all its own. She seemed to bring peace with her.

"Let me shake your pillow," she said; "it makes it so much more comfortable!"

She raised his head and turned the pillow, after shaking it up a little. Only those who have spent days in bed know how soothing is this simple process. Nurse Rodney understood.

"Shall I read a little to you?" she inquired. "We have less than our complement of patients here now, and I am not busy just at present."

It was so pleasant to listen to her voice that, although he did not wish to hear anything read, he answered in the affirmative, because he liked to hear the sound of her voice.

So she read to him, and he was sad when she left his bedside. He watched for her to come round the ward, and his eyes followed her wherever she went. She noticed his attention, and it pleased her to think that she was soothing his pain—for, in order to enlist her sympathy and get her often to his side, he had pretended that his leg did cause him pain and great discomfort at times.

When she retired from duty and gave place to a night nurse, he turned over in vexation at the nature of things and went to sleep. He was surprised to find what a hold she had obtained over him and how empty everything appeared when she was gone!

He looked for her in the morning, and she came to him as soon as she entered the ward, asking him if he were feeling better.

"Yes," he replied, his face brightening. "I shall soon get well if you could stay here all day!"

"Oh!" she laughed merrily. "What would the other patients do?"

"They do not want you as I do!" he said warmly. "It does me so much good to have you near me. You are so good yourself that—well, it makes me feel that I am a bad lot!" He blurted out the last clause before he was aware of it.

She had moved towards the foot of the bed during the first portion of this short speech, believing that he was about to pay some compliment to her appearance, but she returned on hearing the finish.

"I hardly think that you are treating yourself fairly in saying that!" she remarked gravely. "Of course, not one of us is as good as he or she ought to be, and you must not speak as if I were entirely good and you were entirely bad. Now, you must rest! I will come again soon."

She saw that he was agitated and she left him.

"It's true!" muttered Mayle sadly. "I see it now that I am face to face with a woman who is good! I've been a bad lot, and how can I expect to make a girl like that love me? Many girls would marry for a title, but she wouldn't! She's too good to do that! Well, I'll enjoy her society while it lasts, and then—oh, then I'll go my own way!"

He laughed mirthlessly, and looked about once more for the sweet-faced, sweet-voiced, sweet-tempered nurse!

She came to him several times, and he engaged her in conversation. She asked him questions about himself, following his example in this, for he had put leading inquiries to her. He could not tell her much, and he concealed his family history so far as the baronetcy was concerned. She was an orphan. And so the day passed, and Mayle remembered with a start that the following day was Friday, the all-important day for him!

Digitized by Google

He slept fitfully that Thursday night, and he felt sorry when morning came, for he half-dreaded to meet those tender eyes of Nurse Rodney! He tried to hide the fact from himself, but he could not! He was guilty of plotting to rob and kill a fellow-creature for his own advancement! How could he face this girl?

She came to him, just as sweet as ever, and he steeled himself against the reproaches of his own conscience so that he might enjoy her society. She was impelled towards him

"I had forgotten that I still had it on!"

He stifled a pang of jealousy that shot through his heart.

"You must tell me about him! We are good friends, yet you have not told me that!" he cried.

"Oh, there is nothing to tell!" she smiled in reply.

"But I want to know his name and something about him!" he urged. It seemed to him that he had a right to know. "Please tell me!"

She told him, just to pacify him. "His name is Harold Gainsford," she said, "and he is assistant manager in a boot factory in one of the places outside Northampton, about half a dozen miles away, you know. That is all!"

All! Heavens, was not that too much? Harold Gainsford, the man whose death he was encompassing, was this girl's affianced husband! He, Lester Mayle, who had learnt to revere this girl for her goodness, was bringing desolation upon her!

She waved the flaming newspaper on high, to attract the attention of the driver of the on-coming express.

by a subtle power which she could not then understand, but which she afterwards recognised as that of the Divinity that shapes our ends, as Shakespeare puts it. She read to him; it was short, but a pathetically beautiful story of doing right at all hazards, and he realised that the girl who sat near him was one of those who would act thus. "And what of me?" he asked himself; in reply there rose in his mind the picture of the brutal attack on Harold Gainsford!

As she rose to leave him, he caught sight of a ring on the third finger of her left hand.

"You are engaged?" he queried involuntarily.

She blushed rosily, and slipped off the ring.

"I do not usually wear it when on duty," she explained.

She hurried away from him, and he lay in his bed a prey to the most terrible feelings. If he allowed Gainsford to be sent to his doom? And yet, how could he prevent it without laying himself open to a charge of attempted murder? And could he save Gainsford, even if he were prepared to suffer himself?

She did not come near him again till after dinner, and then it was to chide him for not eating his portion.

"I believe you were sulking because I didn't come!" she said, holding up a warning finger.

Digitized by Google

"Do you know if Sir James Langford and his son are recovering?" he asked suddenly. "You have seen the case in the papers?"

"Both have succumbed!" said the girl, shaking her head sadly. "It is dreadful, is it not?"

No reply. Mayle was thinking. If the son had lived and the title had not gone to Harold Gainsford, he (Mayle) might have tried to stop the crime; but now! A big rent-roll and ease awaited him!

Ease? He glanced at the girl, and there flashed across his mind the thought of what it would mean to her. How could he expect ease when he would be for ever haunted by that face? He seemed to see her pointing him out as a murderer! He shrank from her, and she noticed the movement.

"What is it?" she asked.

"This," he cried suddenly. "Harold Gainsford will be attacked on his way from the bank with the money this afternoon! I am one of those concerned in the crime! He will be robbed, then killed!"

A scream of fear came from her lips.

"Oh, what is this you are saying? Tell me, tell me! Oh, Harold!"

He told her all, as she knelt by his bedside. It was nearly three o'clock; the winter day was drawing to a close and darkness was falling. Harold would be on his way back to the factory on his bicycle, and he would meet this awful fate. In the light of present knowledge, it seemed like tempting Fate for him to do this bank business alone, yet he had done it for more than a year, and nobody had dreamt of danger. It was exactly the fact of this assumed security which had given Mayle and his accomplices their opportunity.

"I must try to save him!" she panted, pressing her hands to her side. "I will try, I will try! Harold, my Harold!"

Like a flash she was gone. Out in the bleak air, clad only in her simple nurse's costume, and after a hasty word to the matron, she sped towards the spot indicated by Mayle. Hurry as she might, she could not reach it under an hour; she would be too late to avert the tragedy, she was forced to realise that, but she went on, on! Perhaps she might find him alive!

At length, footsore and exhausted, she reached the place She could find no trace of Harold, so she went on in the direction he must take, which was towards the railway. In a bend of the road she came upon the damaged bicycle, but Harold was not there! With eyes that burnt for lack of the tears that would not come, she passed on. Over the low stile that kept people from the railway line and on the track. She knew that Harold had avoided a long detour sometimes by lifting his machine over this stile. By the side of the metals she gazed up and down the track in the darkness, and her heart stood still as she saw some dark object lying right in the four-foot way! A moment later she was kneeling by this object. It was Harold, insensible, his body right across the metals of the up-line! And in the distance she heard the faint sound that denoted the approach of the up-express from Rugby.

Harold was alive, but death in another form awaited him. She tried to lift him, but he was a strong, heavy young man, and he lay like a log! She herself, never muscular, was now exhausted by her hurried journey and by grief. She found her strength unavailing—and the train was coming, coming! She could hear the noise a little more distinctly!

With a cry of despair she sprang up. A newspaper lay near the track, dropped probably by Harold's assailants. An idea had seized her!

She usually carried a box of wax matches with her. She struck a match, set light to the newspaper, and waved it aloft, standing right in the track.

The driver of the on-coming train, keeping a good look-out, saw a strange light suddenly spring into life right in his path. He put on the screw, and it seemed to him that there was borne to him on the wind that beat against the engine the appeal:

"Stop! Oh, stop!"

The train was brought to a standstill within a few yards of Harold's inanimate figure. The passengers got out of the carriages, and the utmost consternation prevailed for a few moments. It looked like attempted suicide, but Florrie Rodney tottered up and gave her explanation.

"We will take you two to Northampton Station and give you over to the station master!" said the guard. And this was done.

Harold was alive and very little hurt. He had been knocked senseless and then dragged on to the line. His death would have appeared to be suicide through fearing to face the consequences of losing the money. It was a clever scheme, but it was frustrated by the influence of a good woman over a bad man, and by the heroic conduct of that woman.

Bennett and Waller were never caught, but the money was quickly replaced by Harold Gainsford when he came into the Langford baronetcy. Mayle was the only one who suffered; he ought to have been prosecuted for attempted murder, but both Harold and his sweetheart thought that repentance was worth something, so they allowed it to be supposed that Mayle was concerned only in the robbery. They would have liked to get him off the consequences of that piece of wickedness, but the law stepped in. However, Mayle got off lightly with twelve months' imprisonment, and when he was liberated, he received from Sir Harold and Lady Langford a sum of money that gave him a fresh start in another country, and they promised him an annuity if he lived well.

The engine driver, too, came in for a gratuity that made him stare, but Sir Harold and his sweet wife thought that he should be well rewarded for his promptitude in paying heed to the strange signal.

G. Merriam.

ARE YOU GENEROUS? ARE YOU MEAN?

ARE YOU CLEVER? ARE YOU DULL?

Whatever you are it is as well to know other things concerning yourself, so send a specimen of your handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope to RANEE, 23 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. A reliable delineation of your character will reach you in return—this will give you the required information.

PEARSON'S DREAM BOOK.

Giving the Interpretation of Dreams by Magic Ciphers, by the Square of Fate, by a Table of Dreams according to Days, etc., etc.

By PROFESSOR P. R. S. FOLI.

Author of "Handwriting as an Index to Character," "The Fortune Teller," etc.

Crown 8vo. Cloth, Price 1s.

Some of the subjects dwelt upon in this interesting book are:

Dreams and their Mystic Reality—They are our Sleeping Thoughts—Distinction Between Real and Idle Dreams—Wonders of Dreamland—Historic Evidence of the Uses and Interpretations of Dreams—Greek, Roman, Gallic, Indian, and Medieval, and Modern Views—Rapidity of Dreams—Doubtful Theories—Inspiring Power of Dreams—Some Dreams are Valuable, some Vain—Predisposing Causes—Dreams within Dreams—Somnambulists—Divisions of Dreams—The Dream Proper—The Oracle—The Warning—Instances of these—The Interpretation of Dreams by Magic Ciphers—The Magic Square of Fate—A Table of Dreams according to their Days—A List of Dreams, Subjects, and what they indicate alphabetically arranged—Omens, etc.

At Booksellers, or post free for 1s. 2d. from THE BOOK PUBLISHER, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, Ralph, all afternoon? One whole afternoon all alone without a soul in this terrible place to talk to——"

"Can't you read, dear?"

"Yes, and make my eyes and head ache. It's perfectly provoking of your brother to fall ill just while we're on our honeymoon. He should have more consideration. Ralph, there's the carriage; you'll whip up the horses, dear, won't you? Oh——" and the poor little bride was alone, with the prospect of a lonely afternoon to herself; which prospect, in a large hotel in a town where one doesn't know a soul, and when one is on one's honeymoon, is not an enviable one, as any unbiassed person will admit. The bride of three weeks sat down in a hopeless sort of way on the broad verandah overlooking the hotel grounds. She wearily turned over the list of guests, which an attentive waiter had put into her hand, without the least sign of interest in its contents. Suddenly an exclamation escaped her.

"Mr. and Mrs. Clifford Lonsdale!" she said, half aloud. "Mrs. Lonsdale! So that is the reason of his silence, and here I've been tormenting myself about him—picturing his grief at my fickleness, his anger, his despair—only to find him married, in the same hotel in which I am spending my honeymoon. Oh, Cliff, what a goose I've been to spoil my new happiness by worrying over you! I might have known that the affection of light grey eyes and fair hair wouldn't stand the test of a two years' absence from the beloved object, any more than—than a schoolgirl of seventeen knows when she is really in love. What fun it will be to meet him! Some confusion on both sides—mutual congratulations—'Allow me to present my wife'—'Mr. Lonsdale, my husband'—perfectly glorious! Oh, I can see it all!" And leaning back in her chair, Edith shut her eyes as if to enjoy the scene in her mind's eye.

When she opened them again the look of amused enjoyment gave place to one of surprise, for a few paces away from her, leisurely smoking a cigar, stood unmistakably the man of her thoughts. She started up. Turning at the sound, the object of her gaze beheld the girl whom of all persons on earth he was least anxious to see. Edith stepped towards him with outstretched hands.

"Why, Clifford Lonsdale!"

"Miss Noble!"

While on her face was a look of pleasure, and a gleam of mischief, too, on his was expressed amazement mingled with embarrassment. Her quick eye and ear took in the situation at once.

"I've the advantage of you, dear old chum!" was her mental ejaculation. "I know your little secret, and mine is safe—until Ralph comes back." Mr. Lonsdale, hastily throwing away his cigar, took her proferred hand, while the embarrassment deepened on his face as she gave his hand a soft pressure, and said with a well-feigned little accent of tenderness: "Oh, Cliff, I cannot tell you how glad I am to see you!"

"Why, Edith, who in the world would have thought of seeing you here?" he managed to exclaim.

"And who you, sir? I'm overcome with astonishment. But I'm perfectly delighted to see you, too. I'm all alone this afternoon. My guardian angel"—"if he wants to think I mean my chaperon, it's not my fault," she whispered to her conscience—"had to go and see an invalid brother, and I didn't know what I could do to pass the time. But now that Fate has so kindly sent you in my way, you must, you positively must amuse me. And to think that I haven't seen you for three whole years! I've so much to tell you and ask you that it will take hours! And these beautiful grounds have just the loveliest places, where we can be all to ourselves. Do you see that large tree? Let's go there."

Lonsdale helplessly followed the pretty tyrant, with a remorseful thought of his bride left alone upstairs with a blinding headache. He turned to his companion with an excuse at the end of his tongue, but now she was tripping ahead with the airy grace of a nymph, and crying gaily: "Hurry up, Cliff! Do come and look! Here are some of the dearest little ducks. See, aren't they sweet?"

Her clear, silver laugh rang out with the musical ring he remembered so well, when the girl before him was a budding woman of seventeen, and he a slender youth of twenty, her devoted slave. The excuse died on his lips, and he joined in her laugh, as the mother duck, with angry, startled quacks, led her seminary of downy ducklings away to the pond, gleaming silver blue through the trees.

"Edith, you are as much a child as ever. I thought three years would surely make a young lady of you."

"Never! I shall never be anything but a child, I fear. But come, sit down by me here," and then, as he sat down on the rustic bench beside her, "doesn't it seem like old times to be together once more? Now I am prepared to hear all the news. Pray tell me, sir, what have you been doing for the past three years—since I bade you a tearful farewell?"

With genuine interest she followed the recital of his varied experiences—battles hardly won, obstacles overcome with difficulty, and ultimate success; while Lonsdale forgot time, place, circumstances, everything in the pleasure of answering her eager questions, and in asking news of old scenes and mutual friends. She told him the history of her life during his three years' absence, carefully omitting all that might lead him to suspect a change in her circumstances. As often as he attempted to lead up to the fact of his marriage, with her quick woman's intuition of what was coming, she interrupted him with another question. Never had she been so gay, so animated, and it was without effort, too, for she really delighted in living over the past in company with her handsome old playmate.

For some time their talk was merely such as might have passed between any two old friends, and they both enjoyed it thoroughly; but Edith did not intend to let her old sweetheart off without some punishment. Seeing his careful avoidance of tender topics, she interrupted him in a description of life in South Africa, and with a sudden change of tone, said:

"Yes, Cliff, you men have much the best of it in a case of this kind." What kind he was left to infer. "When you are compelled to leave the girl you like, though it may be a wrench at first, you have so much to do and to think about, your lives are so full, that you have but little time to grieve; while we poor women have to stay at home with no absorbing work to bury ourselves and our troubles in, with nothing to do but to count the minutes and wish they would fly faster. Now, while you have been out in a far-off land, like Ulysses, winning wealth and glory (and a coat of tan, too, Cliff, which is very becoming!) I, like poor, patient Penelope have been spinning——"

Digitized by Google

"Yarns, I'll wager!" he interrupted, laughingly, "for they're the only things I ever heard of your spinning."

She joined in his laugh, but added severely:

"Your levity is unseemly, sir, when it spoils such a fine comparison. But, seriously, I do wonder sometimes," she went on, getting pathetic, "how I have stood the last three years—without you, I mean. But I don't believe you have cared one bit, Cliff!" And she shot a challenge from her blue eyes into his grey ones.

"Edith!" He was about to add a hasty remonstrance, when the realisation of his position came to him, and he remained silent.

"You say 'Edith' just as you used to say it when I tormented you so, when we were—children. I never used to like my name until you told me you thought it pretty. Then, whenever you would say it, I used to think it was the very prettiest name in the world."

She said all this with a little droop of her head which struck a chill to Clifford Lonsdale's heart. The conversation was plainly becoming dangerous. What should he do? Edith evidently believed in the reality of his attachment for her, and meant to resume their relations at the point where they had been broken off when he went to South Africa, to seek the fortune which was to win the favour of her guardian. A year's absence had calmed his youthful ardour, and six months' companionship with the pretty daughter of his employer had given rise to another attachment which he realised was the grand passion of his manhood, and not the impulsive affection of youth. There had been no correspondence between himself and Edith, according to the mandate of her guardian. It would have been an easy matter to write her the news of his marriage, but to tell it to her with her eyes looking into his was a task before which he quailed. If she still loved him, how could he bear to see her radiant face overclouded by the story of his faithlessness?

He stole a look at her, and his heart failed him. She was sitting on a root of the tree now, her hands at her side lightly touching the tree, and one little arched foot idly drawing figures on the ground, while a smile curved her rosy, wilful mouth. She wore a dark blue skirt, and a pretty blue and white blouse; this, with a blue walking hat and natty leather belt, completed a rather masculine costume, which suited to perfection the trim, slender figure.

The sunlight glittered through the branches, and gleamed upon her bronze-coloured hair, which waved in a wealth of ripples about her small, well-shaped head.

Clifford felt the old witchery coming over him, when suddenly he seemed to see the picture of a dear form, tall and willowy; one who, womanly in everything, never affected the mannish mode of dressing, but preferred soft, clinging stuffs and dainty laces; one who was the light and happiness of his life. In place of the imperious, dark-blue eyes he seemed to see a pair of warm brown ones, whose every glance told of a tender, affectionate nature. Then he said with a good deal of emphasis:

"I think it is one of the sweetest names in the world."

"One of the sweetest? You used to say it was the very sweetest. Now, Cliff, I believe someone has wheedled you into saying her name is the sweetest. Villain, speak!" with mock tragedy.

He felt that his opportunity had come.

"Well, you see, after the senior partner came out to Johannesburg I used to go to his house a good deal, and he—you see, had a daughter, and——"

"I thought so! What was her name, please?"

"Dorothy."

"So! And you consider that name prettier than Edith? I don't admire your taste, sir! Do you remember the verses you scribbled in my autograph book?"

His golden opportunity for confession was lost, and he looked down at her in a disheartened sort of way, as he answered abstractedly:

"No, I've forgotten them."

Her eyes glanced up at him with a world of reproach in their blue depths.

"Have you really, Cliff? And they were so pretty."

He felt compunction seize him.

"Oh, yes, I do remember them now!" he interrupted. "Don't they go something like this?—

> "She who comes to me and pleadeth,
> In the lovely name of Edith,
> Shall not fail of what is wanted.
> Edith means 'the blessed'—therefore
> All that she may wish or care for
> Will, when best for her, be granted."

"There, I knew you couldn't have forgotten them. Aren't they pretty? I'm so glad my name means 'the blessed'; and really"—her face lighted up—"it seems to fit in my case, now, at any rate; for I have always wished to travel, and here I am in this beautiful place, with the one I care for most on earth!"

Her eyes glowed, and Lonsdale, not dreaming that she might refer to anyone but himself, was stricken with horror at having allowed her to make such a confession. He nerved himself with an effort, but Edith, pitying his confusion, and feeling that she had gone so far that explanations must inevitably follow unless she made a diversion, rose hurriedly, and said:

"Listen, Cliff! Don't you hear the dinner gong?"

Cliff did not, nor did she, but without waiting for his answer, she hurried towards the hotel. Lonsdale, reviling his evil genius, followed her. She had used this ruse as a means of escape, and felt rather conscience-stricken for the trick; but in a moment all qualms vanished, for in a carriage just entering the courtyard she perceived her husband. At the same moment Lonsdale, glancing towards the verandah, saw his wife seated at one end, alone. She looked in calm surprise at him and the girl at his side. Edith, noting the look, smiled to herself, and turning quickly to Lonsdale, said, with a meaning glance towards the verandah:

"You'd better hurry, Cliff; your wife is waiting for you!"

He started with amazement.

"You knew, then?"

"Yes. Wasn't I clever to mislead you so?" Then, after another glance at Mrs. Lonsdale: "Really, Cliff, I must admire your taste. She is as sweet as—honey. I'm awfully glad for your sake, Cliff; let me congratulate you."

With a world of relief on his face, Lonsdale warmly grasped the hand she held out, but flushed hotly at her next words.

"I'm very pleased and all that, you know, but I think you might have let me know before. How long since?"—with another interrogatory glance.

He stammered.

"Not very long—a few weeks—we're on our honeymoon now——"

"Why, how odd!" she exclaimed in mock surprise. "Two bridegrooms in the same hotel! Do you see that tall, handsome man just getting out of that carriage? Well, he's on his honeymoon, too."

"Very odd!" Clifford began, when a look at her roguish face stopped him, and he finished by saying: "Why, Edith, you little hypocrite! I really believe you are—you must be——"

A wave of crimson swept over her face, and she hastened towards the man who had just alighted from the carriage; but as Lonsdale stood staring after her, with perplexity written on every line of his face, she threw a charming look over her shoulder at him.

"You're right, I am," she said.

Nancy Leigh.

Digitized by Google

ENTIRELY RECONCILED.

Being the Most Interesting Love Story of Esther Remington.

ESTHER REMINGTON stood before her long mirror, the picture of dejection. Evidently her thoughts were not of the charming reflection centred in its clear depths, and yet the slender, erect figure, in its close-fitting, satin gown, with filmy lace forming delicate shadows on the round arms and neck, was very pleasant to contemplate. But the proud face, with its daintily pencilled eyebrows and clear, grey eyes fringed with heavy lashes, had an air of weariness and sadness. Yet it was only three months since Esther Vane had stood in all the splendour of this very attire, and pronounced the words which made her Arthur Remington's wife.

The door was opened with noisy haste, and a young man entered.

"I forgot everything about this confounded party, Esther," he began in hurried explanation. "I see you are dressed, but you know it never takes me long to get ready." And Mr. Remington commenced the preparations for his toilet.

"We shall be rather late, I think," his wife responded, without turning towards him; but there was a tremulous resentment in the manner with which she clasped the wide band of gold upon her arm.

"It's a terrible bore, I know, this party-going," said her husband. "I always thought you women liked arriving at 'sensation time,'" he added carelessly; "but then—I can see that you have the bad taste to be 'huffy' again this evening," as Esther maintained silence.

She confronted him with flashing eyes.

"I certainly should not go at this late hour," she said in proud disdain, "except that it might appear a trifle odd to be absent from an entertainment given especially in honour of our marriage."

"At least you can decline all such invitations in the future," her husband coolly retorted. "You know I do not care for parties and balls—indeed, they are almost new in my experience."

"You would rather stay at home with a nasty old book, I suppose."

"I certainly should. Our own fireside is good enough for me."

"But I like society. I have been accustomed to it all my life."

"That is unfortunate, for mother and I entertain very little. It's no use, Esther—you can't make a society man of me. If you want to go to social functions you must provide yourself with another escort." And with a laugh Remington deliberately proceeded to arrange his tie.

Poor Esther! She walked proudly into the next room and threw herself upon the pretty blue lounge, regardless alike of lace, flowers, and daintily-dressed hair. But there were no tears—only miserable thoughts that filled her heart almost to bursting, and took away the power to draw long breaths. She had looked forward almost with a child's pleasure to this evening, and now it was spoilt by the words just spoken.

But it would not do to think just now. Her husband was ready, and the ordeal must be got over somehow; and she must personate the happy bride. A wretched evening it proved to her, for Arthur made no attempt to conceal the fact that he was bored, and to please him she proposed an early departure. All the happiness of her life was over already, she thought, as they rolled silently homeward in the carriage. And she had given up the old free home life, and come miles and miles away from the dear home faces, to meet only coldness and neglect.

Oh, how she detested this new home, where the watch-word of life seemed work, with never any amusement except some dismal lecture or literary reunion equally tedious! And her husband—how changed he was since those happy days at Rusper, when they first met and loved each other. Already he was accustomed to receive her affection and ministrations as ordinary events, while in her own home it was always she who had received homage and attention.

All this Esther Remington went over in her mind, with a sense of distress working at her heart as she thought of the future that was to be so different from the life she had planned.

Where was the lover-husband with the constant, devoted attentions that had begun with their courtship?

But she knew the cause of it all. It was that stern woman whom she now called mother. It was so different from the "happy-go-lucky" life of her maiden home. Here it was breakfast at seven, dinner at one, tea at six, and to get three meals well over seemed the chief business of the day.

When her husband's mother prepared to wash the china and polish the silver, Esther offered rather timidly to assist in these duties; Mrs. Remington accepted her services, but did not veil her contempt of the inefficiency with which the task was performed. It was all very different from what Esther had pictured; but she was determined never to complain, for had not her husband told her he was comparatively poor? And had she not declared, with the enthusiasm of a girl who loved the man she was about to marry, that she would be his willing helpmate and that his mother should be her mother?

To do Remington justice it was impossible for him to understand the depressing effect of this new home atmosphere upon his young wife. All his life he had been accustomed to see his mother move in the same routine with the same regularity; and truly she had been a good mother to him, for she herself had prepared him for college and sacrificed many things to his advancement.

It was a shock to her when Arthur, taking his summer holiday at Rusper, had written a glowing description of the beautiful girl who had consented to become his wife; and when Esther at length arrived after their brief courtship—for Arthur had been a very ardent wooer—the mother's heart was hardened against this piece of mere girlish prettiness as with some justice she considered her.

The evenings that Esther had expected to be full of brightness proved to be very dull affairs, with the elder Mrs. Remington ceaselessly knitting, and by her very presence putting a constraint upon her most trifling words.

Esther mistook the elder woman's undemonstrative manner for coldness, and failing to understand the really kind nature beneath a stern exterior, was awkward and constrained in her presence. So it ended in Arthur's first yawning a good deal, and then settling down to a book, and to Esther, who loved life and laughter, it seemed very dismal to pass evening after evening with no sound but the turning over of leaves and the clicking needles.

On her side Mrs. Remington secretly condemned her daughter-in-law's "incorrigible idleness." Both were good women, but it was impossible that they could understand each other. And Arthur, carelessly content with his own life, selfishly forgot that it was all new and strange to poor little Esther, who gradually lost her innocent gaiety, and became pale and silent, the mere shadow of her former self.

* * * * *

Esther was ill—so ill that they spoke only in whispers near her, and outside straw was strewn on the road to deaden all sound. Her father had just arrived, summoned by telegram.

Digitized by Google

"And you tell me that Esther fell in going down the cellar steps?" he asked in a tone of astonishment. "And pray, madam, what necessity could there be for my daughter to do such a thing?"

"It was her own offer," said Mrs. Remington, quite as haughtily. "Esther was assisting me in my household duties. Why should she not? Her husband, as you ought to know, is a poor man."

Mr. Marston turned away without ceremony, and went quietly into his daughter's room. What a change to him was this pale-faced woman with the purple shadows under the dull eyes, and the pinched lips all purple, too! Where was the man who was responsible for it all, he asked himself in bitter anger, as he glanced round; and then he saw his son-in-law kneeling at the other side of the bed, with his wife's passive hand in both his own.

"Do you think she will die?" he whispered when Mr. Marston had beckoned him out of the room, and surely anyone could read the haggard misery in his face. But the father answered with a cruel directness:

"I think that if she dies you have killed her by your neglect and coldness."

Arthur Remington had come to believe this himself. The very morning of the accident he had found a bundle of Esther's dainty love-letters, full of allusions to the future sweetness of their lives together; the difference between the dream and the reality had suddenly dawned upon him. There came before him a vision of Esther as he had first seen her in her dress of pale blue, with laughing eyes, looking out from under her wide-brimmed hat. How pale and quiet she had grown! He had been cross to her that morning because of some trifle. Accustomed to self-reliant women, her childishness sometimes jarred upon him. He forgot that he had chosen her from all others, and it was his duty to make all things easy for her. Pierced with sudden remorse he started up, resolved to seek her at once; but as he reached the door a dreadful shriek rang out and then his mother's terrified call for help.

Mrs. Remington, busy at her cooking-table, had required some jelly to be taken to the cellar. The one servant not being forthcoming, Esther had volunteered to carry it. It was a simple task, and Mrs. Remington willingly confided it to her; but poor Esther was awkward and inexperienced; her high-heeled shoes caught on the cellar stairs; her head swam round, she faltered, then fell heavily down the whole steep flight.

Arthur scarcely knew how he reached her or carried her up those dreadful steps again. The hastily-summoned physician looked very grave indeed over his new patient. And then in the terrible delirium that followed Remington began to realise all that his young wife had suffered in their brief wedded life. Her constant complaints of his coldness brought the tears to his eyes. It is a torturing experience to waken to a sense of our own deficiencies too late for expiation, and this was his condition. It came upon him like a revelation that he had been a careless and inconsiderate husband; but his easy-going nature had received a shock that developed all his higher qualities. Hereafter he was resolved to lead a life full of consideration for all humanity.

When Esther came slowly back to health and strength again, her father insisted, with rather an imperious manner, that his daughter should accompany him home.

"And you may depend upon it," he added, "that I shall detain her as long as possible from a place where she is expected to do general housework."

Mrs. Remington naturally enough resented this remark.

"You are mistaken, sir," she said in her stiff way. "I do most of the work here. I seldom called on Esther to assist me."

Mr. Marston pointed towards his daughter's room.

"How came I to find her there, then?" he sternly asked. "Had she not been performing a menial's work——"

"It was very unfortunate that Esther could not do me a slight service without endangering her life," was the cold answer. "But as for menial work—pray remember that my son's wife occupies no higher a position than my son's mother."

"Esther is not accustomed to anything of the kind. She was brought up in luxury," answered Mr. Marston.

"In that case you should not have been so ready to give her to a poor man," said Mrs. Remington, unflinchingly. "I have done my best to make your daughter's home comfortable, I could do no more. Unhappily, she has few resources within herself, and attaches too much importance to trifles."

"Hush, mother!" interposed Arthur, who had listened with ill-concealed impatience to all this. "What fault exists lies at my door. I made too little allowance for my poor girl's pleasure-loving nature, and denied her the social excitement to which she had been accustomed. In future——"

"We will say nothing about that just now." Mr. Marston spoke decidedly. "My daughter will remain with me until her health is re-established; then we can decide what is best for you both."

To this decision Arthur Remington submitted in proud silence when he found that it was Esther's wish to go back to her old home. At parting he clasped her in his arms and implored her passionately to forgive his past thoughtlessness. She answered languidly, with the apathy of a statue:

"Indeed, Arthur, I have nothing to forgive. I only regret that we have understood each other so little. Two such different people should never have come together."

"You will write to me often, and send for me when you desire to come home?" he asked her at the last moment.

She assented indifferently, and in another instant he was alone upon the station platform.

The weeks went slowly by and lengthened into months without bringing home again Arthur Remington's wife. Her letters were few, cold, and constrained. Her father needed her, she wrote; she was quite well and contented, and would write again soon. This was about the substance of each letter, and involuntarily Arthur adopted the same colouring of constraint. He had resolved to let his wife choose her own time to return to him, but he forgot that it was impossible for her to read between the lines of his letters, or to gather from their contents his longing for her presence. In the meantime his home seemed very empty, and his heart desolate.

Fortune smiled upon him in the year he and his wife were estranged. A bachelor uncle left him all his money. He resigned his position in the bank, established his mother in a home of her own, and resolved to go abroad. When he expressed his intention of settling a part of his fortune on Esther, Mr. Marston haughtily declined the proposition in his daughter's name, so he intimated, and Arthur, now seriously hurt and angry, made up his mind to a life-long estrangement from his wife. If she could live without him, he could live without her, he proudly thought.

But first he would gratify a long-repressed yearning to revisit the place where he had first met his lost love. It was in the sweet, early autumn, which brought back so vividly the old happy days, that Arthur reached Rusper. As he strolled idly along over the now solitary walk, the sweet, laughing face of Esther came before his memory with a thrill of positive pain. Surely he had been sufficiently punished for his thoughtlessness. Could nothing regain him his sweet wife?

As he thus pondered he turned a sudden curve in the path, and there stood before him a slender figure clad in pale blue, with a wide-brimmed hat; but the grey eyes were not laughing now; they had filled suddenly with tears, and husband and wife stood gazing silently into each other's faces. But only for an instant; the next Esther was in Arthur's arms, held there with a passionate intensity that it seemed would never relax, while kisses rained upon the sweet, tear-stained face.

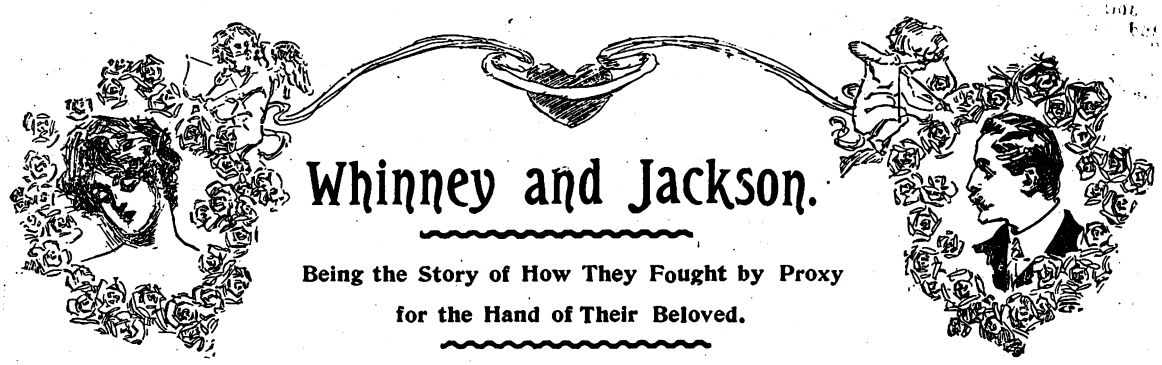
"Never shall we part again!" he murmured brokenly. "Esther, promise me that neither pride nor estrangement nor anything but death shall separate us again in this life."

Esther's face lit up with a smile as she whispered softly: "I promise."

They sealed the vow with a kiss of entire reconciliation; and after all Arthur Remington went abroad, but not alone—his wife accompanied him.

Grace Maynard.

Digitized by Google



Whinney and Jackson.

Being the Story of How They Fought by Proxy for the Hand of Their Beloved.

WHINNEY loved Miss Robins. So did Jackson. Whinney was determined, and so was Jackson. Whinney won a prize at golf and was convinced that his victory over Miss Robins was complete, but the next day Jackson won a prize. Also as to which was her favourite no one could determine. Upon both she smiled; to both she held out her hand with equal frankness. Jenkins, a common friend and a shrewd observer, said that a lucky word, a look, a gesture on the part of either one might settle it at any moment. He understood women.

One afternoon, on the golf links at the Scottish village in which they were staying, Whinney and Jackson refused to speak to each other.

"I would rather be her caddy than a millionaire," said Whinney, so that she might overhear him.

"Than a king," spoke up Jackson, looking far away.

How handsome she was in her short skirt, and as graceful as the new-fledged bird that hops upon the first grass of spring. Surely she was enough to turn the head of any man, to make him stake his all upon the chance of winning her love. Jackson had avowed his devotion and she had listened patiently and smiled sweetly as she declared that as yet she did not know her own mind, and as her heart was companion to her mind, she could not answer. She had listened and smiled, and said the same thing to Whinney.

The sun was down and the players and the spectators were leaving the links. Miss Robins' ball was lost, and out in the dusk the two rivals were hunting for it.

"Now, don't substitute another ball and swear that you have found it," said Jackson.

"Ah, I see you credit me with a deception that is at this moment passing through your own mind," Whinney declared.

"If she were not here I would call you a scoundrel."

"Oh, out with it! Don't let her stand in your way."

"If I weren't afraid that her tender nature would prompt her to take pity on you I would scalp you with a golf stick."

"Ah, when you show her a drop of my blood I will exhibit to her a pint of yours."

"Come, gentlemen, don't quarrel," Jenkins exclaimed, in a voice more than loud enough.

"Jenkins," cried Whinney, "attend to your own affairs. One would think that you were a peace commission appointed by all the powers on earth."

"And when you want to shout," Jackson spoke up, "reserve your strength for an occasion when I am not present."

"Ah," said Jenkins, "so you have both resolved upon insulting me, your friend. You have mistaken my gentleness for timidity. But I want to tell you that I'm as revengeful——"

"As a lamb," suggested Jackson.

"Or a rampageous worm," put in Whinney.

"All right, you'll pay for this." And then walking back to Miss Robins he offered her his arm and took her away.

The next morning the two rivals received a copy of the following note:

"GENTLEMEN,—You have misunderstood my nature if you suppose that I am only a dove. In my veins flows the blood of the old vikings who loved danger and blood. I have often declared that the man to whom I give my hand must fight for me. Hitherto there has been no occasion, but now there is a pressing opportunity. You must fight each other. The battle-ground shall be the little grassy spot to the left of the golf links, where the two oaks bend over and intertwine their horny figures. There you shall meet to-morrow night, at ten o'clock, and with no words, for they might lead to a reconciliation, fight with golf sticks till one of you is vanquished. Then let the victor repair to the little church near by, which will be lighted up, where I shall gladly receive him."

When Whinney read down and grasped the name of the writer, a thrill shot through him. Indeed he was shot with a thrill several times before he reached the end. "Golf sticks," he muttered. "Why, I'd rather a man would come at me with a scythe. And in his arm that scoundrel Jackson's got the strength of a mule. I don't want to fight—but I adore her and something must be done. But why should not wit fight my battle for me? Why can't I hire some tramp and let him go there in the dark and hammer that scoundrel's head into a jelly? I will."

The night came and it was almost pitch dark. On a knoll not far from the two oaks stood Whinney and his tramp.

"Now you understand it thoroughly, I believe," said Whinney.

"I think I've got it all right, sir."

"I don't want you to kill him, you understand—but I do want you to make him sore."

"Very well, sir."

"Well, go along, and when the thing's over, come up here and I'll give you a five pound note."

The tramp disappeared, and soon there arose the sharp noise of the fray. It was to be a stubborn combat. Whinney heard a footfall on the grass and turned round. "Who are you?" he inquired.

"What, that you, Whinney?"

"Jackson, as I am alive! Yes, it is I."

Jackson laughed. "I thought you were down in the hollow fighting my man."

"And I thought you were fighting mine."

"Well, we've tricked each other. I'm too civilised to fight."

"So am I. Listen, they'll crack each other's skulls."

"Let 'em crack. Here comes someone with a lantern—and see, the little church is lighted. Now, how are we going to settle it?"

"Let our men decide by their valour."

The combat had ceased, and they heard the fighters approaching, and they arrived just as the man halted with the lantern. They were paid, and asked as to who was the victor.

"It was a good joke," spoke up the man with the lantern. "I came over to see them fight. My friend Jenkins got the thing up—and see that church lighted over there? He is marrying Miss Robins."

The two tramps grinned in the yellow light.

"I admit we hain't done bad," said one of them. "We are pals, you know, and so we sat down and hammered each other's sticks."

Whinney and Jackson reached over and shook hands.

Oliver Read.

Digitized by Google

His Parting Shot.

HE: "But couldn't you learn to love me, Ida?" She: "I don't think I could, George." He (reaching for his hat): "It is as I feared. You are too old to learn."

Quick Work.

GUSSY: "Well, old fellow, I asked Miss Amy last night to marry me, and she declined." Goslin: "Did she deliberate, as though hesitating to pain you?" Gussy: "No; she produced her negative by the instantaneous process."

She Wouldn't Like it.

JACK (to his fiancée): "I think of getting a musical instrument, Maud. For instance, a cornet." Maud (in dismay): "Oh, no; not that horrid thing." Jack (in surprise): "And why not, dearest?" Maud (blushing violently): "It makes the lips so hard."

A Matter of Emphasis.

GRACIE: "So John proposed last night, and you accepted him! Do tell me how it all happened?" Rosie: "Oh, it was simply a matter of emphasis." Gracie: "Of emphasis?" Rosie: "Yes, he said, 'Don't you love me a little bit?' And I answered, 'No, I do not love you a little bit.'"

No Time to Spare.

GENTLEMAN FROM CHICAGO: "I want to be personally conducted over London, only please be quick, as I only have sixty minutes to spare." Tourist's Guide: "You wish to see the whole of the Metropolis in the space of one hour? Well, sir, it seems to me that what you require is a lightning conductor."

How Good of Him!

THEY had just entered the conservatory from the ballroom. "Oh, dear!" said the sweet girl, fanning her cheek. "I'm melting." The young man saw an opportunity. "I knew it was rather warm," he said, "but I didn't think it was as hot as that." "What do you mean?" "Why, hot enough to melt pure gold."

And the Robin Robbing.

MR. CHATTERTON: "I've decided to go into business, Miss Weatherbee." Miss Weatherbee: "I'm very glad to hear it, Mr. Chatterton." "Yes, I've made up my mind to become a farmer. Think how jolly it must be to go out of a morning and see the butterflies making butter, and the grasshoppers making grass—and—all that sort of thing, you know."

Her Look of Admiration.

BIG BROTHER: "I should like to know what you've been flirting with that Saphead for?" Pretty Sister (indignantly): "I haven't." "Yes, you have. He told a friend you stood before him for ten minutes as if entranced, and you looked straight into his eyes if you would read his very soul, and he said if ever ardent admiration shone in a human face, it did in yours." "The conceited fellow! I was looking at my own reflection in his eye-glasses."

Safe.

"So you are going to marry? Have you anything laid by?" "Yes, I've got a rich uncle laid by with a paralytic stroke, and I'm his only surviving relative."

A Lucky Find.

"ALBERT, dear, while looking through some of your old clothes I made such a lucky find that I ordered a new dress on the strength of it." "What was it, dear?" "Half a dozen cheques that had never been written on."

More Household Economy.

YOUNG WIFE: "I wish you would take a day off and help me bring up all those jars of fruit I preserved last year, and find some way to get rid of the stuff. It's all spoilt, as usual." Husband: "What's the hurry?" Young Wife: "I want the jars to preserve more fruit."

Wise Advice.

FOND MOTHER: "If that young man should take advantage of you, and try to kiss you, what would you do?" Dutiful Daughter: "I should remind him that I have a mother whom I love very dearly." Fond Mother (after reflection): "I think, dear, you had better remind him that you have a father."

Insinuating!

"MISS ETHEL is a long time coming down," said the youth to the servant, after waiting some time for the young lady's appearance. "Perhaps," he added, with a laugh, "perhaps she is making up her mind whether to see me or not." "No," said the servant, with an icy smile, "it isn't her mind she is making up."

Took Him as a Bargain.

HE (humbly, after being accepted): "I know I am not worthy of you. Tell me, my beautiful darling, what you saw in such a plain sort of fellow to—— Do you know, I was dreadfully afraid you were going to refuse me." She: "I did intend to, but you know my weakness. I could never resist a bargain, and when you proposed you did look so awfully cheap! How could I let you go?"

Difficult to Please.

BROWN: "Why don't you marry and settle down?" Jones: "Well, I've got my reasons for it. The woman I want to marry must have lots of money and be smart, but when I find a woman who has money, and who is willing to marry me, her willingness to marry me is positive proof to my mind that she is stupid, and then, of course, she doesn't suit me. I want a smart woman for a wife."

Dizzy Heights.

MR. POPINJAY (falling on his knees): "Miss Perkins, I can no longer resist the passionate impulse to appeal to you on the momentous subject that is fraught for me with the issues of life and death. And yet I am overawed at my presumption when I take into consideration the celestial glamour of your personal charms, the dazzling lustre of your intellectual attainments, the exquisite, the adorable——" Miss Perkins: "Excuse me, Mr. Popinjay, but there are times when eloquence is rather out of place. If you wish to pop the question, pop it, and be done with it." This was duly done.

The Curative.

SHE looked at him piteously, a sorrowful expression stealing over her face. "Your love is growing cold," she said. The words seemed forced as though within her breast lurked a desire not to tell him. The tears seemed nigh to her eyes. He placed his arm round her waist tenderly. One might think by this act that her words were untrue. He gave her a look of pity, but his eyes spoke his uneasiness. Clearly he was at a loss what to do. But suddenly his eyes lighted up as if by magic. "If you wouldn't mind," he told her, "you might wear my overcoat. I can stand the chilly night air." The moon smiled as, looking at the girl wrapped warmly in the man's coat, he saw that she would not be cold again.

Digitized by Google

A Story of Love and Crime.

By ARNOLD BENNETT.

TWENTY-SECOND CHAPTER.

In the Wine Cellars of the Grand Babylon.

"I DIDN'T trust to mere good fortune. I didn't trust to anything except Rocco, and he deceived me."

"But why did you quarrel with him?"

"I didn't quarrel with him. I found him embalming a dead body in the State bedroom one night——"

"You what?" Babylon almost screamed.

"I found him embalming a dead body in the State bedroom," repeated Racksole in his quietest tones.

The two men gazed at each other, and then Racksole replenished Babylon's glass.

"Tell me," said Babylon, settling himself deep in an easy chair and lighting a cigar.

And Racksole thereupon recounted to him the whole of the Posen episode, with every circumstantial detail so far as he knew it. It was a long and complicated recital, and occupied about an hour. During that time little Félix never spoke a word, scarcely moved a muscle; only his small eyes gazed through the bluish haze of smoke. The clock on the mantelpiece tinkled midnight.

"Time for whisky and soda," said Racksole, and got up as if to ring the bell; but Babylon waved him back.

"You told me that this Sampson Levi had an audience of Prince Eugen to-day, but you have not told me the result of that audience," said Babylon.

"Because I do not yet know it. But I shall doubtless know to-morrow. In the meantime, I feel fairly sure that Levi declined to produce Prince Eugen's required million. I have reason to believe that the money was lent elsewhere."

"H'm!" mused Babylon; and then, carelessly, "I am not at all surprised at that arrangement for spying through the bathroom of the State apartments."

"Why are you not surprised?"

"Oh!" said Babylon, "it is such an obvious dodge—so easy to carry out. As for me, I took special care never to involve myself in these affairs. I knew they existed; I somehow felt that they existed. But I also felt that they lay outside my sphere. My business was to provide board and lodging of the most sumptuous kind for those who didn't mind paying for it; and I did my business. If anything else went on in the hotel, under the rose, I long ago determined to ignore it unless it should happen to be brought before my notice; and it never was brought before my notice. However, I admit that there is a certain pleasurable excitement in this kind of affair, and doubtless you have experienced that."

"I have," said Racksole simply, "though I believe you are laughing at me."

"By no means," Babylon replied. "Now what, if I may ask the question, is going to be your next step?"

"That is just what I desire to know myself," said Theodore Racksole.

"Well," said Babylon, after a pause, "let us begin. In the first place, it is possible you may be interested to hear that I happened to see Jules to-day."

"You did!" Racksole remarked with much calmness. "Where?"

"Well, it was early this morning, in Paris, just before I left there. The meeting was quite accidental, and Jules seemed rather surprised at meeting me. He respectfully inquired where I was going, and I said that I was going to Switzerland. At that moment I thought I was going to Switzerland. It had occurred to me that after all I should be happier there, and that I had better turn back and not see London any more. However, I changed my mind once again, and decided to come on to London, and accept the risks of being miserable there without my hotel. Then I asked Jules whither he was bound, and he told me that he was off to Constantinople, being interested in a new French hotel there. I wished him good luck, and we parted."

"Constantinople, eh!" said Racksole. "A highly suitable place for him, I should say."

"But," Babylon resumed, "I caught sight of him again."

"Where?"

"At Charing Cross, a few minutes before I had the pleasure of meeting you. Mr. Jules had not gone to Constantinople after all. He did not see me, or I should have suggested to him that in going from Paris to Constantinople it is not usual to travel viâ London."

"The cheek of the fellow!" exclaimed Theodore Racksole. "The gorgeous and colossal cheek of the fellow!"

"Do you know anything of the antecedents of this Jules?" he continued, helping himself to whisky.

"Nothing whatever," said Babylon. "Until you told me, I don't think I was aware that his true name was Thomas

Digitized by Google

"Come out, you villain!" Theodore Racksole cried, in low, almost vicious tones.

Jackson, though of course I knew that it was not Jules. I certainly was not aware that Miss Spencer was his wife, but I had long suspected that their relations were somewhat more intimate than the nature of their respective duties in the hotel absolutely demanded. All that I do know of Jules—he will always be called Jules—is that he gradually, by some mysterious personal force, acquired a prominent position in the hotel. Decidedly he was the cleverest and most intellectual waiter I have ever known, and he was specially skilled in the difficult task of retaining his own dignity while not interfering with that of other people. I'm afraid this information is a little too vague to be of any practical assistance in the present difficulty."

"What is the present difficulty?" Racksole queried, with a simple air.

"I should imagine that the present difficulty is to account for the man's presence in London."

"That is easily accounted for," said Racksole.

"How? Do you suppose he is anxious to give himself up to justice, or that the chains of habit bind him to the hotel?"

"Neither," said Racksole. "Jules is going to have another try—that's all."

"Another try at what?"

"At Prince Eugen. Either at his life or his liberty. Most probably the former this time; almost certainly the former. He has guessed that we are somewhat handicapped by our anxiety to keep Prince Eugen's predicament quite quiet, and he is taking advantage of that fact. As he is already fairly rich, on his own admission, the reward which has been offered to him must be enormous, and he is absolutely determined to get it. He has several times recently proved himself to be a daring fellow; unless I am mistaken he will shortly prove himself to be still more daring."

"But what can he do? Surely you don't suggest that he will attempt the life of Prince Eugen in this hotel?"

"Why not? If Reginald Dimmock fell on mere suspicion that he would turn out unfaithful to the conspiracy, why not Prince Eugen?"

"But it would be an unspeakable crime, and do infinite harm to the hotel!"

"True!" Racksole admitted, smiling. Little Félix Babylon seemed to brace himself for the grasping of this monstrous idea.

"How could it possibly be done?" he asked at length.

"Dimmock was poisoned."

"Yes, but you had Rocco here then, and Rocco was in the plot. It is conceivable that Rocco could have managed it—barely conceivable. But without Rocco I cannot think it possible. I cannot even think that Jules would attempt it. You see, in a place like the Grand Babylon, as probably I needn't point out to you, food has to pass through so many hands that to poison one person without killing perhaps fifty would be a most delicate operation. Moreover, Prince Eugen, unless he has changed his habits, is always served by his own attendant, old Hans, and therefore any attempt to tamper with a cooked dish immediately before serving would be hazardous in the extreme."

"Granted," said Racksole. "The wine, however, might be more easily got at. Had you thought of that?"

"I had not," Babylon admitted. "You are an ingenious theorist, but I happen to know that Prince Eugen always has his wine opened in his own presence. No doubt it would be opened by Hans. Therefore the wine theory is not tenable, my friend."

"I do not see why," said Racksole. "I know nothing of wine as an expert, and I very seldom drink it, but it seems to me that a bottle of wine might be tampered with while it was still in the cellar, especially if there was an accomplice in the hotel."

"You think, then, that you are not yet rid of all your conspirators?"

"I think that Jules might still have an accomplice within the building."

"And that a bottle of wine could be opened and recorked without leaving any trace of the operation?" Babylon was a trifle sarcastic.

"I don't see the necessity of opening the bottle in order to poison the wine," said Racksole. "I have never tried to poison anybody by means of a bottle of wine, and I don't lay claim to any natural talent as a poisoner, but I think I could devise several ways of managing the trick. Of course, I admit that I may be entirely mistaken as to Jules' intentions."

"Ah!" said Félix Babylon. "The wine cellars beneath us are one of the wonders of London. I hope you are aware, Mr. Racksole, that when you bought the Grand Babylon you bought what is probably the finest stock of wines in England, if not in Europe. In the valuation I reckoned them at sixty thousand pounds. And I may say that I always took care that the cellars were properly guarded. Even Jules would experience a serious difficulty in breaking into the cellars without the connivance of the wine-clerk, and the wine-clerk is, or was, incorruptible."

Digitized by Google

"I am ashamed to say that I have not yet inspected my wines," smiled Racksole; "I have never given them a thought. Once or twice I have taken the trouble to make a tour of the hotel, but I omitted the cellars in my excursions."

"Impossible, my dear fellow!" said Babylon, amused at such a confession, to him—a great connoisseur and lover of fine wines—almost incredible. "But really you must see them to-morrow. If I may, I will accompany you."

"Why not to-night?" Racksole suggested calmly.

"To-night! It is very late: Hubbard will have gone to bed."

"And may I ask who is Hubbard? I remember the name but dimly."

"Hubbard is the wine-clerk of the Grand Babylon," said Félix, with a certain emphasis. "A sedate man of forty. He has the keys of the cellars. He knows every bottle of every bin, its date, its qualities, its value. And he is a teetotaler. Hubbard is a curiosity. No wine can leave the cellars without his knowledge, and no person can enter the cellars without his knowledge. At least, that is how it was in my time," Babylon added.

"We will wake him," said Racksole.

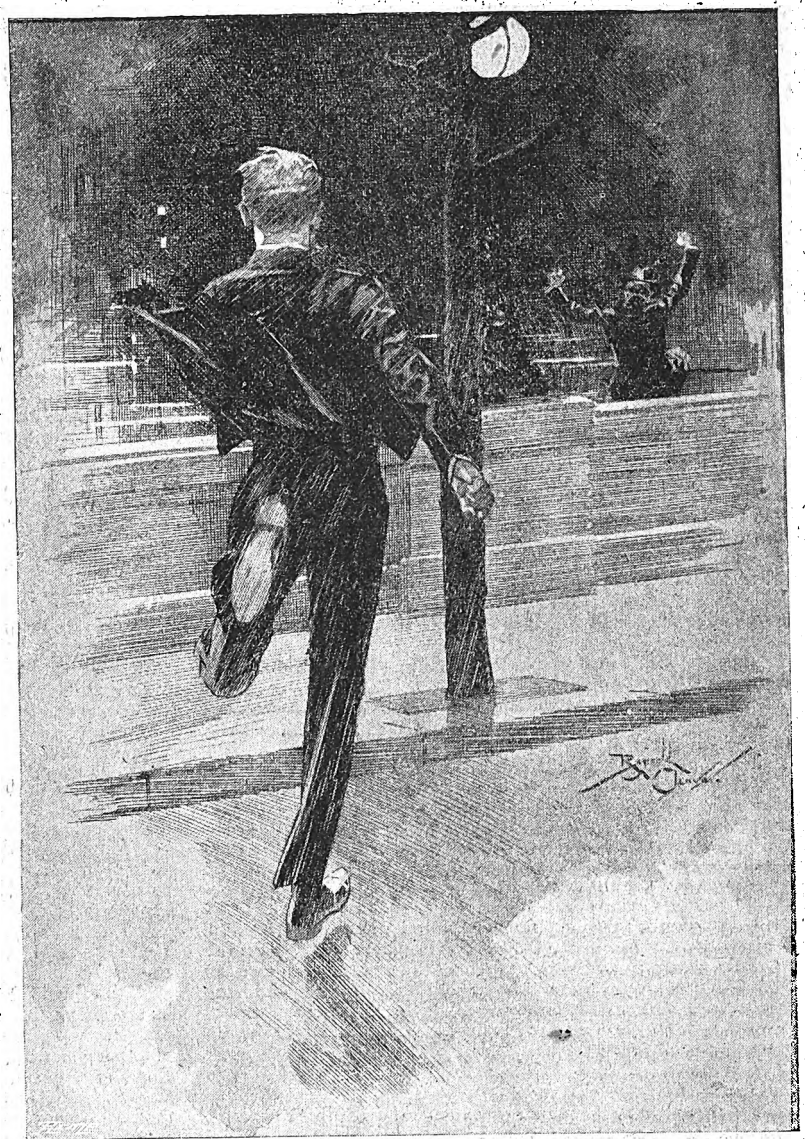
"But it is one o'clock in the morning," Babylon protested.

"Never mind—that is, if you consent to accompany me. The cellar is the same by night as by day. Therefore, why not now?"

Babylon shrugged his shoulders. "As you wish," he agreed, with his indestructible politeness.

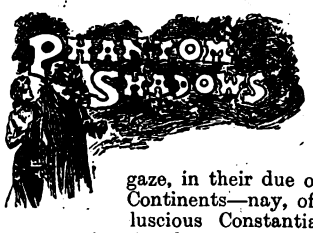
"And now to find this Mr. Hubbard, with his key of the cupboard," said Racksole, as they walked out of the room together. Although the hour was so late, the hotel was not, of course, closed for the night. A few guests still remained about in the public rooms, and a few fatigued waiters were still in attendance. One of these latter was dispatched in search of the singular Mr. Hubbard, and it fortunately turned out that this gentleman had not actually retired, though he was on the point of doing so. He brought the keys to Mr. Racksole in person, and after he had had a little chat with his former master, the proprietor and the ex-proprietor of the Grand Babylon Hotel proceeded on their way to the cellars.

These cellars extend over, or rather, under, quite half the superficial area of the whole hotel—the longitudinal half which lies next to the Strand. Owing to the fact that the ground slopes sharply from the Strand to the river, the Grand Babylon is, so to speak, deeper near the Strand than it is near the Thames. Towards the Thames there are, below the entrance level, a basement and a sub-basement. Towards the Strand there are basement, sub-basement, and the huge wine cellars beneath all. After descending the four flights of the service stairs, and traversing a long passage running parallel with the kitchen, the two found themselves opposite a door, which, on being unlocked, gave access to another flight of stairs. At the foot of this was the main entrance to the cellars. Outside the entrance was the wine-lift, for the ascension of delicious fluids to the upper floor and, opposite, Mr. Hubbard's little office. There was electric light everywhere. Babylon, who, as being most accustomed to them, held the bunch of keys, opened the great door, and then they were in the first cellar—the first of a suite of five. Racksole was struck not only by the icy coolness of the place, but also by its vastness. Babylon had seized a portable electric hand-light, attached to a long wire, which lay handy, and, waving it about, disclosed the dimensions of the place. By that flashing illumination the subterranean chamber looked unutterably weird and mysterious, with its rows of numbered bins, stretching away into the distance till the radiance was reduced to the occasional far gleam of the light on the shoulder of a bottle. Then Babylon switched on the fixed electric lights, and Theodore Racksole entered upon a personally-conducted tour of what was quite the most interesting part of his own property.



Racksole followed Jules in hot pursuit, but the latter jumped clean over the Embankment wall into the river.

Digitized by Google



To see the innocent enthusiasm of Félix Babylon for these stores of exhilarating liquid was what is called in the North "a sight for sair een." He displayed to Racksole's bewildered gaze, in their due order, all the wines of three Continents—nay, of four, for the superb and luscious Constantia wine of Cape Colony was not wanting in that most catholic collection of vintages. Beginning with the unsurpassed products of Burgundy, he continued with the clarets of Médoc, Bordeaux, and Sauterne; then to the champagnes of Ay, Hautvilliers, and Pierry; then to the hocks and moselles of Germany, and the brilliant imitation champagnes of Main, Necker, and Naumberg; then to the famous and adorable Tokay of Hungary, and all the Austrian varieties of French wines, including Carlowitz and Somlauer; then to the dry sherries of Spain, including purest Manzanilla, and Amontillado, and Vino de Pasto; then to the wines of Malaga, both sweet and dry, and all the "Spanish reds" from Catalonia, including the dark "Tent" so often used sacramentally; then to the renowned port of Oporto. Then he proceeded to the Italian cellar, and descanted upon the excellence of Barolo from Piedmont, of Chianti from Tuscany, of Orvieto from the Roman States, of the "Tears of Christ" from Naples, and the commoner Marsala from Sicily. And so on, to an extent and with a fulness of detail which cannot be rendered here.

At the end of the suite of cellars there was a glazed door, which, as could be seen, gave access to a supplemental and smaller cellar, an apartment about fifteen or sixteen feet square.

"Anything special in there?" asked Racksole curiously, as they stood before the door, and looked within at the serried ends of bottles.

"Ah!" exclaimed Babylon, almost smacking his lips, "therein lies the cream of all."

"The best champagne, I suppose?" said Racksole.

"Yes," said Babylon, "the best champagne is there—a very special Sillery, as exquisite as you will find anywhere. But I see, my friend, that you fall into the common error of putting champagne first among wines. That distinction belongs to Burgundy. You have old Burgundy in that cellar, Mr. Racksole, which cost me—how much do you think?—eighty pounds a bottle. Probably it will never be drunk," he added, with a sigh. "It is too expensive even for princes and plutocrats."

"Yes, it will," said Racksole quickly. "You and I will have a bottle up to-morrow."

"Then," continued Babylon, still riding his hobby-horse, "there is a sample of the Rhine wine dated 1706 which caused such a sensation at the Vienna Exhibition of 1873. There is also a singularly glorious Persian wine from Shiraz, the like of which I have never seen elsewhere. Also there is an unrivalled vintage of Romanée-Conti, greatest of all modern Burgundies. If I remember right, Prince Eugen invariably has a bottle when he comes to stay here. It is not on the hotel wine list, of course, and only a few customers know of it. We do not precisely hawk it about the dining-room."

"Indeed!" said Racksole. "Let us go inside."

They entered the stone apartment, rendered almost sacred by the preciousness of its contents, and Racksole looked round with a strangely intent and curious air. At the far side was a grating, through which came a feeble light.

"What is that?" asked the millionaire sharply.

"That is merely a ventilation grating. Good ventilation is absolutely essential."

"Looks broken, doesn't it?" Racksole suggested, and then, putting a finger quickly on Babylon's shoulder, "there's someone in the cellar. Can't you hear breathing, down there, behind that bin?"

The two men stood tense and silent for a while, listening under the ray of the single electric light in the ceiling. Half the cellar was involved in gloom. At length Racksole walked firmly down the central passage-way between the bins and turned to the corner at the right.

"Come out, you villain!" he said, in a low, well-nigh vicious tone, and dragged up a cowering figure.

He had expected to find a man, but it was his own daughter, Nella Racksole, upon whom he had laid angry hands.

TWENTY-THIRD CHAPTER.
Further Events in the Cellar.

"WELL, father," Nella greeted her astounded parent. "You should make sure that you have got hold of the right person before you use all that terrible muscular force of yours. I do believe you have broken my shoulder-bone." She rubbed her shoulder with a comical expression of pain, and then stood up before the two men. The skirt of her dark grey dress was torn and dirty, and the usually trim Nella looked as though she had been shot down a canvas fire-escape. Mechanically she smoothed her frock, and gave a straightening touch to her hair.

"Good evening, Miss Racksole," said Félix Babylon, bowing formally. "This is an unexpected pleasure." Félix's drawing-room manners never deserted him upon any occasion whatever.

"May I inquire what you are doing in my wine cellar, Nella Racksole?" said the millionaire, a little stiffly. He was certainly somewhat annoyed at having mistaken his daughter for a criminal; moreover, he hated to be surprised, and upon this occasion he had been surprised beyond any ordinary surprise; lastly, he was not at all pleased that Nella should be observed in that strange predicament by a stranger.

"I will tell you," said Nella. "I had been reading rather late in my room—the night was so close. I heard Big Ben strike half-past twelve, and then I put the book down, and went out on to the balcony of my window for a little fresh air before going to bed. I leant over the balcony very quietly—you will remember that I am on the third floor now—and looked down below into the little sunk yard which separates the wall of the hotel from Salisbury Lane. I was rather astonished to see a figure creeping across the yard. I know there was no entrance into the hotel from that yard, and, besides, it is fifteen or twenty feet below the level of the street. So I watched. The figure went close up against the wall, and disappeared from my view. I leant over the balcony as far as I dared, but I couldn't see him. I could hear him, however."

"What could you hear?" questioned Racksole sharply.

"It sounded like a sawing noise," said Nella; "and it went on for quite a long time—nearly a quarter of an hour, I should think—a rasping sort of noise."

"Why on earth didn't you come and warn me or someone else in the hotel?" asked Racksole.

"Oh, I don't know, dad," she replied sweetly. "I had got interested in it, and I thought I would see it out myself. Well, as I was saying, Mr. Babylon," she continued, addressing her remarks now to Félix, with a dazzling smile, "that noise went on for quite a long time. At last it stopped, and the figure re-appeared from under the wall, crossed the yard, climbed up the opposite wall by some means or other, and so over the railings into Salisbury Lane. I felt rather relieved then, because I knew he hadn't actually broken into the hotel. He walked down Salisbury Lane very slowly. A policeman was just coming up. 'Good-night, officer,' I heard him say to the policeman, and he asked him for a match. The policeman supplied the match, and the other man lighted a cigarette, and proceeded further down the lane. By cricking your neck from my window, Mr. Babylon, you can get a glimpse of the Embankment and the river. I saw the man cross the Embankment, and lean over the river wall, where he seemed to be talking to someone. He then walked along the Embankment to Westminster, and that was the last I saw of him. I waited a minute or two for him to come back, but he didn't come back, and so I thought it was about time I began to make inquiries into the affair. I went downstairs instantly, and out of the hotel, through the quadrangle, into Salisbury Lane, and I looked over those railings. There was a ladder on the other side, by which it was perfectly easy—once you had got over the railings—to climb down into the yard. I was horribly afraid lest someone might walk up Salisbury Lane and catch me in the act of negotiating those railings, but no one did, and I surmounted them, with no worse damage than a torn skirt. I crossed the yard on tiptoe, and I found that, in the wall, close to the ground, and almost exactly under my window, there was an iron grating, about one foot by fourteen inches. I suspected, as there was no other ironwork near, that the mysterious visitor must have been sawing at this grating for private purposes of his own. I gave it a good shake, and I was not at all surprised that a good part of it came off in my hand, leaving just enough room for a person to creep through. I decided that I would creep through, and now wish I hadn't. I don't know, Mr. Babylon, whether you have ever tried to creep through a small hole with a skirt on. Have you ?"

Digitized by Google

"I have not had that pleasure," said little Félix, bowing again, and absently taking up a bottle which lay to his hand.

"Well, you are fortunate," the imperturbable Nella resumed. "For quite three minutes I thought I should perish in that grating, dad, with my shoulder inside and the rest of me outside. However, at last, by the most amazing and agonising efforts, I pulled myself through, and fell into this extraordinary cellar more dead than alive. Then I wondered what I should do next. Should I wait for the mysterious visitor to return, and stab him with my pocket scissors if he tried to enter, or should I raise an alarm ? First of all I replaced the broken grating, then I struck a match, and saw that I had got landed in a wilderness of bottles. The match went out, and I hadn't another one. So I sat down in the corner to think. I had just decided to wait and see if the visitor returned, when I heard footsteps, and then voices, and then you came in. I must say I was rather taken aback, especially as I recognised the voice of Mr. Babylon. You see, I didn't want to frighten you. If I had bobbed up from behind the bottles and said 'Booh !' you would have had a serious shock. I wanted to think of a way of breaking my presence gently to you. But you saved me the trouble, dad. Was I really breathing so loudly that you could hear me ?"

The girl ended her strange recital, and there was a moment's silence in the cellar. Racksole merely nodded an affirmative to her concluding question.

"Well, Nell, my girl," said the millionaire at length, "we are much obliged for your gymnastic efforts—very much obliged. But now I think you had batter go off to bed. There is going to be some serious trouble here, I'll lay my last dollar on that !"

"But if there is to be a burglary I should so like to see it, dad," Nella pleaded. "I've never seen a burglar caught red-handed."

"This isn't a burglary, my dear. I calculate it's something far worse than a burglary."

"What ?" she cried. "Murder ? Arson ? Dynamite plot ? How perfectly splendid !"

"Mr. Babylon informs me that Jules is in London," said Racksole quietly.

"Jules !" she exclaimed under her breath, and her tone changed instantly to the utmost seriousness. "Switch off the light, quick !" Springing to the switch, she put the cellar in darkness.

"What's that for ?" said her father.

"If he comes back he would see the light and be frightened away," said Nella. "That wouldn't do at all."

"It wouldn't, Miss Racksole," said Babylon, and there was in his voice a note of admiration for the girl's sagacity.

"Listen, Nella," said the latter, drawing his daughter to him in the profound gloom of the cellar. "We fancy that Jules may be trying to tamper with a certain bottle of wine—a bottle

(Continued on page 670.)

St. Paul's Dome Points the Way.

Some things in this world, even though the purpose in creating or constructing them may have been more or less selfish, appear to be ordained to do good in some way to the people at large. Thus, St. Paul's Cathedral was built simply as a place of worship, yet it is a sort of hub to the great wheel of London; a monument whereby to identify and locate the city. For many miles outside of London you can see the great dome of St. Paul's swelling up in the air; and you have only to say to the inquiring stranger who is seeking the centre of the largest city in the world, "You see the dome of the Cathedral ? Yes. Well, make straight for it, and it will lead you into the heart of London."

Oblige me now by reading these sentences, taken from a letter written by Mrs. Mary Northey, of 20 Hull Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on June 2nd, 1897, and the little talk that follows it, and you will understand the point of the chat about the dome of St. Paul's :—

"In September of 1896 my health began to fail me. I felt low, weak, and tired. My appetite was poor, and after eating I had a nagging pain at the chest through to my back. I had a doctor attending me and I saw two other doctors, and went to the Newcastle Infirmary, where they wanted to operate on me, but I refused to let them do it. Nothing gave me relief. One doctor said that my stomach was ulcerated, and gave me up, saying he could do no more for me. I had a nurse attending me, being very weak. I gave up hopes of getting better, when in November (1896) I read in a book of cases like mine that were cured by Mother Seigel's Syrup. I got a bottle of it, and after taking it I felt that it was doing me good. I persevered with it, and soon gained strength and gradually regained good health, all the pain leaving me."

Mrs. Northey now lives at 13 Hull Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne, and on February 15th, 1904, she signed another statement in which she says :—"Some six or seven years ago I had occasion to write to you of the wonderful cure effected in me by Mother Seigel's Syrup. Since then I have continued in excellent health, and am now as well and strong as a woman could wish to be. When I began taking Mother Seigel's Syrup I had almost given up hope of relief. I could eat no solid food, and I became so weak that I had to take to bed, and I had been there four months when I finally tried Mother Seigel's Syrup. Soon I was on the high road to health again, and I have never had a day's illness since. Mother Seigel's Syrup saved my life, and I shall always recommend it when I can."

The little book Mrs. Northey read in bed served, in her distress, the same purpose that St. Paul's dome does to the wayfarer seeking London—it "pointed the way," and by following its directions she regained health and strength and happiness rapidly, and at little or no expense. Take a leaf of wisdom from her book of experience; let her point the way for you.

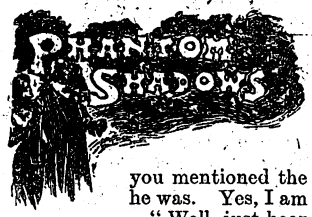
A SPRING TONIC

Helps to purify the blood and cleanse the system; makes you strong and "fit" for the labours, and pleasures, of the coming summer. "I had a good appetite, and ate plenty of nourishing food; yet I grew thinner and weaker all the time," says Mrs. Martha Beverley, of 154, Abingdon Road, Middlesboro'. "I had pains in my stomach after eating; my nights were sleepless. Four years ago I was cured by using Mother Seigel's Syrup, in six months, after suffering for 20 years."

MOTHER SEIGEL'S SYRUP.

Price 1/1½ and 2/6 per Bottle.

Digitized by Google



which might possibly be drunk by Prince Eugen. Now, do you think that the man you saw might have been Jules?"

"I hadn't previously thought of him as being Jules, but immediately you mentioned the name I somehow knew that he was. Yes, I am sure it was Jules."

"Well, just hear what I have to say. There is no time to lose. If he is coming at all he will be here very soon—and you can help." Racksole explained what he thought Jules' tactics might be. He proposed that if the man returned he should not be interfered with, but merely watched from the other side of the glass door.

"You want, as it were, to catch Mr. Jules alive?" said Babylon, who seemed rather taken aback at this novel method of dealing with criminals. "Surely," he added, "it would be simpler and easier to inform the police of your suspicion, and to leave everything to them?"

"My dear fellow," said Racksole, "we have already gone much too far without the police to make it advisable for us to call them in at this somewhat advanced stage of the proceedings. Besides, if you must know it, I have a particular desire to capture the scoundrel myself. I will leave you and Nella here, since Nella insists on seeing everything, and I will arrange things so that once he has entered the cellar Jules will not get out of it again—at any rate through the grating. You had better place yourselves on the other side of the glass door, in the big cellar; you will be in a position to observe from there. I will skip off at once. All you have to do is to take note of what the fellow does. If he has any accomplices within the hotel we shall probably be able by that means to discover who the accomplice is."

Lighting a match and shading it with his hands, Racksole showed them both out of the little cellar. "Now, if you lock this glass door on the outside he can't escape this way; the panes of glass are too small and the woodwork too stout. So, if he comes into the trap, you two will have the pleasure of actually seeing him frantically writhe therein, without any personal danger; but perhaps you'd better not show yourselves."

In another moment Félix Babylon and Nella were left to themselves in the darkness of the cellar, listening to the receding footfalls of Theodore Racksole. But the sound of these footfalls had not died away before another sound greeted their ears—the grating of the small cellar was being removed.

"I hope your father will be in time," whispered Félix.

"Hush!" the girl warned him, and they stooped side by side in tense silence.

A man cautiously but very neatly wormed his body through the aperture of the grating. The watchers could only see his form indistinctly in the darkness. Then, being fairly within the cellar, he walked without the least hesitation to the electric switch and turned on the light. It was unmistakably Jules, and he knew the geography of the cellar very well. Babylon could with difficulty repress a start as he saw this bold and unscrupulous ex-waiter moving with such an air of assurance and determination about the precious cellar. Jules went directly to a small bin which was numbered 17, and took therefrom the topmost bottle.

"The Romanée-Conti—Prince Eugen's wine!" Babylon exclaimed under his breath.

Jules neatly and quickly removed the seal with an instrument which he had clearly brought for the purpose. He then took a little flat box from his pocket, which seemed to contain a sort of black salve. Rubbing his finger in this, he smeared the top of the neck of the bottle with it, just where the cork came against the glass. In another instant he had deftly replaced the seal and restored the bottle to its position. He then turned off the light, and made for the aperture. When he was half-way through Nella exclaimed, "He will escape after all. Dad has not had time—we must stop him."

But Babylon, that embodiment of caution, forcibly, but nevertheless politely, restrained this Yankee girl, whom he deemed so rash and imprudent, and before she could free herself the lithe form of Jules had disappeared.

As regards Theodore Racksole, who was to have caught his man from the outside of the cellar, he made his way as rapidly as possible from the wine-cellars up to the ground-floor, out of the hotel by the quadrangle, through the quadrangle, and out into the top of Salisbury Lane. Now, owing to the vastness of the structure of the Grand Babylon, the mere distance thus to be traversed amounted to a little short of a quarter of a mile, and, as it included a number of stairs, about two dozen turnings, and several passages which at that time of night were in darkness more or less complete, Racksole could not have been expected to accomplish the journey in less than five minutes. As everybody knows, there is a sharp, short bend in Salisbury Lane near the top. Racksole ran round this at good racing speed, but he was unfortunate enough to run straight up against a policeman.

"Hullo!" he said, his naturally suspicious nature being doubtless aroused by the spectacle of a bareheaded man in evening-dress running violently down the lane. "What's this? Where are you orf in such a hurry?" and he forcibly detained Theodore Racksole for a moment and scrutinised his face.

"Now, officer," said Racksole quietly, "none of your larks, if you please. I've no time to lose."

"Beg your pardon, sir," the policeman remarked, though hesitatingly and not quite with good temper, and Racksole was allowed to proceed on his way. The millionaire's scheme for trapping Jules was to get down into the little sunk yard by means of the ladder, and then to secrete himself behind some convenient abutment of brickwork until Mr. Tom Jackson should have got into the cellar. He therefore nimbly surmounted the railings—the railings of his own hotel—and was gingerly descending the ladder, when lo! a rough hand seized him by the coat-collar, and, with a ferocious jerk, urged him backwards. The fact was, Theodore Racksole had counted without the policeman. That guardian of the peace, mistrusting Racksole's manner, had quietly followed him down the lane. The sight of the millionaire climbing the railings had put him on his mettle, and the result was the ignominious capture of Racksole. In vain Theodore expostulated, explained, anathematised. Only one thing would satisfy the stolid policeman—namely, that Racksole should return with him to the hotel and there establish his identity. If Racksole then proved to be Racksole, owner of the Grand Babylon, well and good—the policeman promised to apologise. So Theodore had no alternative but to accept the suggestion. To prove his identity was, of course, the work of only a few minutes, after which Racksole, annoyed, but cool as ever, returned to his railings.

In the meantime, our friend Jules, sublimely unconscious of the altercation going on outside, and of the special risk which he ran, was, of course, actually in the cellar, which he had reached before Racksole got to the railings for the first time. It was, indeed, a happy chance for Jules that his exit from the cellar coincided with the period during which Racksole was absent from the railings. As Racksole came down the lane for the second time, he saw a figure walking about fifty yards in front of him towards the Embankment. Instantly he divined that it was Jules, and that the policeman had thrown him just too late. He ran, and Jules, hearing the noise of pursuit, ran also. The ex-waiter was fleet; he made direct for a certain spot in the Embankment wall, and, to the intense astonishment of Racksole, jumped clean over the wall, as it seemed, into the river. "Is he so desperate as to commit suicide?" Racksole exclaimed as he ran, but a second later the puff and snort of a steam launch told him that Jules was not quite driven to suicide. As the millionaire crossed the Embankment roadway he saw the funnel of the launch move out from under the river wall. It swerved into midstream and headed towards London Bridge. There was a silent mist over the river. Racksole was helpless.

(Another long instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

MISCELLANEOUS ADVERTISEMENTS.

Will be inserted in this column at the rate of 6d. per line of 8 words or part thereof. All advertisements should be addressed to Advertisement Manager, "Short Stories," 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., 11 days prior to date of appearance.

Tents, Marquees!—40 feet from 24s. 9d. Particulars free.—Brennan, Water Lane, Tower Street, London.

Teeth Bought, Gold and Platinum. Banker's reference.—Apply, Teeth by Instalments Institute, 48 Edgware Road, W.

Lace Curtains.—Maker's Stock; thousands of pairs; beautiful designs; buy at 25 per cent. below shops; catalogue free.—Milner's, 28 Hyde Park, Leeds.

Dentofyxoline Powder.—Invaluable to wearers of artificial teeth. Old and loose plates made tight and safe by its use; tasteless and harmless, 1/- post free.—Trevor, 13 Union Street, Coventry.

"Walking," by C. Lang Neil, is a thoroughly practical guide to pedestrianism, contains information as to how to train in order to become an expert walker, &c. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (W. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Small Gardens, and How to Make the Most of Them," by Violet Biddle, is just the book for those desirous of procuring the best possible results from their gardens. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (S. G. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Cricket," Edited by G. L. Jessop, contains practical instructions as to how to play the game by K. S. Ranjitsinhji, C. B. Fry, G. L. Jessop, and others. Price 1/2, post free, from the Publisher (C. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Photography.—"How to Take and Fake Photographs," by Clive Holland, contains all information required by the beginner. Price 1/2, post free, from the Publisher (P. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Gramophone Machines and Records.—A Large Stock. 12,000 Records to select from. Call and hear the latest. Any record sent post free by return. Machines repaired, missing parts supplied. Lowest terms. Catalogues free.—J. Turner & Co., 9 City Road, London, E.C.

Bicycle, Free Wheel, 2 Brakes, Plated Rims, £5. New last month.—1075 Chester Road, Stretford, Manchester.

Guinea Fountain Pen, 5/6.—Harvey, 56 Roman Road, Colchester.

Free Gifts of £5.—£10 10s. Cycle for £5 10s. Particulars free.—Headland, 17 Mentone Street, Leeds.

Visiting Cards.—100 Dainty Ivory Visiting Cards (Name and Address), in solid Leather Case, 1/6; Cards only, 1/-. O'Neill, 60 Bull Street, Birmingham.

Face Leathers, superfine quality, 1/- post free, in box.—K. Henre-Frances, Brixton Road, London.

Old Artificial Teeth Bought.—Call or forward by post; full value per return, or offer made.—Messrs. O. Browning, Manufacturing Dentists, 143 Oxford Street, London. (Established 100 years.)

Field Glasses.—Extremely fine pair Regulation Glasses (Army pattern) very long (30 mile) range, purchased for officer's use in Transvaal, not now required; leather case and strap; worth 75/-; will sacrifice for 17/6; approval before payment proof of genuineness.—F. Barker (Quartermaster), "Durdans," Brixton, S.W.

Baldness Cured. Free Trial.—A French Specialist who has devoted his life to the study of Hair Diseases, having cured thousands of almost hopeless cases, will send a genuine inexpensive treatment to all who write enclosing 2 stamps. New Hair grows in 4 to 10 days.—K. Henri-Francis, Brixton Road London.

Jewellery and Tableware Repaired, Regilt, Replated equal to new. Price list free; old Gold and Silver Bought.—Leopard Silver Company, Summerfield Crescent, Birmingham.

"Swimming," by Montague Holbein, the celebrated Channel Swimmer, is a splendid book for those who wish to become good swimmers. Price 1/2 from the Publisher (S. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Eczema and all Skin Eruptions.—A victim who was cured after 5 years' suffering will gladly send full particulars of an inexpensive guaranteed Cure on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Address: F. M. Pacderma, 3 Swallow Street, Piccadilly, London.

Lady's Dress Ring, Florida Rubies & Diamonds, 18-carat gold (stamped) filled, 3/-. Approval before payment.—C. D. J., 41a Coventry House, South Place, London, E.C.

Art.—Work at home, tinting prints, post-cards, etc.; easily acquired; good prices. Addressed envelope, Art Company, 6 G. James Street, London, W.C.

Records.—Any Gramophone, Columbia, Nicole, Pathe, Odeon, Edison or Edison Bell Record sent carriage paid within two hours of order received. Our premises being within easy reach of above wholesale houses we are able to obtain at very short notice any record not in our stock. Send trial order so that we can prove what we say. Special attention given to colonial orders.—Catalogues free.—J. Turner & Co., 9 City Road, London, E.C.

From 6/- Monthly. Special Offer. 500 New Cycles £3 10s. 500 Genuine B.S.A. £6 10s. Sample Victory Motor Cycle £26. Sent carr. paid before payment. Agents Wanted

£8 10 Dereham Rd. Cycle Co., Norwich

Ask your grocer for

EPPS'S

(The most nutritious)

COCOA

And take no other.

RIDER AGENTS WANTED

One in each district to ride and exhibit a sample 1904 Cycle. Highest grade fully warranted

BRITISH MADE CYCLES

LATEST MODELS £2-10 to £6

New Departure Coaster Hubs, Best Makes Tyres, and best British made equipment throughout.

200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES all makes, good as new, £1 to £2-10

Great factory clearing sale at half factory prices. We send on approval and allow Ten Days' Free Trial on every cycle. Money with carriage charges refunded without question if you are not satisfied.

EARN A CYCLE taking orders from sample machine furnished by us. Our agents are making large profits. Write at once for free catalogues and our special offer. Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonos, half prices.

MEAD CYCLE CO. Dept. 44a, 85-97, Paradise Street, Liverpool, 19, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

TELL COOK

KEATING'S POWDER

KILLS BLACK BEETLES

This Only 3d. 6d. & 1s.

FREEMAN'S

TRADE MARK

THE ORIGINAL & ONLY TRUE

CHLORODYNE

Best Remedy for Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 6s., or postage free by the INVENTOR, R. FREEMAN, 70 KENNINGTON PARK ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

RECOMMENDED BY MEDICAL MEN.

N.B.—Lord Chancellor Selborne, Lord Justices James and Mellish, decided in favour of Freeman's Original Chlorodyne, and against Browne & Davenport, compelling them to pay all costs. —"Times," 24-7-73.

Page

These famous Pills will give you the appetite to enjoy your food and the ability to digest it, and put you in the very "pink" of condition.

Woodcock's

There is no other remedy so safe, sure, and speedy for the cure of Wind on the Stomach, Indigestion, Biliousness, Loss of Appetite, Flatulence, Heartburn, Headache, Languor, Depression, etc. Sold by all Medicine Vendors at 1/1½ & 2/9

Pills

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST

FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN

Rustless Roman Rims & Hubs.

Complete with All Fittings and Carriage Paid.

CASH OR 12 MONTHLY PAYMENTS of

£8 0 0 „ 15/- ea.
8 8 0 „ 15/10 „
9 0 0 „ 16/8 „
9 10 0 „ 17/6 „

LISTS POST FREE

JUNO Motor Cycles, 3 H.P., £34, or Monthly Payments.

JUNO Two-Speed Gear Cycles £12 12s., or 12 Payments of 23/4 each. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories; over 130 pages and Hundreds of Illustrations, sent post free.

Metropolitan Machinists' Co. Ltd., S.S. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C.; and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

Icilma.

ICILMA Natural Water, Soap, and Cream can alone give a clear, healthy, complexion, proof against hard water, sun, wind, smoke, or dust. ICILMA vitalises the skin and preserves it from blackheads and irritations. Cooling and refreshing. Cures immediately nettlerash, mosquito, and insect bites. (Samples Soap and Cream, 2d.) Icilma (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

A Good Cycle

At a FAIR price is cheaper than a poor Cycle at any price. Buy the best and avoid risks.

"CENTAURS," "COVENTRY CHALLENGE," "HUMBERS," "PREMIERS," "ROVERS," "SWIFTS," "SINGERS," &c. Their names guarantee their quality.

FROM 8/- MONTHLY.

WITHIN YOUR REACH

A HIGH-GRADE COVENTRY CYCLE FOR £6

On approval. Two Years' Warranty. Write for Lists (Free).

EDWARD O'BRIEN Ltd. (Dept. S3), World's Largest Cycle Dealers, COVENTRY.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A Case for Waiting.

"ELDRED" is just beginning to keep company with a young lady. He feels he would like to ask her to become more to him than a friend, but he is only twenty-one, and though he is in a permanent situation, he is not yet making enough money to ask her to be his wife. Should he, in the circumstances, propose, or wait until he is better off?

* * * * *

As you have only just met the young lady, and do not seem to have got beyond the friendship stage, it would be unwise in any case to commit yourself to a proposal until you know each other better. It is all very well for a young man in such a position as yourself to become engaged to a girl, if he and she are really deeply in love, and determined to be faithful to each other, but it is not wise for a young couple to tie themselves to an engagement in the absence of any such constant devotion. Certainly wait a while, before you propose anything, in the meantime taking every opportunity to improve your intimacy with her.

Wedding Points.

"PATER." It is not compulsory for you to provide the carriages for all the guests at your daughter's wedding. You provide the bridal carriage, of course, and those for your own party. The friends and relations of the bridegroom generally provide their own, and the happy man himself rides in a vehicle hired for himself by the best man, with whom he travels to the church. As to the other point you mention, no doubt the bride herself knows all about it. However, it is usual for her to retain her bridal costume during the breakfast, and while the compliments are being passed. After that, she steals away, and changes her dress. It is very unusual for a girl to travel in her bridal costume, unless it is properly covered by a travelling cloak. Nowadays, people do not go in for advertising the fact that they are newly-married to all and sundry, but like to get rid of wedding clothes and attributes directly the ceremony is over.

An Introduction Problem.

"PHIL" is acquainted with a young lady, who lives in a different district. Recently, the lady came to stay in the same neighbourhood as "PHIL'S" home. "PHIL" naturally wanted to introduce her to his parents and family. Would it be etiquette for "PHIL" to ask her himself to call at the house, or how could the introduction have been arranged?

* * * * *

It would have been better if you had managed to meet the lady while walking in the street with your mother, or one of the family. You could then have introduced her, and your mother would have said: "We shall be very glad to see you if you can come to tea." That would save the awkwardness of your asking her yourself to make the call.

Be Perfectly Open.

"UNDECIDED" is a young lady who was engaged two years ago, but having broken it off, is now engaged to another young man. She wishes to know if she should tell her present fiancé of her former engagement. I should advise "Undecided" to do so, because if she does not he is almost sure to hear of it sooner or later from somebody else. To be perfectly open with those we love is the only way to insure a happy life with them.

Coolness.

I CANNOT offer you much advice, "N. B. H." You evidently failed to keep an appointment with the young man who had been so attentive to you, and he took offence because you gave no reason for failing him. Since this, he has been cool towards you, and has refused to give you an explanation. Well, that seems a very likely thing to happen. Young men, just beginning to be interested in a girl, are very sensitive to anything which resembles a slight, and their wounded feelings are difficult to heal. As, however, you say he is anxious to meet you again, though he refuses to give you an explanation of his coolness, you must decide for yourself whether or not your fondness for him is such as to warrant your forgiving his silence. Personally, I think it would be better for you to agree not to ask him to give a reason. It is never well for love to reopen old sores, after they have once healed.

When Not to Propose.

"M. E." If the young lady does not seem at all in love with you, it would not be very wise to propose marriage to her. However, a young man can declare his love for a girl, without committing himself to a proposal. I believe in declarations of love, as, though the girl may be cool, it turns her thoughts to the possibility of her getting to love the man, and when a girl's thoughts are once turned that way, a happy result may often be expected. So I advise you to declare your love, and abide by the result. Will "ANXIOUS" take this advice also in his own case, as he and "M. E." seem to be in exactly the same position.

Girl, Man, and a Cab.

"I TRAVELLED some distance in the train with a strange gentleman," writes "CISSIE," "whose looks rather suggested that he would like to know me. However, he did not speak to me. It was a very wet night, and on arriving at the station we were both going to, we found there was only one cab to be had, which both of us required. The young man came up and spoke to me. 'I hope,' he said, 'that you will take the cab. I will walk.' I accepted his kind offer. What I want to know is: Ought I to have asked him to share the cab? Secondly, do I know that young man if he should bow when next we meet?"

* * * * *

An awkward position, "CISSIE." Personally, I don't think there would have been much harm in your sharing the cab under the circumstances, if it was very wet, and the walk a long one. But though some young ladies might safely have done this in the case of certain young men, in other cases it would have been wrong. A girl well able to look after herself might agree to such a thing in the case of a man who had the appearance of respectability. You, however, took the more becoming course, though under some circumstances you might have acted differently. Of course, you don't know the young man when you next meet, and I don't suppose he would be so forward as to bow to you. But one has heard of romances beginning in the way you mention, and very pretty ones, too.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildin, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

All Intelligent People Read

The Rapid Review

There's a New Number Just Out.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

TOWLE'S PILLS

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

Of all Chemists, or Post Free for P.O. only for 1/3, 2/10, and 4/7 from the Sole Proprietors:

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Mfging. Chemists, NOTTS.

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

2/6 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD.

Our warranted Timekeeper, with guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent, post free, to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/6 and four stamps extra for postage. During this month we give absolutely free a Mexican Silver Watch Chain. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.

GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS, 89 Pimlico Road, London, S.W.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED).

Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil, invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1/4; 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mrs, CONYERS, Chagford, R.S.O., Devon.

DAILY EXPRESS

ONE HALFPENNY.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

PILES

CAUSE AND CURE.

COLD and damp, liver disorder and constipation. These are the causes of piles. A chill on the liver obstructs the blood circulation of that organ, the veins of the lower bowel become congested, and piles occur. Constipation has precisely the same effect. When Bile Beans are taken the congestion in the liver is removed, the organ proceeds with the secretion of bile, and as this is the natural aperient of the body, constipation is soon removed once the bile flow is regulated. It is in this simple manner that Bile Beans cure piles. Better than all local applications—which only deal with the matter superficially—Bile Beans strike at the root cause of the trouble. Hence their cures are permanent.

"My daughter purchased a box of Bile Beans."

"I should not have been alive now had it not been for Bile Beans for Biliousness," said Mrs. Sophia Hickin, of 52 Addison Road, King's Heath, to the reporter of the Birmingham Sunday Echo.

"I am sixty-eight years of age, and for over thirty years I suffered from bleeding piles; my suffering, especially in later years, being more terrible than I can describe. My doctors failed to rid me of the complaint. I gradually became so very weak I could not ascend a flight of stairs without assistance. My daughter purchased a box of Bile Beans, and persuaded me to try them. After the first few doses I felt so much relief I continued taking them regularly. They have long since completely cured me, and my health in every way has benefited."

FREE SAMPLE COUPON.

For Free Sample Box of Bile Beans send this coupon, your name and address, and penny stamp to Bile Bean Co., Leeds.
SHORT STORIES, 21/5/04.

Bile Beans for Biliousness

are the safest family medicine, and a certain cure for Headache, Constipation, Piles, Pimples, Blood Impurities, Skin Eruptions, Spring Ailments, and all Change of Season Ailments, Bad Breath, Indigestion, Flatulence, Loss of Appetite, Sleeplessness, Dizziness, Buzzing in the Head, Debility, Nervousness, Anæmia, and all Female Ailments. Of all Medicine Vendors, or post free from the Bile Bean Co., Redcross Street, London, E.C., on receipt of price, 1/1½d., or large family size, 2/9 (2/9 size contains three times 1/1½).

Bile Beans FOR Biliousness

MEDICAL ADVICE FREE

SUFFERER! Are you in doubt as to whether Bile Beans are suitable for your case? If so, send us full particulars of your symptoms, age, and sex. Your application will be carefully considered, replied to, and kept strictly private by our fully-qualified medical staff. Mark envelope "Private," and address BILE BEAN CO., LEEDS.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 804. Week Ending May 28, 1904. Price One Penny.

The hand of Muriel Chalmers was at stake! From her hiding-place she saw the man she despised draw the ace of hearts swiftly from his sleeve.

An Exciting Incident in the Dramatic Story, "Playing With Hearts." See inside.

Digitized by Google

LAST FEW WEEKS.

Entries must be sent in by June 30 for the . . GRAND . .

Kodak Amateur Competition,

IN WHICH £1,000 WILL BE GIVEN IN CASH PRIZES.

There are awards for all classes of workers, the expert and the beginner, and all have chances of winning some portion this big amount.

£500 is to be distributed amongst users of the KODAK N.C. (Non-curling) FILM.

£300 for users of KODOID PLATES; and

£200 for Films developed in the KODAK DAYLIGHT DEVELOPING MACHINE.

Ask your dealer for particulars of these Competitions, or write direct to

KODAK LTD., 41-43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

The name KODAK on a camera, or other photographic goods, is as the Hall-mark on silver.

SAPON

It REALLY does!
Do s what?
"It does its lf!"

that is to say, if you follow the directions.

SOAK,
SQUEEZE,
RINSE,
WRING.

SAPON does the washing while you take your ease.

A FREE SAMPLE will be sent for Post-card to SAPON Limited (Dept. 68), St. Swithin's Chambers, London.

J.G.GRAVES

SOLID FUMED OAK,
£8 17s. 6d.

This GRAND DINING ROOM SUITE is sent carriage paid on receipt of order enclosing 27/6 and your promise to pay the balance in 12 monthly instalments of 12/6; or, Discount Advantages to Cash Purchasers.

The Suite comprises: 4 small chairs, Lady's and Gent's Easy Chairs, and Couch; all full size, and upholstered in Crockett's Leather, fine quality: Maroon, Green or Black. State colour required.

J. G. GRAVES executes all orders under POSITIVE AGREEMENT to refund the full amount of deposit if the goods fail to come up to customer's expectations.

Send for Illustrated Guide to Complete Furnishing, Post Free.

Agents Wanted. Good Pay. No Responsibility. Write for Terms.

J. G. GRAVES, 100 DIVISION STREET, SHEFFIELD.

An admirable Food of the

EPPS'S

Finest quality and flavour.

COCOA

Nutritious and Economical.

ONE DOSE of

Kaputine cures in Ten minutes the most violent Headache or Neuralgic Pain no matter what the cause of the attack.

KAPUTINE is not an aperient, but is for one purpose only—to cure Headache and Neuralgia.

KAPUTINE

Cures in Ten Minutes.

Kaputine goes right to the seat of the trouble—the Nerves—it puts the Nerves right, that is why it cures almost instantly

Headache or Neuralgia.

Refuse dangerous white Headache Powders, such as have been condemned by the press. Demand Kaputine, the remedy that is backed up by medical testimony—the Safe Remedy.

Packets of 18 doses 1s.; Samples 1d. each. Of all Medicine Dealers.

Samples Free from Proprietors:
C. G. Kaputine, Huddersfield.

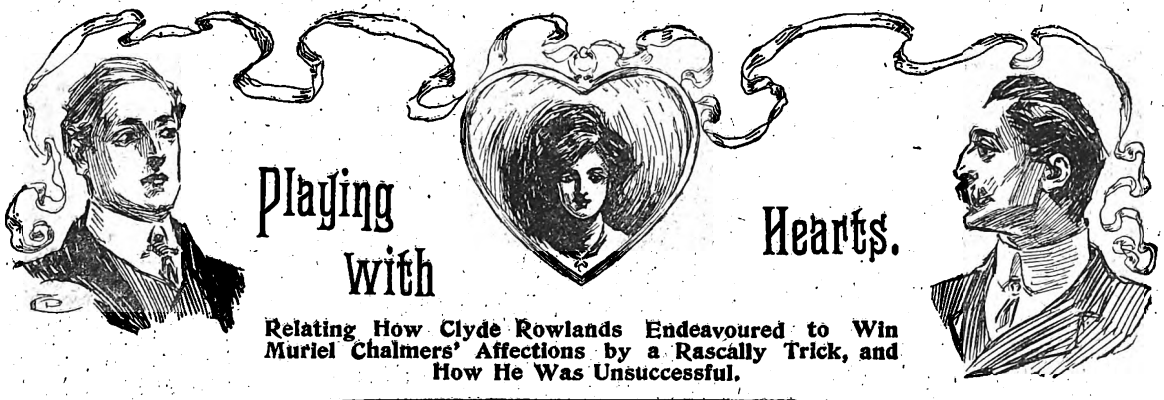
GOOGLE 5 1905 LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 804.] For the Week Ending May 28th, 1904. [ONE PENNY.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.



Playing with Hearts.

Relating How Clyde Rowlands Endeavoured to Win Muriel Chalmers' Affections by a Rascally Trick, and How He Was Unsuccessful.

"I SHALL not take your decision as final, Miss Chalmers!" said Clyde Rowlands, cleverly masking his feeling of baffled rage behind a suave smile. "A real prize usually requires a good deal of winning, so I must not be discouraged by a rebuff. I was too hasty—a pardonable error in the circumstances—and I ought to have waited, perhaps, till you had learnt to know me better!"

Muriel Chalmers experienced a sentiment of mingled sympathy and antipathy—a strange combination, but perfectly true. She was sorry for this man in his disappointment, and, at the same time, this speech had aroused a feeling of dislike.

"I hope, Mr. Rowlands, that you will accept my answer as final," she replied, in a halting manner. "I am sorry—so very sorry—that you—— Oh, please let us end this interview, which is as painful to me as it is to you," concluded the girl in evident distress.

"Pray do not be so distressed," he urged, bowing gallantly. "It is all my own seeking, and I am man enough to know how to take a temporary set-back. You see, I cannot regard it as defeat, in spite of the fact that appearances are against me."

With another bow, and a look in those keen, steel-grey eyes that made her feel uneasy for hours afterwards, Clyde Rowlands left her. There was something in that glance that fascinated her; it was like the gaze of a serpent at a dove!

Rowlands went for a long walk in the cool of the evening, he could not stay in the house another minute. He was generally calm, exasperatingly so, in all circumstances, but this refusal had upset him for a while

"A walk will restore me," he told himself. "And, as I usually think better when I am on the move, I shall probably be able to devise some plan for attaining my end. I swear that I will have Muriel Chalmers for my wife! I am passionately in love with that girl, and it matters not to me whether she loves me or not. I want the money, too, but I would have her if she had no money in prospect."

All rights reserved.]

He strode on for about half-a-mile before he recommenced his half-audible soliloquising. A cynical smile curved his lips.

"Of course, I know well enough that she is in love with Basil Ashton, and he loves her. Nothing definite has occurred yet, and I thought that her affection was that of mere association, a sort of friendship. This rebuff tells me the exact position. Well, I'll undertake to upset it. And I can begin this very night."

Returning to the house in which he was an honoured guest by reason of the fact that he had saved Muriel's father from a severe, if not a fatal, accident, he went to his room and eagerly examined a small basket into which he was accustomed to throw odds and ends of paper, torn letters, and the like. With a triumphant expression, he drew from it an envelope that had passed through the post. It was crumpled, and slightly torn at one corner. but sufficiently whole for his purpose; it was addressed to Basil Ashton, and the writing was that of a woman. As a matter-of-fact, it had contained a business letter, and the envelope had been written by a lady clerk.

"When I picked it up, I thought it might give me a clue to something," murmured Rowlands; "but I threw it in here afterwards as useless. I'm glad they haven't emptied that basket; this envelope will be very serviceable, I fancy."

He was busy till dinner-time. Immediately after dinner, he found himself alone with Basil; Muriel had left the gentlemen to smoke, but Mr. Chalmers had complained of a twinge of gout and had retired without the customary indulgence in a fragrant cigar.

"I say, Ashton, I'll ask you to excuse me this evening," said Rowlands, simulating with much effect the air of a man who has a secret and is trying to talk as if he hadn't. "I must put off that game of cards. I'm going for a stroll."

Basil laughed; it was a good-natured, frank expression of enjoyment, and just such a one as you would have expected after a look at the man.

Digitized by Google

"You needn't look so mysterious about it, Rowlands. What if you have a chance of meeting a fair and lovely maiden," Basil observed jestingly. "You must be on the alert against the machinations of Cupid! These extensive grounds contain one or two spots that are distinctly dangerous from that point of view."

Rowlands stifled a chuckle; Basil was simply paving the way for him.

"Well," he observed hesitatingly, "I don't mind your chaff. I'll admit that you're on the right tack, but I hope you won't mention it. I am going to the Copse with her, but Mur—— she wouldn't like everyone to guess. You're so dreadfully 'cute. Excuse me now, won't you? You stroll that way yourself some evenings, so if you chance to see anything—— Oh, well, I don't suppose we shall mind you!"

He was gone before Basil could recover from his surprise, and he was quite satisfied with his work. He read Basil's face like a book, and he concluded that the bait had been taken.

"The plot is simple enough," muttered Clyde Rowlands, as he left the house quietly. "I'll make each one angry, jealous, mortified, and then, if I judge a woman's heart correctly, she will be ready to accept me. In order to insure absolute success, I shall place him before her as a dishonourable man, and I know that that will finish matters. Otherwise there might be explanations. Confound it, I must have her and the money. I'm afraid that demand received by this evening's post is too peremptory to be put off for long, and if I can't meet it, why, it spells ruin."

The plot may have been simple, but it required a villain to execute it; Clyde Rowlands, when driven to a corner, was villain enough for most things, and the besmirching of a man's good name was a bagatelle in his eyes.

Clyde Rowlands made his way towards the spot known as the Copse, with the assurance that Muriel Chalmers had gone on ahead and would be there when he arrived. He had arranged that by an artfully-ambiguous note of two lines, written in a style that resembled Basil's, and yet was not exactly like it. The note had been placed in a book that she had been reading, and Rowlands had made certain that she had seen it. He was right; he saw the figure of Muriel walking slowly among the trees in the gloaming.

She was surprised when she saw him; she had expected Basil. She still did not doubt that Basil had written the note, and she regarded the appearance of Rowlands as an unfortunate coincidence.

"It seems that the Copse has attractions for others besides myself," he remarked gallantly. "I am intensely poetic at heart, Miss Chalmers, although many people would smile if they heard me say so. Is it not Wordsworth, the poet of Nature, who has some exquisite lines on such a place as this?" And he rattled on, remaining by her side as she walked, and keeping up a flow of talk that entertained the girl in spite of her desire that he would leave her.

Thus it came about that Basil, perplexed by Rowlands' remark in the house, and moved by mystification and jealousy to betake himself to the Copse, saw the two apparently in earnest conversation, and turned on his heel with an angry exclamation. Rowlands' keen eyes had detected his approach, and he had skilfully engineered a turn in the walk that hid Basil from Muriel till the former had disappeared.

Rowlands left the girl two minutes later; she had wished to remain at the Copse for a while. But Basil came not; Rowlands had overtaken him, and they returned to the house together.

Muriel was mortified at Basil's conduct, and this prevented her from doing the most natural thing—asking him for an explanation. Had it been a matter of business, an explanation would have been demanded; but love is not business, and so a chasm began to open between the two. Muriel soon had something more to think about, for another part of the villainous scheme came into operation. She saw an opened letter, somewhat crumpled, lying right in her path on the following morning.

The envelope had been neatly slit, just as methodical Basil always did, but the letter had been replaced in the envelope in the narrow way, so that about one-third of the width of the note-paper was visible. Naturally, she surveyed it curiously, saw that it was addressed to Basil, and then caught sight of "Dearest Basil" on the exposed part of the note-paper. She did not see Clyde Rowlands surveying her with cruel eyes from behind a bush.

"Dearest Basil!" In a woman's hand, although Basil had not one solitary feminine friend except herself. And in the corner, Basil had scribbled in pencil "Copse, 9.30," just as he would do in ordinary matters. For a moment Muriel stood irresolute; should she read the letter or no? She loved Basil and had given her heart to him; she believed that his heart was going out to her, she had reason for believing so, yet—— Tormented by doubt, an aching pain making her feel faint, she decided that she had a right to know whether this man was playing her false. It was not fair, she realised, to pry into the contents of a letter not intended for her, but she argued that it was a justifiable act, and, to the delight of the scoundrel watching her every movement, she drew forth the letter and perused it.

She read an impassioned love missive; Clyde Rowlands knew what she was reading, for had he not written it? He saw the tears well to her eyes and her cheeks flush crimson, and then become deadly pale. Muriel stood gazing dully at the letter for a few seconds, and then she tore it all into shreds and scattered them over the bushes. Some of the pieces fell on Rowlands, and he shook them off with a sardonic smile as he stepped from his hiding-place and glanced in the direction in which Muriel had vanished.

"Very good!" he murmured, rubbing his hands softly; "very good! Fortune favours the daring! We are getting on! I must be nice and humble towards her! Her spirit will respond to kindness just now, and that is my chance! I'll bet that she goes to the Copse at the time mentioned, so I must have my confederate there, even if Basil Ashton doesn't turn up! I fancy he will go there, though; he will be irresistibly attracted, in the vague idea that he will see us again! Anyhow, Muriel will have her fears realised by seeing a woman there. Anyone could get over the boundary fence, or through it, so there's nothing extraordinary about his meeting a sweetheart within the grounds. When I am master here, I'll alter that!"

Later in the day a telegram came for Rowlands, and he turned deadly pale. He seated himself on the lounge in the smoking-room and reflected deeply.

"I'll do it!" he muttered at length. "I must have some money to-night, so I'll get Basil on for a game of cards. He won't go to the Copse, but I think that will be better, after all. I'll prepare the bogus sweetheart so that she can speak to Muriel and throw oil on the—no, not on the troubled waters, but on the fire!"

Old Mr. Chalmers was confined to his room, where he passed the day in trying to sleep and in growling at gout, doctors, and everything in general. It was thus easy for Muriel to slip away after the dinner, which was a much more silent affair than usual. She purposely announced her intention of not appearing again that night, and she imagined that Basil would hail this intention with secret joy. Rowlands was delighted; it meant that Muriel would fall into the trap, and that he would have Basil to himself.

"And I'll have him for enough to stave off the threatened steps!" he said under his breath. "I'll pay that old fiend of a money-lender for his threats, one day!" he added, with an expression that was not one of those which one puts in print. "But he'll keep it, if I do not respond, and the final upshot of it will be prison!"

Clyde Rowlands steadied himself by an effort; he generally had a wonderful control over himself, and he exerted it now. Basil, on the contrary, was full of disappointment and anger at the course of events. He blamed Muriel for her fickleness, mentally calling her an accomplished flirt. He was glad that he had found her out, yet he was angry that she should have proved herself so different from what his fancy had painted her! He was bitter against her, also, for having tried, as he supposed, to cover her fault by treating him haughtily during that day, thus preventing him from even attempting to upbraid her. Rowlands had secretly kept his wine-glass full during dinner, and Basil had drunk more than he was wont to do; and now his enemy plied him with drink and proposed a renewal of the friendly games at cards which had been interrupted during the stay at Mr. Chalmers' pretty country house.

Digitized by Google

"Let us play for a few shillings," he said, with a shrug of his shoulders; "this place is a trifle slow, and we want something to wake us up. Only playing for stakes will do that!"

Basil agreed recklessly. The first stakes were low, and Rowlands lost; he pretended to grow excited, the stakes were doubled and still further increased. Basil's luck changed; he lost and continued to lose. The stakes were constantly increased; occasionally he won, but he lost far more often. With flushed cheeks he played madly, and Rowlands grew even more calm. He was winning all round, and these two poor fools were as puppets in his hands! How was Muriel faring with the "sweetheart"? His thoughts wandered to the Copse, but he felt that his cause was in good hands and that he could afford to forget that part of his scheme for the time and devote his whole attention to this reckless gambler before him!

And how was it faring with Muriel? She had stolen out unobserved, and taken up a position in the Copse. It was spying, and she hated herself for it as soon as she found herself there. An inward struggle ensued; should she wait and confirm the duplicity of her lover? She clenched her slender fingers as the word crossed her mind. Lover? He did not love her, but—yes, she loved him! Even now, she loved him and she could not help it! Was it right, was it womanly, to spy upon him, in any circumstances?

"No, I will not!" she cried aloud.

She uttered a little cry of fear as she felt the touch of a finger on her shoulder at that very instant; she turned, expecting to see Basil, but she found herself face to face with a woman!

"Why are you here?" asked the newcomer, hissing the words like one who is in the throes of jealousy. "Who do you come to see? Have you come to try to take him from me? I tell you, Basil Ashton is my promised husband, and woe be to you if you try your wiles on him, to take him from me!"

She leant forward and peered into Muriel's face.

"Yes, you are the one!" she continued vehemently. "I know that you have been winning him from me, or doing your best that way! But I warn you!" She shook her fist at Muriel, who stepped back in horror mingled with disgust. "He has promised to come here to meet me, and I will make him answer for what he has done. He mustn't play fast and loose with me! Now you go!"

Muriel was stunned. This woman was very little older than herself; she was not vulgar, yet she was not of the same social standing as Basil and Muriel. Why was it that Muriel experienced this sentiment of abhorrence? She could just distinguish the woman's features in outline, and she judged that the face was rather a pretty one. Muriel conceded in her own mind that she had been unjust to the woman in shrinking from her; if the stranger were enraged, perhaps she had cause! Certainly, if Basil had pledged himself to her, she had cause for anger, for Basil had led Muriel by his actions to believe that her own love was returned in some degree! How dared he act thus when he had given himself to another?

"I beg your pardon!" said Muriel humbly and brokenly. "I will go away!"

Before the stranger could utter another word, Muriel was running swiftly through the trees, and was soon lost to sight.

When Rowlands and Basil rose from the card-table, Muriel was sobbing convulsively, her face buried in the pillow. Rowlands had lost some of his calmness and his cheeks showed a faint tinge of red; Basil was deadly pale, for the fact had come home to him with stunning force that in his foolishness he had lost a large sum of money. Basil went straight to his room and drew a cheque for an amount that almost exhausted his account, and this he immediately handed to Rowlands.

"I have my revenge to-morrow?" he said unsteadily.

Rowlands assented. As Basil went out, Rowlands murmured: "And you will lose again! To-morrow night, I will show you as a cheat! That will settle Muriel, for if she does not consent, I will coerce her by threatening to expose you!"

The following day, the small house party was practically broken up; Mr. Chalmers was still in his room, Muriel avoided the others, and in the afternoon went off to the village to do what she could for someone who had been knocked down by a motor, and the two men kept apart. Both Basil and Rowlands were waiting for the gamble at cards; at dinner they scarcely spoke, although they had it to themselves. Muriel had not returned.

On the previous evening Rowlands had manipulated the cards; this evening he intended to let Basil have a short run of wins on the low stakes, and then charge him with cheating. The difficulty would be to prove it if Basil protested, but Rowlands evolved a line of action which, he imagined, would cause disinterested persons to attach more importance to his word than to Basil's.

He carried out his plan at the psychological moment. "I wish I could have engineered a witness, but it was too risky!" he said to himself.

Unknown to him, there was a witness! Muriel, trembling with agitation, but determined, had crept in and stood watching behind a curtain. She realised the full significance of the position; they were, in reality, playing for the hand of the girl they loved, and Muriel, from her hiding-place, saw the villain swiftly draw the ace of hearts from his sleeve. A mist swept before her eyes; she did not see what immediately happened, but she knew enough. As Rowlands sprang to his feet, proclaiming in a loud voice that Basil had cheated by having two aces of hearts in the pack, turning his own misdeed against Basil, Muriel ran forward to protect her lover, the man whom Rowlands was seeking to ruin that he, and not his more fortunate rival, should obtain her hand!

"'Tis false, you villain!" she cried, her eyes afire and pointing an accusing finger at the scoundrel, who flinched under her gaze. "I know all! Your accomplice of last night was knocked down and fatally injured by a motor, and she has confessed to me! I saw you take that card from your own sleeve!"

"Then he robbed me last night!" gasped Basil, bewildered.

"Get out of my house, you fiend!" spluttered another voice, and old Chalmers hobbled in. "My daughter finds that you told your accomplice too much for your own safety. You forgot that people tell the truth when on their death beds, and death comes unexpectedly. What's this about cheating and about robbery last night?"

Basil hurriedly explained. Rowlands edged towards the door at the other end of the apartment. Mr. Chalmers went livid with rage.

"If you dare to present that cheque, you will be arrested!" he roared. "I'll have it stopped, and you won't get the money! Don't attempt to bluster, but get away while you're safe, or it may be the worse for you!"

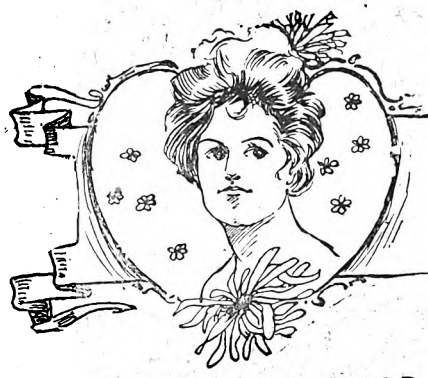
Rowlands deemed it well to take the hint. He left the house just as he was. Chalmers turned to the two young people.

"If we had had any case on which to prosecute, I'd have prosecuted, but the actual legal evidence is too small. We shall never get properly to the bottom of this, but it is perfectly clear that he plotted to separate you and have Muriel for himself! Now, if you two are not foolish, you'll get married as soon as you can!"

And the best proof that this hint was also taken is found in the fact that a certain marriage was announced five weeks later!

Geo. Day.

Digitized by Google



WITHOUT A HEART.

A Splendid Story relating how a Girl considered that Love was not an Essential Part of Life, but how she was convinced in the End.

"You are an awful little humbug, and you know it!"

So Kitty Seabright's tall brother, Murray, used sometimes to say to her when she had vexed him beyond control by her caprices, or he had watched her driving some one of her adorers, who chanced to be a friend of his own, to the verge of distraction by her coquetries.

"I am not!" Kitty would asseverate. "How can you be so cruel to a poor little thing like me? I wonder at you, I do indeed!"

Sometimes she would pout, sometimes go into a passion. Then Murray would sternly read her a lesson, which had no effect whatever. But more frequently the discussion ended by her coaxing him to forgive her.

One other person used occasionally, when she fretted and worried him beyond endurance, to bring the same accusation against Kitty. This was Roy Devereux, who had been her adorer, her victim, ever since she was a golden-haired fairy of six, and he a brave little knight of eleven.

But Roy's formula of condemnation differed slightly from that of his friend Murray.

"You are an awful little humbug, Kitty," he would say, "but you don't know it!"

"And I don't believe it either," Kitty would say, and generally forced him to repent his outburst, in metaphorical dust and ashes, before she forgave him.

Aunt Henderson never told her she was a humbug. That wise and worldly dame had carefully trained Kitty in the ways wherein a marriageable maiden should walk, who is expected to make what is called "a good match"—that is, marry wealth and position. And Kitty seemed to be going the way that her aunt wished.

In the ordinary affairs of life Kitty was gentle, loving, and honest. But when men were concerned, she displayed neither conscience nor heart. Murray said it was because she possessed neither. But Roy inclined to a more merciful opinion, excusing her on account of the vitiated atmosphere of Aunt Henderson's influence.

These two, Kitty's brother and her chief knight, were firm friends, though Murray was several years the elder, and had already begun to gain wealth, as well as win praise in the artistic career which his example, as well as personal longings and aspirations, had induced Roy to enter. This step mortally offended Devereux's old uncle, who had brought him up to be respectable and a broker, and he turned his back on the misguided youth accordingly.

The two men discussed Kitty with as much freedom as if she had been no relation to Murray, and the nearest approach they ever got to quarrels was when Murray's harsh judgment of the girl roused Roy to a passionate defence of the little Circe.

For bewitching Kitty was! She could even fascinate women, and when a pretty girl is able to do that one must admit there can be no limit to her powers. She was not a regular beauty; pick her features to bits, and you could find blemishes—inconsistencies as great as these were in her character, but somehow these very defects made her the prettier! Her complexion was purity itself; her great hazel eyes could express every shade of feeling, from fun to tenderness; her smiles were legion, and varied from heavenly sweetness to bewitching provocation; and her dimples—but there is no comparison for Kitty's dimples—they had to be seen to gain the slightest idea of their charm, and few men ever saw them, if free, and of an age to be inflammable, without growing enamoured to imbecility.

Aunt Henderson permitted her to amuse herself, but she kept careful watch. When any ineligible adorer threatened to prove dangerous, that wily lady artfully encouraged him to put his passion into words, and then Kitty sent him to the right-about. "Because you know, aunty, there is no fun at all when they get maudlin," said Kitty.

She had not yet ended her first season "in Society," and she would not be eighteen for some months yet; but thanks to Aunt Henderson's care, she was as worldly as if she had been money-hunting for a decade; and thanks to certain naughty instincts of her own, as skilled in coquetry as a veteran flirt, long before she left the schoolroom.

Roy Devereux had been making love to her for so many years that she took it quite as a matter of course that he should do so. She missed him if he were absent, and was glad to see him come back; she liked to indulge in an approach to poetical dreams now and then, but they didn't mean anything.

Murray read her aright so far—Kitty was a humbug; but then Roy was right, too—Kitty did not know it. There was nobody whom she humbugged so successfully as she did herself, for under all her folly and her wickedness, Kitty had a heart, and if it awakened one day, when too late, there would be terrible misery.

Early in February Mr. Erastus Chillingford came back from Brazil after an absence of several years. He was sixty, though he did not look his age; a widower; rich as Crœsus; and a very handsome man.

He had two married daughters, and two sons, and he quarrelled incessantly with the whole brood. But people declared that Mr. Chillingford was in the right, for his children were an idle, extravagant lot, with the exception of the eldest son, who was a miser, and grudged every penny his father spent as if stolen from himself. And now he wanted to punish them! And the most effectual way of doing this was to marry!

Only two evenings after his return he met his old friend Mrs. Henderson, at a dinner-party, and they resumed at once their former familiar relations. He knew she was a woman to be trusted, and he confided his secret to her, though he did not mention his desire to revenge himself on his family. He talked about his loneliness, his empty home, and though he frankly admitted that for a man of his age to take a wife was usually a folly, he opined that in his particular case there were cogent reasons, which would not only excuse, but render his determination meritorious.

Digitized by Google

He had not seen Kitty half-a-dozen times since she was a child, and had forgotten her existence; but Mrs. Henderson's pulses beat fast with triumph as she listened to his confidence. Naturally, she held her peace, made only casual mention of her niece, and invited him to dine with her the next night, so that they could talk of old times, and discuss the future with more freedom.

He accepted the invitation, and appeared, looking such a stately cavalier in his scrupulously-correct evening dress, his luxuriant grey hair softening his stern-cut features, and instead of making him look old, taking away from his age, and brightening his black eyes, till the effect was rather as if his curly locks had been whitened with powder instead of years, that Mrs. Henderson felt he must prove satisfactory to Kitty in every way.

And while the two sat waiting in the carefully-subdued light of the library, till dinner should be announced, Kitty herself came floating in with her white robes trailing about her. She chanced to be in one of her quiet moods, and looked like a youthful Sybil, or an enchanted princess, or some other rare and marvellous creature far removed from the capabilities and petty charms of ordinary girlhood.

Mr. Chillingford did not lose his head. Aunt Henderson saw that. But she saw that Kitty was a new revelation to him, and to a man of sixty this means a great deal! He was an admirable conversationalist. His manners, without being stiff, were a happy contrast to those of the free and easy youth of our day; he descended to no compliments; but every word or glance was a delicate tribute of admiration; and Kitty was charmed.

The dinner proved delicious. Mr. Chillingford surpassed himself, and Kitty flashed into gaiety, and displayed half-a-dozen of her Protean guises, before ten o'clock came and Murray appeared to escort her to some reception at the house of a friend.

Many times after that Mr. Chillingford called.

Kitty was given no leisure for thought. She was hurried on down the perfumed atmosphere, until her head was in a whirl; her vanity was excited till it became for the time her most prominent characteristic; her love of power was gratified by her influence over this man, whom the world delighted to honour, whose manners and conversation were charming beyond anything she had ever known.

Then Murray and Roy discovered something of the truth, and poor Roy allowed his impulsiveness to get the better of his reason, and he flew to Kitty and upbraided her bitterly.

"You are the very embodiment of the Eastern myth of the fire-fly and the white moths!" cried he, so terribly in earnest that exaggerated speech came natural. "The moths are her lovers, and she sends them to bring her a light, and they burn their wings off and die!"

"I have no sympathy for their folly," said Kitty, setting her face as hard as a flint. Murray had just been lecturing her, and she was in her worst mood.

"I know you are only flirting—I know you never mean to marry him," cried Roy, quite beside himself. "Kitty—Kitty—you are breaking my heart! I have loved you all my life—you do care for me at bottom—I know you do—you cannot hlep it—you must!"

"We are the best friends in the world—always have been—oh, Roy, don't spoil it all by turning silly like the rest!" she answered, a little disturbed, she could not have told why, by his pleading. Something seemed to stir away down in the depths of her being; some chord responsive to his prayers. Some secret lying there seemed to awake, to be trying to make itself intelligible; but her ears were so dulled by the brazen ring of worldly noise, that she heard it only vaguely, and the language was unintelligible—unknown. Mrs. Henderson had trained her in many tongues, but she had so carefully smothered the creature's head under the swaddling bands of vanity and pride, that the girl did not even recognise its tones, when the stifled prisoner heard the voice of the enchanter, and strove to call in answer.

"Don't put me off. You can't. I have gone too far. I must speak!" cried Roy. "It is no new thing for you to hear. You have always known I loved you! Listen, Kitty. I have to go away, you know—abroad—oh, the time is coming very near! Let your heart speak. Give me your promise. It will only be a few years! I shall succeed. I shall be able to offer you a home—and love, too, for you do love me, Kitty!"

She began to feel indignant with his presumption. She caught at that sensation, in order to escape the kind of fright which that inexplicable inward tumult had roused.

"How dare you talk to me like this!" she exclaimed. "I have liked you, but I shall hate you if this goes on. You and Murray do nothing but make scenes! I have told you over and over again, I don't know what love means. I am incapable of it. I haven't what you call a heart. I've told you that, too! Oh, don't tease me, Roy, don't! It's a shame! You will make me cry, and then my eyes will get red, and I shall look horrid, and we are going to Mrs. Wentworth's ball, and I've such a lovely gown!"

He stared at her with eyes full of wrath and pain. Their anguish hurt her a little. Her own nonsensical talk hurt her also. But she meant it, every word, and her sorrow for him was only because he was her old friend. Of this she

Kitty ran to the piano, and dashed into an old Scottish melody.

Digitized by Google

assured herself again and again, as she shivered under his glance.

"By Heaven!" he groaned. "Don't—don't make me believe you in earnest!"

"But I must," she said; "it's all true! Go away, Roy, and get your senses back, till we can be as we were in old times."

"You love me, Kitty. You can't deny it. You love me!"

Again something stirred away down beneath what she called her real self. Again that frightened sensation smote her, that vague consciousness, that though she had never learnt the tongue he spoke, something in her soul partially understood and tried restlessly to catch its full meaning.

"If you ever say that again, I will never speak to you as long as I live!" she exclaimed. But, angrily as she spoke, she was nearly crying. And he saw it.

He caught her two hands. He tried to draw her towards him. But she resisted, he pleading all the while.

"I shall not give you up," he said. "You shall not break my heart, nor your own; for if you sent me away, it would wake, some time, when too late, and teach you the truth. Kitty! Kitty! Let your real self speak. Promise me now. Once you have promised, I know nothing could induce you to break your word. Say that you will be my wife!"

She had a hasty, half-formed thought, that it was a pity Roy had not a fortune; then her fright and her anger rose higher. The dread that she should weep seemed in an instant to nerve her. She pulled her hands free; she ran to the piano; she dashed into the old Scottish melody of "Roy's Wife of Aldivalloch;" turned her head towards him with a cruel, smile, and half-said, half-sang:

"But her name it wasn't Kitty—no, no! her name was never that!"

Roy fairly staggered into a seat. For the moment it seemed to him that he hated her. Before he could speak, the door opened, and a maid entered, saying:

"If you please, miss, your aunt says, will you come into the drawing-room?—there are visitors, and she wants you."

Kitty sprang up, waved her hand to Roy, and ran out of the room. He sat for a few moments. Then he rose and left the house.

A week went slowly by. Again Roy found an opportunity to see Kitty alone. Again he annoyed, pained, and angered her. But Mrs. Henderson, finding that he was there, came to the rescue, and after Kitty had fled, the two had a battle royal, and Roy was forbidden to enter the house.

He wrote to Kitty, and she sent his letter back, having scribbled on the envelope:

"I have not read it—I hoped you meant to be sensible; when I found you did not, I stopped reading."

And so she had. The tender, passionate words disturbed her to read, in the same odd fashion they had done when his lips uttered them.

That night Roy left town. He stayed away for a fortnight. When he got back, and rushed to Murray's studio for news, Murray told him that Kitty was engaged to Mr. Chillingford. "The engagement," he said, "was publicly announced yesterday." Murray had quarrelled with his aunt, and tried to quarrel with the intended bridegroom. But his wrathful reproaches glanced off the polished armour which that gentleman wore, as a child's arrows might off a steel breastplate. Kitty herself he had formally disowned, cast off; patience and moderation had never been virtues possessed by any of the Seabrights. That night, as he watched his friend struggling through the awful hours, which must carry him on to the more unendurable new day, he could have found the heart to revile the girl outright; for he understood the capabilities of her character as no one else ever had. He knew that she was able to understand what she had done; that she remained wilfully deaf and blind.

Roy was really very ill for a week. But Seabright guarded him in his lodgings, and kept the fact of his return a secret; for he reflected that later it would be hard on the poor boy, if careless acquaintances discovered how completely the blow had prostrated him.

The marriage was to take place in a month. But before that time Murray and Roy would have crossed the sea. When Mrs. Henderson and Kitty heard that Murray would not come to the wedding they were both somewhat disturbed. "It would look odd," the elder lady said; and anything which looked odd was terrible in her eyes. She wrote a beseeching letter to her nephew. But he paid no attention to it. At last Kitty determined to try if a personal application would not soften Murray. He would scold her, she knew, and she hated to be scolded. Still she could not believe that any human being could resist her very long.

With her usual impulsiveness, Kitty acted upon her resolution as soon as it came into her head. She had to go out shopping, and took occasion to pass by her brother's lodgings. She ran lightly upstairs, putting on her most pensive expression of countenance, in order to subdue Murray's obduracy at the first glance.

The ante-chamber led into both rooms and studio, and the two rooms were connected by double doors. Kitty decided to enter the salon, and knock in order to give Murray warning of her presence, as she had often done in the days before her conduct brought trouble between them.

The curtains were drawn, the room in shadow. Kitty was near the studio door, when up from the sofa rose Roy Devereux, and confronted her, pale and gaunt, and changed, as if years, instead of a few weeks, had passed since they parted. He stood still and looked at her, but did not speak. Kitty was frightened and troubled, too. But she got her wits back quickly.

"How you startled me, Roy!" she exclaimed. "I didn't know you were in town. I almost thought you were a ghost."

She tried to laugh. But the merriment died on her lips, as she met the heart-broken reproach in his eyes and heard his answer.

"It is the ghost of the man whose life you have ruined," he said; "and you are only a ghost, too! The real Kitty, noble and honest, died when she stooped to falsehood—sold herself for gold!"

Kitty shivered from head to foot. The old terror came back. But, as usual, anger came also.

"I'm afraid you have been drinking, Roy," she said. "I'd be ashamed, if I were a man, to talk about any woman ruining my future."

"Don't you be afraid, Kitty!" he said, savagely. "You'll live to see what I can make of my life. You'll live to repent what you have made of yours."

"Is my brother in, Mr. Devereux?" she asked, loftily.

"Your brother is not in, Miss Seabright."

"Then I'll go," said Kitty. "Perhaps you will kindly tell him I called. Good morning."

She turned to flee. Roy started forward, caught her in a fierce embrace, and kissed her twice. Then he released her.

"Go!" he said. "Every time your husband touches his lips to yours, my kisses will burn you like fire, Kitty, for you loved me—you'll find it out some day."

Kitty rushed away. On the stairs she met her brother. She said not a word about what had happened, but held him fast, and pleaded with him to remain for her wedding.

"I'd rather go to your funeral," he said; and then Kitty sobbed piteously, till at last he took her in his arms, moaning: "Poor little girl! It's not all your fault. Come, we sha'n't meet often in this world, so we won't part enemies. Good-bye! I shall sail in three days."

The month passed. Murray and Roy had crossed the sea. Mrs. Henderson had been dazzled by the promised golden rain. Kitty was married.

I have no persecution, no cruelty, no hardness to record of her husband during the years which followed. Yet, from the first, under all his elaborate courtesy, his gentleness, his affectionate attentions, Kitty was made to feel that the hand which guided her every step was iron, that she must walk wherever it willed, else the velvet glove which covered it would be flung aside, and if she did not obey its slightest impulsion, she would be dragged ruthlessly along in the way it pointed.

Digitized by Google

She shut her eyes to the fact as much as she could, and Kitty had marvellous powers of self-deception. She was such an odd compound, too, that though wilful and headstrong, she could not help admiring the man who was able to make himself her master. Then, too, Mr. Chillingford was the most cultivated, the most intellectual person she had ever known intimately. His superiority was so manifest that to be admired by him was a triumph; and shallow and frivolous as her education had been, Kitty had real talents, and was capable of appreciating mental supremacy.

Her house was almost as luxurious as Aladdin's palace. Kitty's jewels might have been the envy of a queen. She was allowed every amusement. She could have the world at her feet. But the handsome face, so stern beneath its smiles, was always beside her; the iron hand never released its hold.

She could receive as much general attention from men as she pleased, but there must be no approach to flirting; no singling out one man for the recipient of her smiles! He did not tell her this in words; he seldom put his commands into speech; but she was made to feel this restriction, as she was made to feel all others, and rebellion was useless.

She tried it once, and three months' seclusion was the consequence. Yet he was so charming a companion all the while, that she could not hate him. Aunt Henderson attempted to interfere, and met with her reward.

"Keep by me, and we are friends," said Mr. Chillingford, with his iciest smile. "Oppose me, and you never enter my doors. I am your niece's master, and so far, I am yours."

Roy Devereux knelt at her feet and in another moment she burst into tears.

Kitty came back from her seclusion more quiet, older, but immensely improved. With her natural gifts, her mind, in companionship with her husband's, could not fail to grow, and he took every pains with her, and enjoyed his task. But she was not to become grave and lose her playful ways. He wanted to be amused, and she must amuse him.

"You are not so kittenish as you used to be," he said.

"Perhaps because I'm growing old," said she; and then she sighed to herself.

But she knew that he meant her to play at being a kitten if she was no longer one—and she had to do it! Wealth and luxury gradually lost their charm. They were so freely lavished, that satiety followed. Amusements no longer interested her, as they had done in more frivolous days; she was outgrowing the petty power of their spell. Life, brilliant as it was, looked cold and hard amid its glitter; yet what she needed to fill it, Kitty could not have told for a long, long while, but the knowledge came at length.

Her husband entered her room one day so softly that she did not hear him. She was nestled in an easy chair, vaguely dreaming. He drew her head back, and kissed her lips. For the first time Kitty remembered Roy's menace.

She did not love Roy. She hated him, for it was his doing that she had at last reached the truth which must embitter her existence! She knew what the lack was. The touch on hers of the lips of the husband whom she did not love had, at this moment, in some strange way, made her comprehend what life would have been with a man she had loved.

Eighteen months after her marriage Mr. Chillingford was seized with paralysis, which confined him to his chair. But his mind remained as vigorous as ever, his will as indomitable. From that time, for nearly two years, it is scarcely an exaggeration to assert that Kitty was never allowed to leave his presence. He removed into the country. He could take daily drives; he could read and study. But he lived on. And in every occupation Kitty must bear her part—must amuse him to the very best of her ability!

Life was sad and dreary, and she hated it. But she could not hate him. She learnt almost to hate money, for she saw in family quarrels, in the mercenary spirit of professed friends, how odious it could become.

She hated Roy Devereux, too, for the knowledge he had taught her never faded from her mind, and yet she never played a Scottish melody—and she had to do it often ("Roy's Wife," among them) for Mr. Chillingford was fond of the old tunes—without there rising before her eyes that scene with Devereux in the library.

Ah, it looked so far off, and yet so near, that day when in cruel mockery she had frenzied her lover's soul by her scornful chant—and she knew now—she knew that his wife's name might have been Kitty, had she only believed him when he told her that she had a heart, and she comprehended that the voice she had heard crying out, in a language she did not then understand, was her own heart beseeching to be heard.

But she never went beyond this reflection. Kitty was dead. Roy was dead! Mr. Chillingford's wife was alive, and a man called Roy Devereux was alive, too, far away over the seas, earning fame and fortune already. But he was not the Roy whom Kitty had known; he was an enemy, who loathed and despised Mrs. Chillingford.

Three years from the date of her marriage Kitty was a widow. The will could not be read for three months, because Mr. Chillingford had ordered that it was to be done in the presence of both his executors; and one of them was on the Continent and ill, and could not return for at least that time.

However, everybody knew that Kitty was mistress of the millions. Her husband had made no secret of his testament. When the will was opened at last, and proved to be in her favour, the eldest son determined to dispute it. But after taking the preliminary steps, Oscar Chillingford was obliged to go back to China, and the case was kept off by artful delays for a whole twelvemonth.

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Henderson lived with Kitty now, and Kitty had her millions! Already, into her seclusion, admirers forced themselves. Go where she might, they followed, and Kitty could not forget a speech an old friend made, unaware that she overheard it.

"It is now Mrs. Chillingford's turn to be hunted. She is a gold fish now, and all the sharks are after her. She is young enough and handsome enough to be loved—but it won't happen! Every good has its drawback. Kitty can never trust any more, and there isn't one living who wouldn't think more of the millions than of her, try as he might to forget them."

Money—money! It seemed to Kitty as if every creature who approached her, from Aunt Henderson to the slightest acquaintance, thought of nothing else—wanted nothing else—tricked her—deceived her. And it was almost the truth, for that is what gold brings!

A distant relative died, and left her three thousand pounds a year. Oh, how delightful it would be, Kitty thought, if she had this income, and nothing more! But for all that I don't think she would have given up her fortune.

The lawsuit was to begin at last. There were times when she longed to fling the property at her dead husband's children. But Oscar Chillingford had hinted at wrong conduct, doubtful mysteries on her part as to the making of the will; and Kitty was not a woman to shrink from having everything exposed and cleared up.

She was in London. It was early spring. An intimate friend persuaded her to go to her house one night. "There would be none but the family there," Kitty was told. And Kitty went, and found herself face to face with Roy Devereux, who had returned unexpectedly, that very day, and had come to visit his cousins.

He avoided speaking to Kitty. There were at least a dozen people in the rooms, all excited over his appearance, so it was easy enough to manage.

Such a changed Roy! So much older, graver; but so handsome, so noble-looking! And there he was, only the length of a room between Kitty and him, and yet as far away from her as if death and the grave had swept between. She realised this the instant his eyes met hers.

She could not go away. She could find no excuse. After awhile there was music; and under its cover Kitty moved away into another room, and Roy entered, not knowing she was there. When he saw her, he turned back. Her pride broke down then. She was not thinking of him as her former lover, only of the days when he had been her friend; their childish games upon the grass; the thousand and one trifles which linked their childish past.

"Won't you speak to me, Roy?" she cried out. "We used to be friends. Won't you speak?"

In spite of her sombre dress, her changed face, in that moment she looked more like the girlish Kitty than she had done for years. Her very attitude was unconsciously the same as that she used to assume when they had quarrelled and she wanted to be forgiven. But the resemblance only made him hard and cruel.

Again her tremulous voice cried:

"Won't you shake hands, Roy?"

"No!" he answered.

"I didn't think you could treat me so!" she sighed. (The very words she used to utter.) "I wonder you can hate me so, if you ever liked me—but you couldn't have done so—you couldn't!"

He strode up and stood before her, cold and white!

"I loved Kitty!" he said; "or what I thought was her! You are Mrs. Chillingford, and I don't know you."

"Oh, Roy—Roy!" she moaned. "And you don't even take the trouble to tell me about Murray."

"He is well—you hear from him."

"So seldom—and he never comes home," sighed Kitty. "Oh, Roy, won't you say anything—won't you try to be glad to see me?"

"Glad to see you?" he cried. "You broke my heart once. Do you want to see if you can't torture me again? Don't hope it. I am not the man you knew. You are dead to me—more, you never existed. If I wished, I could not care about you. I could not love you. I wouldn't marry you if you had the wealth of the world added to your millions."

Kitty rose. She was not angry. But she had got her self-control back—she was stately Mrs. Chillingford again.

"You are right," she said. "You are not the man I used to know, you are a stranger. Permit me to remind you that strangers, in civilised countries, do not speak to a lady in that way."

She reached the door.

"I beg your pardon!" he exclaimed—"I beg your pardon!"

Kitty received his words with a slight inclination of the head and passed on. She went home, and cried herself to sleep, as if she had been a girl still.

As for Roy, he rushed into a violent flirtation with a damsel who was his distant cousin and had pink eyelids, a proof that the young gentleman was not so indifferent to Kitty as he wished to believe.

Within the next fortnight they met quite often. Both were determined not to speak. But they always did. Sometimes Roy said bitter things. Sometimes Kitty was cold and haughty. Sometimes they forgot themselves, and talked about their childish days, and grew interested and pleasant, till some chance word brought them both back to consciousness, and they would part on worse terms than ever.

The weeks flew by. Roy still lingered, still saw Kitty occasionally. He learnt one thing—that he loved her yet, that he was a fool! She cared for him, though—she cared! But marry old Chillingford's millions, live on his money—never! Not if he had had a dozen hearts, and to leave Kitty again must break them all.

The suit dragged its slow length along. It got into court at last. Nothing had been spared Kitty. She was forced to give evidence herself. Oscar Chillingford's lawyer cross-examined her, tortured her till a fiend might have felt pity; but he had none, and Kitty never faltered once.

The last day of the trial came. Kitty had to go. Passing down a crowded street, her carriage was brought to a stop by a press of vehicles. She looked out, and saw Roy Devereux standing on the kerbstone, waiting for an opportunity to cross. He lifted his hat, and was turning away, when her white face suddenly moved him to compassion. He hurried up to the carriage. He took her hand.

"Poor Kitty!" he said, softly. "You pay dearly for it all—very dearly!"

Whiter she could not grow. But a strange light flashed into her eyes and illuminated her whole face. She held his hand fast. He looked at her in wonder.

"You are going away?" she asked.

"I sail to-morrow."

"We shall not meet again, Roy," she said. "Will you do me a favour—a very little one? You needn't be afraid to say 'yes.'"

"I do say it," he answered. "What do you want, Kitty?"

"Come into the court-room," she said. "The decision will be given to-day. You'll not be kept more than an hour."

He drew his hand from hers.

"A most singular request!" he said angrily.

"But you promised! Think, Roy, if it went against me," said Kitty. But she knew her triumph was sure.

"I will go," he said. She made a sign, inviting him to get into her carriage. "Thanks," he replied. "I prefer to walk."

The vehicle drove on. Kitty held a consultation with her chief lawyer, in one of the waiting-rooms. When he led her to her place in the court, she saw Roy Devereux sitting on a bench facing her.

The trial ended. Judgment was pronounced in Kitty's favour. Not only that, but the judge, in summing up the case, overwhelmed Oscar Chillingford with the contumely he merited for his conduct from first to last, and bestowed an eloquent tribute upon the defendant.

Digitized by Google

Friends were hurrying forward to congratulate Kitty. Roy Devereux rose to go, when he was stopped by Kitty's principal counsel getting on his feet, and requesting the attention of the court.

Amid a breathless silence, he stated that his client, knowing in advance that her just claims must be acknowledged, had confided to him a decision, which he was requested to announce then and there. It was, perhaps, a little out of place, regarded from one point of view; in another, it was eminently proper. Mrs. Chillingford had only resisted the ignoble attack upon her, because to have yielded to a compromise, or announce her intentions, would have given evil, suspicious tongues an opportunity of declaring that there had been grounds for the infamous insinuations levelled against her, and that she feared to face the contest.

Everything was clear now. Her vile accuser was shown in his true light. The fortune was Mrs. Chillingford's, as her husband had willed it should be—hers to keep—hers to give—and given it was to be, to the last penny. One half the amount would be divided between the two daughters and the younger son of her late husband; the rest would be placed in the hands of trustees, for the use and benefit of such charitable institutions and purposes as they might hereafter select.

Amid a still unbroken silence he led his client from the court, and as she disappeared, such a shout went up from the crowded room as those old walls had never heard before.

An hour afterwards Kitty was sitting in her boudoir, when the door opened. Supposing it to be a servant, she did not turn her head.

"Kitty, Kitty!"

Roy Devereux was kneeling at her feet.

"Roy!" she murmured.

Then she burst into tears.

"Can you forgive me?" he cried. "Oh, how noble a woman, how grand you are! How can I dare tell you that I love you? Not a moment during all these dreadful years has my love altered. Strive and battle as I might, it lived on. Can you forgive me, Kitty?"

"I can thank you," she answered, looking down into his face with a heavenly smile. "You always told me I had a heart, Roy—you have wakened it at last!"

F. L. Bowe.

THE TWO MISSES BONNEY.

Illustrating how all that Glitters is not Gold.

GERTRUDE BONNEY was pretty, and, as is the case with most pretty girls, she kept herself and everyone else always aware of that fact. Not that she was overbearing and proud, but in a hundred little ways she would remind one that Gertrude Bonney had lovely grey eyes, a straight nose, and a dimpled chin.

When Jack Willet first saw her at a ball he thought he had seen the prettiest woman in the world, and after an introduction had been managed, he proceeded to fall straightway in love with the pretty damsel. After meeting her at a number of social gatherings Mr. Willet called one afternoon.

"Miss Bonney was at home," the maid told him, and he was shown into a long, sunny reception-room. He found it already occupied. A tall young lady in a plain grey gown stood holding his card in her hand.

"Mr. Willet?" she said, in a sweet, low voice.

"I called to see Miss Bonney," replied Jack, fumbling with his gloves.

"I am Miss Bonney," answered the girl in grey, and the smile passed from her face. "You probably wish to see my sister, Miss Gertrude. I will send her to you." And she left the room.

"Is it possible," thought the young man, "that such a pretty girl as Miss Gertrude could have such a—ah—plain sister." And yet her voice was delicious. "Ah—good afternoon, Miss Bonney," as Gertrude Bonney tripped into the room, all smiles and blue muslin.

Mr. Willet called many times at the palatial residence of his divinity, but he never again saw the elder Miss Bonney. By this time he was in the deep waters of love, and as yet he had not contrived to whisper his devotion into the shell-like ear of Miss Gertrude, for with all her innocent glances and confiding ways the little beauty's head was set squarely upon her white shoulders, and she always avoided a confidential tête-à-tête. Thus the swift months slipped by, and the Bonneys prepared to move to their country residence. When this news reached Jack he determined to speak with Gertrude of his love for her.

He nervously moved about the dainty room awaiting her coming, and when he heard the swish of skirts outside the door he hurried forward to greet—Miss Rose Bonney.

She handed him a letter; it ran:

"MY DEAR MR. WILLET,—You are such a good friend of mine that I tell you the good news first. To-morrow will witness the public announcement of my engagement to Mr. Horace Richards, to whom I have been engaged for the past six months. Won't you congratulate me? Trusting you will excuse me for not appearing this afternoon.—Yours sincerely,

"GERTRUDE BONNEY."

With a groan the young man dropped his hand upon his arm, while dry sobs shook his frame.

"Mr. Willet!" The words were hardly more than a breath, yet they caused the young man to raise his head and look at the speaker.

And he had once called her plain! Her face was wondrously tender and her eyes bright with sympathy. The touch of her slim hand upon his arm sent a thrill of comfort to his soul.

"You must try to bear it, Mr. Willet. I know what Gertrude has written. Do not be too hard on her. She is so pretty, and has been spoilt."

"Forgive me," cried Jack contritely. "When one sees you one wonders how she could be so false." And he left the room.

A month later, business taking Mr. Willet to one of the most squalid localities of the city, he met Miss Rose Bonney coming out of a house, a small basket on her arm.

"Haven't you been away, Miss Bonney?" he inquired.

"Oh, no," replied the girl, brightly. "I could not leave my poor. They need me even more in the summer. And I do not accomplish half what I wish to. It is very hard for one working alone."

It seemed but natural after that that he should meet the elder Miss Bonney on many of her errands of mercy and much help he was to her, too.

Then came a day when he met her with a face expressing happiness and news.

"Miss Bonney," he said, as soon as politeness permitted, "I have unexpectedly come into a huge fortune. Rose, the infatuation which I thought I had for your sister was merely a passing fancy. The affection I hold for you is more than infatuation. It is true, manly love. Don't you think you could learn to love me a little, Rose?"

Whatever the girl's answer was it seemed to please the young man, for he remarked to his pipe late that night: "And I almost missed the real diamond in the glitter of the imagination."

Florence Kesterton.

Digitized by Google

The Sealed Packet.

Telling How it Showed a Beautiful Girl the Character of Her Unworthy Lover.

"It was Catherine Rolfe. Yes, Woodbury, some day I intend to marry her."

"Whether she will or no, eh?"

Layton Mowbray coloured.

"Thank you for reminding me that the lady's lips have not yet said yes. But her eyes have said it, and repeated it, a hundred times; those magnificent eyes, for which kingdoms might well be lost!"

He put down his cigar and gazed thoughtfully up the street, whose gay monotony had been so recently broken by the costly sweep of Miss Rolfe's beautiful dress.

Miles Woodbury stifled a half-sigh and turned resolutely to the huge folio on anatomy—dry, and dull, and almost stupid, it seemed to him that day. He looked furtively at Mr. Mowbray, his professional eye taking in at a glance all the fine points of the man's physique. Mr. Mowbray was tall and well-formed, with dark brown hair and blue eyes, aristocratic features, and decidedly the air of a gentleman of fashion. The prestige of a millionaire father, and the ancient atmosphere of "one of the first families," in nowise detracted from his personal advantages.

Whatever had induced him to seek the acquaintance of the struggling young physician was one of the mysteries. They had been together at college—always on speaking terms, but nothing more; the son of a millionaire could have little fellowship with the poor student.

On obtaining his degree, Dr. Woodbury had located himself in London, and here he met again his former acquaintance, Mowbray. The latter was disposed to be friendly, and after awhile it became quite his fashion to drop into Woodbury's sanctum and while away an hour or two almost every day. He was a man of leisure, and after the excitement of the ball, the opera, the concert, had passed away, time hung heavily; and Woodbury was a good fellow—made an excellent listener—so he said to his friends when joked about his less worldly blessed friend.

Dr. Woodbury continued his study of the uninviting volume, and Mowbray, yawningly observing that it was going to rain, buttoned up his overcoat and sauntered away. Woodbury closed the door and drew from his pocket a knot of crimson velvet, studded with a single flash of jet. He looked at it a moment, touched it lightly with his lips, and dropped it upon the flame-red coal in the grate. Just then the door was pushed open and a pale young face, covered with a worn blue shawl, was put inside.

"I fear she is dying, sir! Oh, come quickly!" said the sweet voice of the little girl.

Woodbury started from the reverie in which he was buried to see the new comer.

"Who is dying, my child?"

"My sister Ethel, sir. She has been so bad all night, and baby has cried ever since he woke. Oh, dear, dear! What if Esther should die?"

She was crying softly, the tears falling over the pale cheeks and down on the soft, unbound hair, which the wind had thrown about her face.

The young physician put on his mackintosh—it was raining fast—and followed the guidance of the girl. She led him a long way through narrow streets, growing every moment narrower, and more filthy, until she paused at last in a dark street, into whose evil precincts the pure light of Heaven seemed ashamed to enter.

The room they entered was meagre and gloomy, and scantily furnished. If there had been a fire that day it had departed and left none of its warmth behind. The girl pointed to the still, white figure on the bed.

Woodbury went up and laid his fingers on the cold wrist, which gave back no throb to the touch. For a moment he thought she was dead.

She stirred slightly and half-unclosed her eyes with a moan of pain. Once she had been beautiful, and still she was young; but all that remained of her girlish loveliness was fast whitening into the snowy shadow and mist of death. The golden hair—once the pride and glory of her young beauty—lay in a wild mass of rippling gold on the pillow; the dark lashes of the eyes touched a cheek as destitute of glow as the heart of a marble tombstone. By her side, half-reclining on her breast, its great blue eyes fastened on her face, was a child perhaps two years old; its crimson cheeks and lips contrasting almost fearfully with the dead white of that other face so very near.

"Mamma, mamma," it kept moaning. "Mamma, mamma!"

"Will she die, doctor? My Esther, will she die?" asked the little girl, drawing close to Woodbury's side. He put his arm round her in silent pity, but the eager eyes, expressing so much of hope, forced him to reply:

"My child, your sister will be with God before the dawn of another day. How long has she been ill?"

The sweet, anxious face of the girl grew deadly pale, but she was calm—the serenity of confirmed doubt; she knew she was soon to be sisterless and alone.

"She has been growing feeble for more than a year; but for three weeks she has coughed day and night, and her cheeks have been like the roses I used to gather on the old bush at home. Oh, sir, we used to live in the sweetest little cottage in the beautiful country, and there was a bright river and great green trees, where the birds sang from morning till night, and Esther was gayer than any one of them; that was before he came——" She stopped short and burst into tears.

A rumble of carriage-wheels at the door smote the air, and soon the soft rustle of garments in the passage told the physician someone was coming. He turned from the bedside and met the lovely face of Catherine Rolfe. She bowed distantly; he set his stern lips close together and went away by himself to the window. Miss Rolfe advanced to the bedside and looked on the still face of the dying girl. A sudden tremor shook her frame beneath the wealth of sables and velvets; she turned quickly to the little girl.

Digitized by Google

"Elsie, why did you not come for me? How long has she been like this?"

"Indeed, Miss Rolfe, I would have come, but Esther would not let me. She said she could not ask for charity—and you have done so much for us. Oh, madam, do you think Esther will die?"

Miss Rolfe went to the door, dismissed her carriage, threw off her cloak, and took Elsie into her arms, soothing her as best she might with her low, sweet consolations. In the solemn presence of death, there was no remembrance of the pomp and pride of worldly rank. The belle of Society had no scruples in holding to her bosom the child of lowly poverty.

So they sat there in silence through the dark hours, the pitiless rain beating against the window, the blue-eyed babe moaning over its mother, and Esther Armitage slowly drifting out on the shoreless sea. Towards midnight she rallied, opened her mild eyes and gazed round; they fell first on Miss Rolfe. A brilliant smile, making her radiantly beautiful, lit up her face.

"How kind of you!" she said faintly.

Miss Rolfe's fingers closed over hers.

"You are better now, Esther, are you not?"

"I am easier. Dear lady, in a little while I shall know no more pain for ever. My sins forgiven, I shall rest. God is good."

"Yes, and merciful. Esther, is it all well with you?"

"All well. I have no fear; beyond it is light."

Miss Rolfe was weeping softly. Dr. Woodbury drew near the bedside. Esther lay quiet a moment, then she spoke again:

"When I am dead you will find among my few papers, in the little portfolio yonder, a packet addressed to you. It is my simple history. Judge me as you always have, charitably—the dead have a claim to gentle judgment." She paused a moment for breath, then continued: "Everything is peaceful, except my anxiety for my sister and my babe. But I will not doubt. God will provide for them."

Dr. Woodbury came close to the bedside.

"If you will only give your sister to me?" he said timidly. "I am alone in the world; no one to love, no one to love me. She shall be all in all to me."

Esther gazed a moment up into the grave, tender face which leant over her, then she said:

"I do not know your name, but I can trust your eyes; there is truth in them. Take her, and be gentle with her always—dear little Elsie!"

Miss Rolfe was holding the baby; she spoke now, low and sweet:

"I have already told you that Frankie should find a home with me, Esther. Now, in the presence of witnesses, I repeat the promise, and may God deal with me as I deal with your child!"

The pale fingers of the dying mother clasped the rosy, dimpled ones of her babe; her voice sank to a whisper:

"Good-bye, my comforter."

She was dead, even as her lips ceased to move.

* * * * *

Two days afterwards there was a quiet funeral, and Esther Armitage was laid to rest. Dr. Woodbury and Elsie, Miss Rolfe, the baby, and the officiating clergyman, followed the coffin to the grave.

Elsie went home with the doctor; Miss Rolfe took the child away with her. A nurse was already provided, for Miss Rolfe, being an heiress, without parents to fetter her in any way, acted absolutely in the matter. She was engaged for the opera that evening with Mr. Mowbray. A splendid bouquet of white camellias lay there on the table before her—his gift, just brought in.

She looked at them, a latent gleam of tenderness in her eyes, half raised them to her lips, blushed and dropped them back again. Then, selecting a spray of the flowers, she twined it in her hair, her thoughts all the time wandering away to the memory of Esther Armitage. She remembered how she had looked the first time she saw her, white and thin, asking for work in a milliner's shop. Miss Rolfe's sympathies had been aroused by the air of subdued suffering hovering over her; she had sought her out and given her sewing at prices which seemed almost fabulous to the poor seamstress. She had pressed benefits upon her with an unsparing hand (for Miss Rolfe, though a woman of fashion, had a noble soul under all the worldly dross), but Esther's exquisite pride refused all charity; she would toil until death, but to beg—never!

Latterly, Miss Rolfe confessed it with shame and distress, she had lost sight of her protégée, and knew nothing of her dire extremity, until the night of Esther's death, when an old woman, who lived in the same wretched tenement with her, had informed the lady of her suffering. She had been so much occupied lately with Mr. Mowbray, that she had forgotten the seamstress, remembering her only too late to aid. But she could care for the child; she would care for him; the interest she would feel in its welfare might, in a measure, atone for her forgetfulness of the mother.

Thinking of Esther, Miss Rolfe bethought her of the sealed packet addressed to herself; she had taken it home the night of Esther's death. And with trembling fingers, while she waited for the coming of her lover, she broke the seal fixed by hands now quiet in the grave.

There were several closely-written sheets, and the beautiful woman, sitting there in that luxurious room, with the mellow splendour of amber silk curtains and velvet lounges round her, grew ashen white as she read the contents. The little gold and ormolu clock on the mantel tolled out the hour with its silvery voice—the hour when Mr. Mowbray might be expected to escort Miss Rolfe to the opera. She did not heed it; she was pacing the floor restlessly, torn with emotion, crushing fiercely the silent witness with her hand.

It was over at last; all the struggle was subdued. Lines of stern resolution settled round the scarlet mouth, and the steady light of an unalterable purpose gleamed in her eye. She took the flowers from her hair and threw them down with the drooping camellias.

A few moments later the servant announced Mr. Mowbray. She went down to him calm, cold, and self-possessed; their interview was brief and to the point. She asked his attention while she could read to him the crushed sheets before her; and she read them to him word for word—the pitiful, touching story of Esther Armitage. He listened, and no wonder that he grew pale beneath the fine scorn which displayed itself in every clear intonation of the reader; no wonder his brow flushed and his breath came thick and heavy, for the last confession of Esther Armitage told how Layton Mowbray had secretly married her, and how he had afterwards cruelly deserted her. But, poor soul, she had loved him so dearly that she would not denounce him!

He started up, an impulsive denial quivering to his lips. Miss Rolfe motioned him down.

"Be quiet, Mr. Mowbray! It is useless to add falsehood to the list of your sins. Esther Armitage is at rest. For you —whom, Heaven forgive me! I almost loved, whom now I scorn—leave me, and never again dare to come into my presence! I have the pleasure of wishing you a very good evening."

Digitized by Google

* * * * *

Elsie Armitage was happy with Dr. Woodbury. He rented a small house in the suburbs, and here, with an old woman, to whom he had rendered a service, Elsie's calm life was passed. He taught her from the books he had, and learnt to love her as the one thing left to him in all the world. She went often to see her sister's child, at Miss Rolfe's request; but Dr. Woodbury and Catherine never met, unless by pure accident, and then only ceremonious words passed between them.

Two years elapsed. Woodbury rose rapidly in his profession. Men began to speak of him with respect for his wonderful skill; he was called to the first families, and his way to fortune seemed assured. Miss Rolfe was still unmarried, as greatly admired as ever; but they called her an iceberg, and said that the heart joined to hers would be frozen to stone. Layton Mowbray was in Paris, where rumour said he was making successful suit for the hand of a gay French belle.

Day by day Catherine became more deeply attached to little Frankie Armitage, and the beautiful boy knew no dearer tie than that which united him to his benefactress.

As the summer heat drew on, a malignant fever made its appearance in the city, sweeping off old and young before its tread; and earlier than usual, on the child's account, Catherine prepared to go to her country house. The first of July found her established there, and ten days afterwards Frankie was seized with the dread malady.

Miss Rolfe dispatched a messenger at once for Dr. Woodbury, who arrived by express, but only too late. The first glance showed him that the child must die, and without reserve he told Catherine the truth. At the end of the week little Frankie lay in the great room robed for the grave, and Catherine lay in her darkened chamber, a victim of the same fatal disease that had sapped the life fountains of the child.

From her sick bed Dr. Woodbury returned home, to find Elsie in the grasp of the destroyer, and though he worked and prayed incessantly, nothing availed; she died, her burning hands in his; her half unconscious lips blessing him to the last.

After that he exposed himself recklessly. No fever-stricken house so bad that he shrank to enter it; no toil too hard for him to refuse. Back and forth from Catherine Rolfe's home to the city he journeyed, giving himself time neither to eat nor sleep, until at last the dread crisis was past.

The struggle with Catherine Rolfe was long and painful.

It was over at length; his care and patience were rewarded. He knew that she would live. Feeble and weak as an infant she was, but every day gave her a little more strength, and by the cooler days of September she was able to sit up for an hour or two by the window. Now that she was better, Dr. Woodbury turned resolutely away from her house—the dangerous sweetness of its atmosphere might make him less strong for what was to come in the future. He would destroy, if possible, every tender memory that might come back to him of those days—every sacred breath, and tone, and thrill, must be utterly and for ever annihilated.

Once he had treasured as his greatest prize a knot of crimson velvet that had fallen from Miss Rolfe's hair at a crowded assembly; but he had burnt the souvenir long ago and watched it consume to ashes.

A new existence was opening before him. A German nobleman, whose life he had saved during the prevalence of the fever, desiring to testify his gratitude in a substantial manner, had offered him the post of surgeon in a German hospital, the appointment of which was in his hands; and as the position would be of advantage to a young practitioner, Woodbury resolved to accept it. He called on Miss Rolfe to inform her of his intention, and also to bid her "Good-bye." Gladly would he have gone without this distressing formality, but common courtesy required it of him.

It was a mild day in October; the sweet air luminous with golden particles of sunshine; the leaves of the trees drifting downward, like flocks of tropical birds.

Miss Rolfe sat by the window, toying with a cluster of flowers. She had never been more lovely than she was this moment; her brilliancy had given place to gentleness, and the magnificent hair, which had once adorned her head like a royal crown, was shorn away, leaving a mass of short, clustering curls, like a little child's.

She smiled brightly up into his face and gave him a seat on the divan at her side. There was a painful constraint between them; the conversation drifted into indifferent channels. He was ill-at-ease and nervous; she, puzzled and distant. He rose at last and touched her hand with his cold fingers.

"Miss Rolfe, I shall not be able to see you again before my departure. I must wish you 'Good-bye' now."

She grew pale, rising slowly to her feet.

"Your departure, Dr. Woodbury?"

"Yes. I go to Germany next week."

"Indeed!—to be absent long?"

"For my lifetime, probably."

She crushed the sharp groan that rose to her lips; all the old pride was not yet gone out of her, but her voice was harsh and unnatural.

"Allow me to wish you Godspeed, Dr. Woodbury."

She dropped his hand and turned away. He went out at the door; some irresistible impulse forced him to look back. Miss Rolfe's face was hidden in her hands, and her whole frame shook beneath the flood of emotion that swept over her.

In a moment she was in his arms; everything was forgotten. He only knew that he had loved her for years, that he loved her still, and that his regard was requited. Station, wealth, pride—what were they? He was a man, and she was the one woman of his love.

Dr. Woodbury did not go to Germany. The German nobleman regretted it, but the doctor was happy in refusing. It was better, he thought, to be the husband of Catherine Rolfe, than a great surgeon. So he chose what seemed to him the better.

C. Moore.

HE: "I am fond of you." She: "How well we agree." He: "What, are you fond of me?" She: "Oh, no. Of myself."

MISS TRILL: "I love to hear the birds sing." Jack Downright (warmly): "So do I. They never attempt a piece beyond their ability."

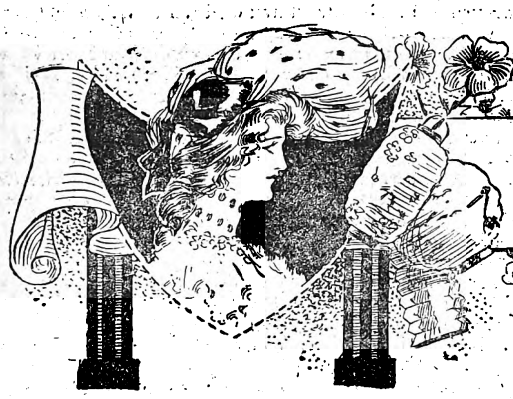
MR. WILLIAMS (Fanny's admirer): "Is your sistah going to the seaside this summah, Tommy?" Tommy: "That all depends on you. I heard ma say that if you and Fanny were engaged before the season opened, there would be no need for her to go."

MR. DREAMSLEIGH: "Yes, darling, clouds may lurk in the dim unknown future, but when with you, dearest, I think of nothing but the present—the happy, the beautiful present!" Loved One: "Yes, George, so do I; but take me with you to buy it—you men have such odd tastes in rings."

"So Marjorie Dobbins is going to be married," said the young man who had been calling on Nellie for two years, and had not declared himself. "Well, I suppose her parents will be sorry to lose her, for parents usually are, aren't they?" "Indeed, I can't say," replied Nellie, "but papa is in the next room, and you might ask him."

HE was a speculator, and for a year past nothing had been coming his way except expenses. Misfortunes never flock by themselves. One day his daughter informed him in a cold and unfeeling manner that if he did not give her a diamond tiara worth at least £150 she would elope with the coachman. 'Come to my arms, my darling child," he exclaimed, as the tears of joy coursed down his wrinkled cheeks; "come to my arms." "Do I get the tiara?" she asked, hesitating ere she accepted his invitation. "Of course not," he smiled delightedly; "you get the coachman. I owe him eight months' wages."

Digitized by Google



HER IDEAL LOVER.

Telling How He Came to Kitty Willowby Late in Life.

THE gate latch clicked cheerily as it fell from his hand, and the fresh breeze, crossing the rose garden at the left of the lawn, was sweet with the rich fragrance of roses.

The man's step grew more elastic as he left the road and walked up the path. The sweetness of the air in the cool shadow of the trees brought with it new life. He threw back his drooping shoulders, his eyes brightened, and he felt almost strong.

The hall door stood wide open. The vague, nameless charm deepened, and made him buoyant and glad. A small servant with a spotless apron answered his ring.

"Your mistress is expecting me," he began, opening his card-case, when a soft, cheerful voice interrupted him:

"Yes, you are Mr. Lawrence Allen. I received your uncle's telegram. Are you very tired?"

She was standing in the cool hall, a woman somewhat above the medium size, and past her youth. The face was strong, brave, and tender, with dark, steadfast eyes, and softly parted hair.

"Tired? I don't believe I am, Miss Willowby. At least, I don't feel so now." He held his hat in his hand and smiled at her from the doorway.

"And yet you walked—I heard no carriage, and I was expecting one."

She had offered her hand in cordial fashion, and he was thinking how cool and white and strong it was as she smiled up into his face.

"Yes, I was obliged to; there was nothing at the station and it isn't far. You must not consider me as actually an invalid."

"No, indeed," she smiled, "assuredly not. You are far too young for that."

He flushed. Somehow he felt sorry to be young.

"It's the way I look," he said quickly. "I am not so very young; I'm twenty-three."

"Are you?" she said, a little wistful smile showing about her sweet, firm lips, as she looked straight into his blue eyes. "Come in. I think you should rest awhile before you go up to your room. You will have the sitting-room to yourself for an hour or so."

They had come into it now, the cool, home-like place with its soft couches and cosy corners and wide open windows, a restful room with its dark colours and sweet odours and fresh breezes.

"I believe I was tired," he said, sinking down on a couch by the window. "But this is a delightful place, and I must have forgotten. I am glad I came, Miss Willowby; I shall be as happy as a schoolboy here."

She laughed softly. "Thank you," she said simply. "My people feel very much at home."

"Why, do you know I'd forgotten that it is a boarding house? You are not in the least like a landlady." He raised his head from the cushion and looked at her. It was hard to realise that he had not known her before

"Nevertheless, I am one, and there will be no sweets for your dinner, Mr. Allen, unless I go and make something at once. Please make yourself as comfortable as possible, and consider yourself quite at home."

When he was alone he began to look about him. A little table with some needlework on it stood near him. He stretched out his hand, and picked up the silver thimble from the folds of the sewing. It was larger than he had ever seen. How large and strong and white her hands were! Smiling, he fitted the thimble on his own fingers. It was too large for any of them.

"Dora's thimble is such a tiny affair. Her hands are such mites. I wonder what they are good for? Just to flutter about and look pretty, I suppose." He turned the thimble about and read the words, "Dear Kitty," engraved on the wide gold band.

"Kitty. That's a lover's name. People never give it unless a lot of love goes with it. A good many people must love her. I wonder who does specially? Who gave her the name and the thimble? Maybe her sweetheart." And then he laughed. Somehow the idea seemed incongruous. She was not the woman to connect with that sort of thing. "She is like mother, somehow," he mused. "A fellow feels at home when she's about." He set the thimble down and leant back on his cushion, smiling.

Through the window came the scent of the roses. Bees buzzed drowsily, tumbling lazily in and out. A butterfly floated slowly in and lost itself in the shadows across the room. Far away was the slow hum of the town. The yellow head sank more heavily upon the crimson cushion, the blue eyes closed, and Miss Willowby's new invalid boarder was asleep.

On the next day the specialist called upon his new patient in the airy bedroom upstairs. Half-an-hour passed, and the doctor came down and called for Miss Willowby.

"I'm sorry, Miss Kate, to upset any of your plans, but I'll have to have the boy brought down. The stairs won't agree with that spine of his; and we can't shut him up. Won't you let him have this room with the small bedroom beyond?"

They were standing in the sitting-room.

"Gladly, Dr. Spicer, and at once. Is—is he——"

"Of course you've heard how it happened? No? Well, there was a fire, and a child was forgotten, and he went up after it. The boy saved it, too, but he had to jump for his life, and—it's the old story."

But the great doctor said no more, and Miss Kate dared not ask.

Lawrence was delighted when the sitting-room became his own. "For it's the homeliest place I've ever dropped into; and I shall stand a chance of seeing you oftener, Miss Kitty." He looked at her with laughing, daring eyes, as he spoke the name. "I found it on your thimble," he explained penitently, as she looked at him in surprise.

Digitized by Google

She was very grave. "People do not usually call me by that name," she said.

"I know, but you are that to the people who love you, Miss Kitty. I should think nearly everybody would be calling you so. Did your—sweetheart give it to you?"

His boyish face was so frank in its half-timid daring that the stern displeasure faded from Miss Willowby's dark eyes, and she laughed brightly.

"Oh, no," she said. "I've never had a sweetheart, and I am thirty."

"I knew you were not that kind; and it's so much better," he said with grave approval.

"I've found life very full of hard work and genuine enjoyment, and there was never time for those things."

She arranged the last of the roses she had brought in, and smiled brightly across them.

"You are not like any woman I have known. Do you know"—and his blue eyes darkened and his voice softened—"that you are the memory of my mother come to life? At first it puzzled me. You see mother died when I was a little fellow, and I do not remember her. But I've always wanted her and loved her. There was no portrait, but a picture of her grew in my mind, and you are like it. You are the living picture."

There were tears in the boy's blue eyes, and Miss Willowby bent over the roses.

Dr. Spicer's new patient became a favourite among Miss Willowby's boarders. Miss Willowby herself found much time to devote to him. Sometimes she read to him, and once in a while he was able to keep her when it was too late for reading.

"You are tired of poor Bobbie Burns and his love songs," he said, as she closed the book and looked out into the growing gloom.

"No; it is only because I cannot see the words. I like the pretty verses. Besides, it is time I was looking after things outside."

"Not yet. You like the verses, and yet you were never in love?"

She laughed in her quiet, bright way. "I did not tell you that, but only that I'd never had a lover;" and a wistful smile lingered about her lips.

"But you are not the sort of woman to—to——"

"I think not," she said decidedly, a proud ring in her voice. "And yet I am able to understand. I dare say my conception of love is very defective, very far short; however, my experience has been entirely satisfactory. But all this is extremely foolish. Have you taken that last medicine? Dr. Spicer said——"

"I know, about the trained nurse. I'm not bad enough for that. But won't you explain what you were saying? Whom have you loved, Miss Kitty?"

"I shall have to defend myself. It was only an ideal—a creature of the imagination."

"I should have said you were the last person to——"

"Dream dreams?" she interrupted. "But once I was a girl, and all girls are dreamers, only sometimes the dreams are spoilt. Mine never was. There was never any time for lovers and love-making, and I was not the sort of girl to attract admirers, in any case. But always there were my dreams, even when I worked hardest for the children. Mother was so frail, and there was so much to be done. She has been at rest only a year; but before that the children were settled in life, and I had only her to work for. It was easier than working for one's self. I loved her so! But that was over, too, at last; and now nobody needs me in any special way. All along there were my lovely dreams. I have never told anyone before. It was too late for—but I have not missed or needed anything, for have I not had my——"

She stopped, a tender light in her soft eyes.

"What?" he asked, leaning forward in the dim light.

"Only my ideal, my dream-lover. He was always young and fair to see, always bonny and good and true, always coming, coming to me." Her voice was almost a whisper now. Her face was transfigured.

Lawrence bent down and touched the fair, strong hand on the window-ledge with his lips.

"Hasn't he come at last? I love you," he said softly.

Instantly she was the calm, practical woman again.

"Of course you do," she said, in a matter-of-fact way. "You are an invalid, and I've tried to be good to you. I'll light your lamps. Mrs. Ellis is leaving by the nine o'clock express. Shall I send her to bid you good-bye?"

In the flood of light she stood cool and collected, waiting for his reply.

"If you please," he stammered, his face crimson, his eyes lowered.

Almost immediately Mrs. Ellis came.

"I wish I could carry a better report to Dora and Uncle Ben," she said, looking gravely at the flushed, boyish face.

"I wish you could, thank you. At least tell them that I am as happy as a lark," he said, laughing confusedly.

"I will. Dora will be coming to see you when the season is a little nearer over, with Uncle Ben."

"Do you really think so? If only she—wouldn't!"

Mrs. Ellis laughed merrily. "Why, you bad boy, you ought to be glad to see your pretty sweetheart. People say it's as good as settled between you three. Ah, there's the carriage, and here's Miss Kate to hurry me off. Hope you'll soon be all right. Good-bye!"

The summer deepened and softened, and autumn was near. Dr. Spicer wished to have his patient out of doors while the sunshine lasted. Nobody could drive like Miss Willowby, whose hands were strong and skilful, and who knew every inch of road for miles and miles.

"I'm sorry they are coming," he said as they drove slowly along. "Dora always manages to spoil things so."

"I dare say she will have plenty of interesting news, coming straight from your own world," Miss Willowby said brightly.

"No, she won't. I say, Miss Kitty, have you forgotten what I told you on the night you read to me? I'm not such a boy as you think. I've had lots of experience, and no end of love affairs. Don't smile that way, please; I am terribly in earnest. Won't you let me be your ideal? Don't I look a little like him? I do love you, honestly; won't you love me? Somehow I believe you do already." And, bending forward, he looked laughingly into her grave eyes. "Let's get married, and then I shall be happy, if I am—not strong. And you love me, don't you? This probably isn't what that ideal has been saying, but it's the best I can do."

She turned her cool, pale face to him, and looked calmly into his eager eyes.

"I have let you say it all now. You won't do it again, will you?" she said slowly.

"I am afraid I shall, dear Kitty," he said miserably. "You are what I've been needing all along. The girls were always unsatisfactory. Why can't I say these things to you?"

"Because I can't help to take care of you, if you persist," she answered quietly.

"Not take care of me? Then I won't be taken care of at all. That's no reason."

"It is wrong. You are simply pleased with my home, and I have been able to make you comfortable. It is a sort of gratitude, and not love."

"You know better. It isn't like you to be so unfair."

But she had stopped at the gate.

Miss Willowby had always carried the invalid his tea, but to-night she was late with it.

"Put it down, please. I'm going to finish what I was saying." She placed the tray on the table, and stood before him.

"Dear Kitty, you know I'm right. Can't you see that I belong to you? I began to feel it when I heard your gate latch click behind me, when I came into the fragrance of your roses, when I looked into your eyes. Oh, the sweetness of it all! You can't help caring for me."

"No," she said quietly, "I cannot."

"Then let me have my way, dear Kitty."

"Have you thought of what you are saying? Don't you see how impossible it is? I am not a young woman. Soon I shall be faded and old. You are a boy, with life all before you." Her voice was not quite steady here, but she went on: "Your friends would ridicule the idea."

Digitized by Google

"As if I were to blame for being a boy! And besides, haven't you been loving a boy all along in that ideal of yours? And haven't I told you that you have always been in my heart? Don't put me off. It's bad enough to have the doctors looking graver every day——"

"Hush. You may be well again."

"They haven't said so."

"But your uncle and Dora! No, it is not to be thought of."

"I have no one to please; answer me!"

"Lawrence, I will answer you five years from to-night. Your uncle will want you to try other doctors, so you will go away. Come to see me when the five years are past, and I will answer you. I shall be five-and-thirty then. In the meantime, do whatever you want to; of course you will not feel bound in any way. Now, that is all. Please do not speak of it again;" and she left him.

Shortly after this Dora came—Dora, with her curly, flaxen hair, brown eyes, and dimpled face. She was pretty as a flower.

Behind the pretty vision came Uncle Ben, an old man with fierce, grizzled side whiskers, and small, fiery eyes.

"Oh, Larry, how ill you look! Oh, have you actually been shut up in this doleful place all the summer? I've had a delightful time. Are you getting worse, Larry?"

"I'm sure I don't know, Dora. Nobody has told me. It may be the way folks get well. Anyhow, I'm quite happy."

"Oh, dear me, don't talk so. Uncle Ben, don't let him! I'm afraid you must be going to die, you know."

Uncle Ben scowled fiercely, and Miss Willowby, laughing in her cheery way, took Dora out.

"Now you know what I meant," Lawrence said to Miss Willowby next morning. "Girls are—unsatisfactory."

"But this is a wonderfully pretty one," she said.

"Pretty—yes, she's that, and nothing more. Do you know, the doctors were graver than ever this morning? Not even Spicer could get up a smile. Of course, you saw them?" He smiled as he stood unsteadily before the small, bright fire that crackled on the hearth. "Dear Kitty, I am surely not doing well. Only think, I—hush, that was my name. He is in the hall. Be still—I will hear!"

With his bright eyes holding her, he listened. The hall door was ajar. Yes, Uncle Ben was speaking in a high, impatient voice.

"Bravery, indeed! And he will find out about the bank failure. The boy is ruined. I tell you, Dora, you must help him. He gladly lost half his fortune securing yours for you. Not engaged? Who cares? It has always been my plan to marry you two, and you said you loved him. Get him to propose now, and marry the boy at once."

Then Dora's voice came to them.

"Oh, well, of course, I loved Larry, but I'm glad he never proposed. He never shall, either. I don't want a poor man for my husband; and what should I want with him, any way, if he is to be helpless and blind?"

Before the cheery fire the unsteady form swayed. Miss Willowby's strong arm lowered it gently to the couch. Lawrence closed his eyes; his face was white.

"Helpless and blind!" he whispered.

"Nothing is certain. They think so. There is always hope."

"How long will it take?"

"It will be gradual; you can bear it."

"Will it take—five years? Because then I shall have you to help me bear it."

Her hot tears splashed on his hand.

"You have me now—always," she said.

His face was illumined. "I can bear it. I need not wait the five years?" he exclaimed, his eyes on her face.

A smile shone in her steadfast eyes.

"Not five hours, unless you will." Ellen Wycoff.

Your Editor Chats.

More about "Empire Day."

Tuesday, May 24th, is the eighty-fifth anniversary of the birth of our late Queen and Empress, the beloved Victoria.

In order to commemorate our late Queen's birthday, the organisers of the Fresh Air Fund wish to give to many poor children a monster day's outing in the country later on in the summer. This day will be known as "Empire Day." Won't you subscribe just a small sum for the "Empire Day" Fund? The smallest donation will be thankfully received. Will those who intend that their gifts should be devoted especially to "Empire Day" please note that their offerings should be sent in envelopes addressed to the Hon. Secretary, Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and should have "Empire Day" marked in the top left-hand corner.

A Guinea Won.

I have much pleasure in announcing that I have awarded the guinea I offered in connection with the Love-Problem, "The Test of Ruth Lawson," to A. R. Hayward, 190 Northumberland Avenue, Tottenham, N.

Result of the "Signature" Competition.

No one sent in a correct set of solutions to this competition. One competitor succeeded in sending more correct solutions than the others, three were next bracketed together; two following share the third prize, and sixteen the eight succeeding prizes, as below:

Edward Barnes, 68 Lydford Road, Paddington, W. Prize, £10.

Miss Annie Corbishley, The Elms, Shaw Heath, Stockport.
W. Gibbs, 37 Old Fillebrook Road, Leytonstone, N.E.
C. T. Marshall, 32 Granton Road, Liverpool.
} £1 13s. 4d. each.

W. C. Lee, 160 Shaw Heath, Stockport.
R. Waddington, 17 Langham Road, Blackburn.
} Prize of £2 divided equally.

The following receive 10s. each: J. N. Coombs, 41 Southwater Road, St. Leonards; J. Anderson, 9 Osborne Street, Sherwood, Notts; Miss S. Ogden, St. Peter's Avenue, Knutsford; Miss Ada Lee, 160 Shaw Heath, Stockport; Jas. Lee, 160 Shaw Heath, Stockport; Jas. Angus, Redclyffe, Cardross, N.B.; J. W. Dimaline, 64 Apley Road, Doncaster; F. M. Burd, 23 Hibbert Street, Rusholme, Manchester; Edward Burt, 5 Sidney Terrace, Bellevue Road, Totterdown, Bristol; H. Bell, South Lawn, Bishop's Stortford; L. Halstead, 33 Tennyson Street, Lee Mount, Halifax; H. G. Harris, 22 Foulser Road, Balham, S.W.; W. E. Hughes, 244 Kennington Road, S.E.; S. M. Owens, Peterboro' Avenue, Wycombe; C. J. Ingrey, 25 Ranelagh Grove, Westminster, S.W.; F. W. Rabnott, 117 Sixth Avenue, Manor Park.

The following is the list of correct solutions: 1, J. N. Montgomery; 2, Robert Allinson; 3, W. McGregor; 4, F. P. Knowles; 5, Frank Thos. Way; 6, T. Harker; 7, J. R. Fairhurst; 8, Edward Diven; 9, Geo. A. Nunns; 10, Alf. Redman; 11, W. B. Whitelaw; 12, D. Cooper; 13, Chas. Wiscombe; 14, A. P. Speakman; 15, R. H. Pattinson; 16, F. McGurgan; 17, H. Varenne-Cullevne; 18, G. Margaritis; 19, A. E. Rea; 20, P. Campbell Forbes; 21, J. T. Greenroyd; 22, D. Joseph Schneider; 23, F. Wiles; 24, A. J. Frazer; 25, Thomas R. Brown; 26, Henry Ogden Howcroft; 27, W. G. Andrew; 28, Gwynllyan Wykeham Williams; 29, R. N. Kennedy; 30, Arthur Taylor; 31, C. O. Colchester; 32, Winnie Mouton; 33, Stanley Read; 34, William Newman Yeo; 35, Edward Elford Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

Our Dinner at Bawlins' . . Lodge. . .

The Tale of a Dinner That Was a Failure, and of a Fortune That Was Won.

All that I remembered of my bachelor uncle, James Bawlins, was, when I was a small boy, seeing him walk out of the house with a black look when my father asked him for a loan of some money. I was then five years old; I am now twenty-five, and newly married. My father had been dead a year, and I had supported him in the latter days, letting the old gentleman potter about the house while I worked at my desk in the bank.

I could not have recognised Uncle James had I seen him after these twenty years. I knew that as many as twenty relatives, men, women, and children, had been visiting him, and, no doubt, smiling upon him, and talking about Brother James, and Cousin James, and Uncle James. For the old gentleman was very rich.

Bawlins' Lodge, his country residence, was situated in the midst of broad lands, and was secluded to a degree that was melancholy.

When the following letter came I was rendered by it a little gleeful and a little bewildered. Fanny, my wife, said it was horribly sarcastic. I stuck to it that Uncle James wished to be reconciled, and intended to remember me in his will. I told Fanny not to make this remark of mine public, lest it should get to his ear, and ruin my expectations.

The letter was as follows:

"Bawlins' Lodge, April 8th.

"My Dear Nephew,—You have never visited your dear, old, rich, mortal uncle. Hadn't you better come up, as well as the rest of his beloved relatives, to see how he is spending the small remnant of his term of existence on earth? Wouldn't you like to see how happy he can be on being perpetually reminded that he is not heirless? Most affectionately yours,

"James Bawlins."

I sent word to my uncle that I should be most happy to visit him, with my wife, on the Saturday of the following week. I got a few days' leave from the bank, almost at the risk of losing my situation. Fanny trembled when I told her, I laughed.

On the Saturday in question we two were landed from the train at a little station, in the midst of a little village, a hundred miles from London. It was a clear, but very cold, afternoon.

Awaiting us at the station was a lovely carriage and pair, with an old coachman wrapped up in furs.

We were not sorry when the door of that great house—that stone palace—was reached, and we were received into the warmth and glow of the beautiful hall, and thence up to the beautiful drawing-room. For we were chilled; I might say, also, that we were hungry, and that, for my part, I was depicting in my mind a sumptuous feast, to which presently we should be invited. I was not disappointed. We were promptly invited to sit down at a table sumptuously provided.

We had been received at the door and attended to by a man so large and fat, and so red in the face, as to cause me at once to classify him among the few extraordinary personages whom it had been my good fortune in the course of my life to meet.

He lifted upon us the light of his ruddy countenance as though he were the very host himself. A sound like a guttural laugh came now and then from the depths of his fat chest. After he shook my hand, I was afraid to have him shake Fanny's, lest he should hurt her, for he gave mine a vice-like grip. She did scream a little.

The hospitality of his welcome, however, did us both good.

My uncle, or at least any person whom I might have taken for him, did not appear, and we asked no questions, supposing that he would shortly make himself visible.

What we wanted just then was what we were invited to partake of as soon as we should become sufficiently warmed—dinner.

As I have said before, the dinner was sumptuous. The servant, on removing the covers from the dishes, was ordered away, and our fat entertainer rose from his seat at the table, locked the door of the room, and pocketed the key.

"I am your dear, old, rich, mortal uncle," said he, reseating himself at the head of the table, and glancing smilingly from us upon the viands that were huddled together before him—roast beef and roast turkey, vegetables, pastry, coffee, wine, and so on; "and I am most happy to see under my roof, and at my table, too, more of my numerous heirs. Indeed," he continued, while he carved from the meat a rich slice, and put it on a plate, "I am glad to know that I have heirs to whom my fortune may become a blessing."

He put vegetables on the plate, placed the plate before him, poured gravy over all, and then a goodly portion of sauce. I was on the point of reaching out my hand to receive the dish, and pass it to Fanny, when he proceeded to eat from it himself.

"A tender piece of meat," he said, talking on, and at the same time eating like an ogre. "Roast beef ought to be well done. This is just right. It is juicy and nourishing."

"Fanny, I believe, would like a piece of it," I ventured to suggest, wondering at the eccentricity of his behaviour and urged by hunger.

"Beef is the staff of life," he continued, without appearing to notice my hint. "After a little jaunt I don't know its equal. It goes to the right spot, and sets one up again, and puts one in a cheerful mood for the drawing-room of an evening."

"What you say is very true," I said, "and Fanny would like——"

"Here's the wine, now," he said, still not appearing to notice my hint.

He had been gourmandising at the meat until its dimensions were very much reduced. He now reached out his fat hand to a bottle of wine that, with several others, stood on the floor near him. He drew the cork and poured out a glassful, and, nodding his head to us, drank the wine off at a gulp.

"Ha!" he exclaimed, "old port! That's the stuff."

Desperate, and a little exasperated, I reached out my hands to carve off a slice from the turkey, that being nearest me. Still talking on, he warded off my hands, and I sank back into my chair again, angry and amazed.

"What does this mean?" I demanded. "Have you invited us here to tantalise us? Come, Fanny"—and I offered my arm to Fanny—"we will go."

He drank off six full glasses, one after the other, within the brief space of time in which Fanny was rising from the table and accompanying me to the door.

Digitized by Google

I had forgotten that he had locked the door. I tried to open it, and then we two turned to him. I demanded the key. With his eyes turned to us, he poured out and drank off glass after glass, till he had emptied the first bottle and was drawing upon the second. And still he drank, with his fat, red face turned to us as we stood there.

Returning desperate manners for ill manners, I stalked up to him, and vented my feelings in an outburst of indignation. He rose to his feet, and steadied himself by holding on to the table. His great red face fairly burnt at me.

"I want the key!" I cried; and I seized him, to give emphasis to my demand.

He shook me off, and drank again, and staggered towards Fanny. I sprang between, and he returned to the table, and drank two or three glasses more. Again I tried to slice off a piece of turkey, thinking that Fanny would need something to sustain her till we might reach some resting place away from this inhospitable and outrageous place, if, indeed, we should succeed in escaping thence; for, indeed, the suspicion was creeping into my mind that this uncle of mine was mad, and might end in harming us in some way. He prevented me with a physical strength against which it was vain for me to cope.

"Let us out!" I cried.

"Won't you ever come again?" were the first definite words of recognition of us that this monstrous uncle had yet greeted us with.

The words sounded so rational that I roared back:

"Never, you inhospitable old boor! Give us the key, and let us out!"

He felt in his pocket, and staggered towards the door; but just then there rose from the other side a loud outcry, and then an impatient kicking.

I verily believe that the vast rotundity of my uncle's face, with the exception of his nose, turned pale. He stood still on the floor, and stared at the door.

"Open this door!" was roared from the other side, and then came another volley of kicks.

Finally there was given from the other side a violent push that burst open the door, and there came tumbling in, almost off his feet, a thin, dark old gentleman, followed by two o three servants.

"What's the matter?" demanded the old gentleman. "Who are you?" and, with his eyes glaring, he turned full upon the fat man.

The fat man made no reply.

"He came here ten days ago," explained a servant; "two hours after you left for your journey."

"Who is he, and what is he, and what the dickens is he getting drunk in my house for? Put him out!"

"I am your nearest relative," the fat man said.

"My nearest fiddlesticks! Put the lout out! Put him out! Out with him!"

The fat man sat plump down on the floor. He weighed something like fourteen stone, I should think; or more.

"Roll him out!" shouted the old gentleman. "Now, then," turning to us, "who are you?"

"I am James Bawlins," I said; "this is my wife."

The old gentleman eyed us. Suddenly he turned away, and railed at his servants, who were tugging at the fat man.

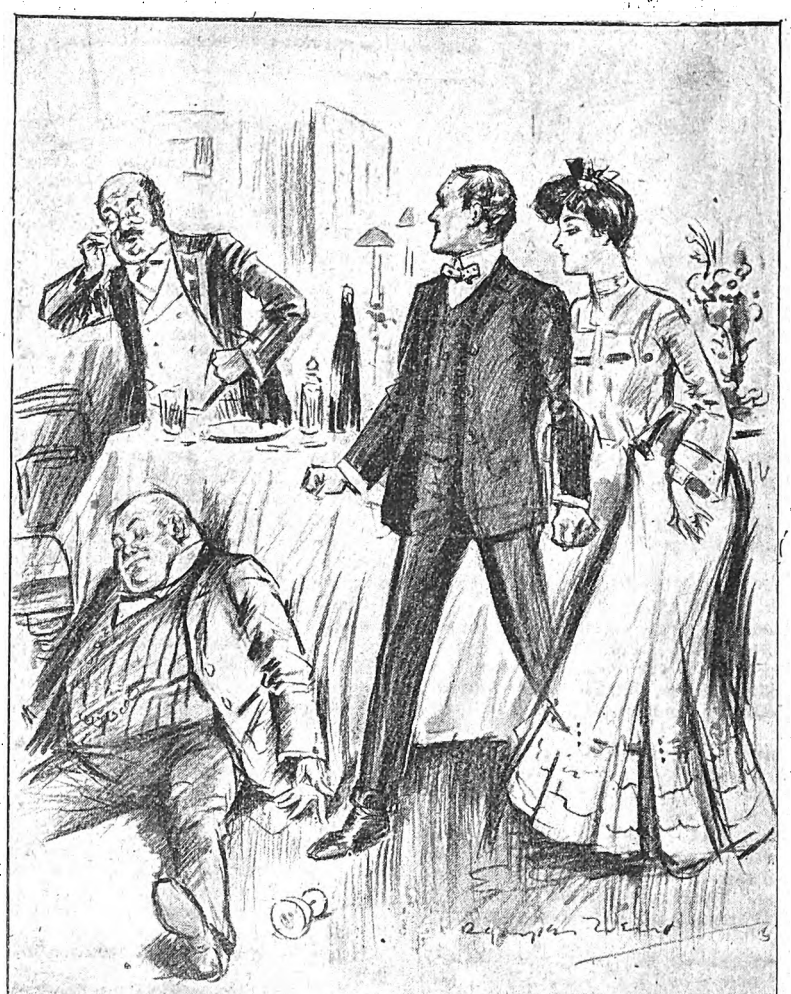
"We are going," I said. "You needn't fear we are not. We thought you invited us here; but there is evidently some mistake. This gourmandiser has played the host, and has prevented us from eating anything, so that we haven't touched a morsel. Did you write that letter?"

I handed him the letter of invitation. He read it.

"No, sir," said he, "I did not write that letter. But stay—I like your spirit; it is the Bawlins spirit; I am proud of it. I like your wife's looks—this is your wife? Stay, stay! I am your uncle! You have never come to see me, rich as I am. You're proud, eh? Well, well, I like that sort of pride. But when you thought I wrote this letter to you, you were willing to forgive my treatment of your father, and to come. I treated him badly, mind—badly. I might have helped him, and I ought to have helped him. My heart was hard."

The upshot of the matter was, that my uncle took Fanny and me into his favour, and our prospects are rosy.

F. Murray.



The fat man sat plump down on the floor. He weighed something like fourteen stone, probably more.

Digitized by Google

TOO DEVOTED.

Showing That it is Best to be Contented.

"YES," said Mrs. Cameron, in answer to her friend's remark, "I like him well enough, I suppose."

Mrs. Cameron was just nineteen, a bride of six months, and a lovely, hazel-eyed brunette. She had everything that heart could desire, and consequently wasn't exactly pleased with anything.

Mrs. Cameron liked pink, and Mr. Cameron had furnished her boudoir in rose-colour and silver. She was partial to flowers, and her husband had given a standing order to a florist to keep her wants supplied. She was fond of birds, and three or four gilded cages swung from the ceiling, each one thrilling with delicious melody. In fact, Mrs. Cameron had everything she wanted, and, as previously intimated, was far from satisfied.

"Like him well enough!" repeated Annie Clark, who, having just left school, thought that a young wife who had wedded the man she loved, ought to be extremely happy. "Oh, Rosie! how coldly you speak!"

"Well, I can't help it," said Mrs. Cameron, letting her head fall languidly back on the rose-satin cushions of the low easy-chair on which she sat. "One gets tired of cake and champagne all the time. Sometimes I think I should be happier if Clarence didn't worship me quite so devotedly."

"Oh, Rosie!"

"It's a bore, you know," said the young wife, confidentially. "It would be a relief if he could find fault occasionally. He's too good! Now, Sophie Markham is actually afraid of her husband—a great handsome fellow, with a lovely black silk moustache like an Italian brigand. Oh, it must be charming to be a little afraid of one's husband!"

"Now, Rosie!" cried the astounded Miss Clark, "what nonsense you are talking!"

"I dare say it may seem so to you, child," said Mrs. Cameron, patronisingly. "But if you ever get married——"

"Of course I shall," said pretty Annie, who had not the slightest idea of being an old maid.

"Well, when you are about to get married, don't marry a man who is 'sugar and spice and all that's nice!' It's much too insipid!"

"You'd recommend, on the contrary, 'snaps and snails and puppy dogs' tails,' eh?" laughed Annie, also quoting a nursery rhyme

"Not exactly that; but one does get tired of perpetual honey and sunshine," said unreasonable Rosie, as she reached out her hand for her embroidery. "And now you know you promised to tell me all about Kitty Smith's trousseau."

As it happened, Mrs. Cameron's beautiful drawing-room was separated from her boudoir by portieres. Mr. Cameron, reading his paper, sat on the other side of the draperies, and heard this conversation—an eavesdropper in spite of himself. His cheeks burnt, he bit his lips, and the blood rushed in little tingling, needle-like particles through his whole frame.

So Rosie was getting tired of him! Well, after all, it was better to thoroughly comprehend the whole state of the case. He was too amiable, was he?

Mr. Cameron rose, flung aside the crumpled newspaper, and walked once or twice the length of the rooms.

"I'll see that the fault is corrected," he said to himself with a grim smile. And he went off to business without the usual good-bye kiss in which he generally indulged.

Mrs. Cameron went out shopping in the afternoon, and was detained a little, but it did not worry her in the least.

"Clarence doesn't mind," said she; and so she spent an extra half hour in deciding whether she would have tan or pearl grey for her new kid gloves, and whether she looked better in a hat trimmed with sweet-brier or simple field daisies.

"I'm a little late, I'm afraid," she said, as she entered the dining-room, where her husband was pacing up and down like the proverbial "caged lion" of romance.

"Late, madam! I should say you were!" retorted her husband in a tone which fairly made Mrs. Cameron start. "It's half-past seven, if it's a second. But I suppose you think my time is of no value."

"Clarence!"

"I've borne this long enough," went on the indignant husband. "And I give you fair notice that I shall bear it no longer. Jane!"—to the girl—"bring in the dinner at once, and to-morrow let it be served at seven, punctually, whether your mistress is here or not."

"Yes, sir," said Jane, as she disappeared, grinning, into the kitchen.

Mrs. Cameron sat down, crimson to the very roots of her hair.

"Clarence," she said, with difficulty controlling her voice, "is it necessary to insult me thus before the servants?"

"Yes, madam, it is. If a wife doesn't comprehend her duty, it is high time she should be made to do so. I will trouble you for a cup of coffee."

Mrs. Cameron was mortified, stunned—dazed. She was entirely unused to this style of domestic reproof. Almost before the dessert—with which her husband found plenty of fault, intimating that it would be better if his wife remained at home to attend to household matters a little more, instead of gadding abroad the whole time—the door bell sounded.

"It's dear mamma and Aunt Lizzie come to spend the evening," said Rosie, jumping up.

"Confound them!" roared Mr. Cameron, smiting the table with his fist; "can't I have a quiet evening once in a while?"

Digitized by Google

"I—I told them you would take us all to the theatre to-night," hesitated Rosie, the colour coming and going changefully on her face.

"In-deed! May I ask, madam, who authorised you to make that statement?" crisply queried her husband. "Am I a mere puppet in your hands, and am I supposed to have no will or desire of my own?"

"But you will go, won't you, Clarence?" faltered poor Rosie.

"No, madam, I will not," said Mr. Cameron, rising and looking for his hat. "I propose to spend the evening quietly at my club."

He bolted out of the room, nearly falling over his mother-in-law in the passage, and muttering to himself:

"By Jove! if I'd stopped another minute those tears would have conquered me. Poor little Rosie!"

It was past twelve before he returned. Never, in all the experience of their married life, had he been so late before.

"Sitting up, eh?" said he, savagely. "Now, Mrs. Cameron, I mean to put an end, once for all, to this sort of thing."

"I was so anxious about you, Clarence," pleaded poor Rosie.

"Anxious!" sneeringly repeated he. "Do you suppose John Markham allows his wife to sit up for him?"

"Oh, Clarence! I wouldn't have you like John Markham for the world!" exclaimed Rosie, bursting into tears.

"Wouldn't you?" said he, the faintest suspicion of a smile glimmering under the ends of his moustache. "Now, I thought it would be charming to be a little afraid of one's husband, and you know 'sugar and spice and all that's nice' grows insipid.

Mrs. Cameron sprang to her feet.

"Clary!"

"Rosie!"

"Did you hear what I said this morning?"

"I did, Mrs. Cameron, and I thought I would shape my conduct to suit your taste."

"Don't do it any more, Clary," she said, with a quivering lip, and her bright eyes lifted wistfully to his face. "I don't like it; it isn't nice to be afraid of one's husband."

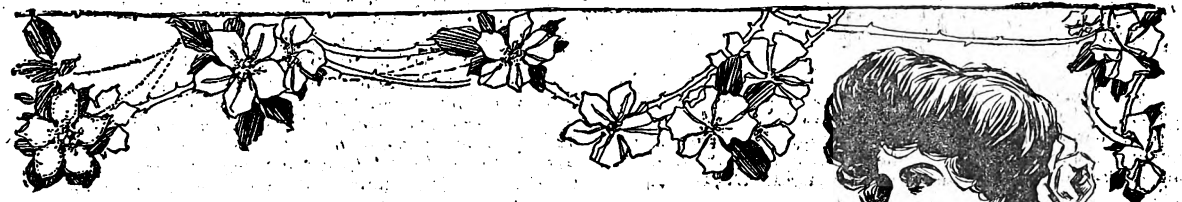
"Just as you please," said her husband, laughing. "I only wanted to adapt myself to your wishes, Rosie."

"But I was such a goose!" cried Rosie. "Dear Clary, I have cried my eyes out to-night trying to make out what could possibly have changed you so. And you were only making believe all the time?"

"Only making believe," he acknowledged.

Then they kissed and made friends after the orthodox fashion, and their honeymoon began over again for the second time. But Rosie made no more complaints about Mr. Cameron being a "too devoted husband."

F. P. Barfoot.



DISILLUSIONED!

Showing How Dr. Stephens Counted His Chickens Before they were Hatched.

People said Dr. Stephens ought to marry. He thought so himself; but hitherto he had been too busy providing means for keeping a wife, to bestow much thought on whom she was to be. He had decided that the lady must have good looks, good means, and be of a good position; but, though several ladies in Perivale fulfilled all these requirements, his choice had not yet fallen on any one of them. And, besides, he was not in the least in love.

It would be imprudent to venture the assertion that Dr. Stephens had always remained indifferent to the pretty and agreeable girls he had met in his wanderings; and being a fairly attractive fellow, as well as Perivale's only medical practitioner, it is safe to say that eyes of every hue had looked upon him with more or less favour.

Oh! yes. He had had his intermittent love affairs. There was Maggie Scott. He had loved her to distraction for two months, when she wore a particularly sweet thing in hats; when the hat went out of fashion, Dr. Stephens' love went with it.

Again, there was Minnie Grey. His heart in this "case" had capitulated to the peculiarly fascinating manner in which the fair damsel lisped. He overheard her speak to her brother once, and——

But these and others were but the idle dreamlets of a day, and Dr. Stephens sighed for the genuine article that wears well. He excused his seeming inconstancy on the plea that love is a lottery, and, if one wishes to win, one must at least play. So he accordingly played battledore with the hearts of the fair eligibles on his list of patients, and kept his eyes open and watched his heart carefully, expecting to experience some day that sudden sense of rapture—that magnificent thrill which, as everybody knows, is the first and true symptom of the proper, and the legitimate, and the all-sufficing love—the love Dr. Stephens sighed for.

"It's all a matter of pulsation," the doctor assured himself. "If you think you're in love, feel your pulse. Cupid's barometer is the thing to go by."

One afternoon, about four o'clock, Dr. Stephens seated himself in his consulting-room, and passed his fingers thoughtfully through his hair, which could not, even in courtesy, be called auburn. He was very weary waiting for that magnificent thrill which he expected to experience some day, and he sighed profoundly as he glanced round the rather dismal room. How uncomfortable and cheerless it was, to be sure; how much it lacked the tender touches of a woman's hand, the charm of a woman's presence. And the little, low arm-chair by the hearth there—when would it be filled by the sweet little form—the unknown but coming somebody—that Dr. Stephens loved to picture in it? How very nice it sounded, to be sure! My—little—wife—wife. My—wee—wife. My——

"A letter, sir."

It was the doctor's servant who broke in upon his reverie.

Digitized by Google

He frowned as he lifted the letter carelessly from the table, and opened it slowly. It was very brief, containing only these words:

"Dovecot House, Tuesday.

"Dear Sir,—Please come and see me at once.—Yours truly,

"Babs Grantley."

"Babs," he repeated. "What a funny name. Something nice about it, too. Some antediluvian spinster, I suppose, whose name is the only nice thing about her. Imperious, too, by George! I heard there were new tenants at Dovecot."

That is what John Stephens, M.D., as he signed himself, said before he saw Miss Barbara Grantley; and when his well-appointed brougham rolled along Perivale's only street, and drew up in the pretty garden in front of Dovecot House, our doctor, all unconscious of his impending fate, complacently jingled a couple of guineas in his trousers pocket, with the agreeable expectation of soon adding a third.

"Doctor Stephens," announced a smiling little maid, in a low voice; and as the doctor advanced with the door closing behind him, it was to see that he was in a prettily-furnished boudoir; while reclining on a couch near the fireplace was a lady, who immediately acknowledged his presence by a charming smile and bow. And then?—at last! Dr. Stephens experienced that magnificent thrill he had been waiting for so long. His heart thumped away, just as it ought to; his legs trembled; he felt a cold shiver up and down his spine; his mouth opened and closed several times in an aimless sort of a way; his pulse—but, in brief, he rapidly experienced every symptom which attends and indicates the existence of the proper, the legitimate, the genuine love. His happiness made him almost dizzy, and he had to seize hold of one of the chairs for support. Yes, this was love; there could not possibly be any mistake about it this time.

Vainly he endeavoured to assume his usual matter-of-fact, professional politeness. His heart beat so fast he could hardly speak.

"My patient, Miss Grantley, I presume. Would you—ah, ha——" he began, advancing towards the couch, with the assistance of the chair backs. (How funny his legs felt, to be sure!)

"Would you—ah, ah——," he repeated, taking Miss Grantley's proffered hand—which little courtesy had the wonderful effect of sending a second edition of that magnificent thrill through Stephens' sensitive system.

"Would you—ah, ha——" he solemnly repeated, determined to have it out this time, "would you allow me to see your pulse, and let me feel your tongue."

Now, Dr. Stephens had not the slightest intention of being amusing, but, to his infinite disgust, he discovered as soon as he spoke that Miss Grantley was greatly amused. She pressed her handkerchief to her face and bit her lips; but after a moment's futile struggle, she laughed outright, and evidently only checked herself when he looked so furious. In consideration for his injured feelings, she assumed an air of mild but preternatural seriousness.

"It—it—isn't my pulse or my tongue," she gravely explained, "it's my ankle, sir, and only a slight sprain."

Dr. Stephens was excessively embarrassed. He was not altogether stupid; and really, when we consider the suddenness of the thing it amply excuses the exhibition of a little foolishness and nervousness. And then to be asked to look at and touch her ankle!—and a very pretty ankle it was, too!

Apologising profusely, the doctor carefully—very carefully—examined the pretty little foot that just peeped out from among the many folds of Bab's skirts; and he vowed—to himself—that he would gladly go on bathing and bandaging his fair subject for ever.

Babs certainly looked nice. She was a small and dainty young lady with bonny, roguish blue eyes, and a wealth of wilful golden hair that frizzled over her brow, and looked as if it had been ruffled by many a sunny summer breeze. Dr. Stephens noticed with keen, observant eye the curling sweep of the long, brown lashes that shaded the delicately-rounded cheek, and, for the first time in his professional career, physical weakness struck him as the most pathetic and attractive aspect under which he had ever studied woman. He took a long time bandaging that little foot, and by the time it was finished he had quite recovered himself. His touch seemed to do her foot good; and Babs, watching the careful manipulation of bandaging, and listening to the pleasant, cheerful voice assuring her that she would be well again in a few weeks, felt that, strange though Dr. Stephens had been on his arrival, she could have no kinder or more skilful physician. Indeed, by the time Dr. Stephens took his departure, she had voted him "quite nice."

* * * * *

Dr. Stephens gave himself a month to accomplish the conquest of Miss Grantley's foot and heart; but before the third week was at an end he had realised that he had undervalued his powers of surgery and fascination. The sprain had certainly surrendered to his skill, and, building his faith on a dozen or so of smiles and glances, he allowed himself to entertain the agreeable belief that her heart had also surrendered to himself? He had often been told that he might choose a wife when and where he liked, and, with consummate conceit, he had lately thought the same thing himself.

Babs always seemed glad to see him, and she was wholly at ease with him. Indeed, she was always so gay and good-humoured that Dr. Stephens glowed and flourished in his own opinion—that opinion being that she was certainly very much in love with him. He would propose to her!

And then he fell into a delightful reverie, and pictured to himself the scene. He would kneel by that little couch by the fireplace and would ask her in tender phrases if she would be his wife. And then he wondered would his darling faint, or would she sink gracefully into his arms and whisper "Dear youth, I will!"

Dressing one evening with the punctilious care born of a long bachelor life, and with many hesitating doubts and fears, Dr. Stephens set out on an all-important visit to Dovecot House—a visit fraught with matrimonial intentions.

With as martial a step as he could command, Dr. Stephens went to Dovecot House, and instantly rang the bell very, very tenderly. He must not, he thought, alarm his little darling.

"I shall find my way, you need not trouble to come with me," he said to the smiling maid whose duty it was to attend to the door and announce arrivals. "Miss Grantley, I presume, is in the same room as usual?"

"Yes, sir; but please, sir, she's engaged just now."

But the doctor did not hear. Slowly, very slowly he went up the soft-carpeted staircase, and paused for a brief moment at the door before entering. His heart had resumed its stentorian thumping; his legs trembled—all, of course, in joyful anticipation of his coming happiness. He softly, very softly, turned the handle and opened the door. But, oh, what did the sight which met his gaze mean?

Standing in the embrasure of the window, with his arm round Babs' waist, was a tall and fair stranger! In his other hand he held a small golden ring, which he was showing to her.

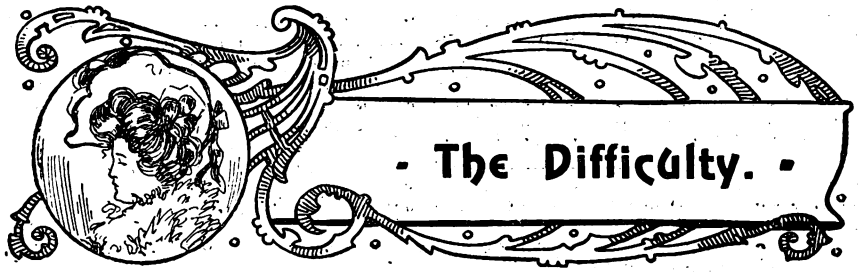
"Isn't it strange, darling?" Dr. Stephens heard this tall, and fair, and unknown somebody say to—Babs, his Babs!—"isn't it strange, darling, that within the little circle of this ring there should be so much happiness and love, and hope for you and me? You must always wear it, dear, and, wearing it, remember that our love, like it, is without end. Babs!" he exclaimed, "oh, Babs, my darling!——"

Dr. Stephens did not wait to hear more. Softly, as softly as he had opened it, he closed the door, and slunk down the staircase like a convicted felon. Outside he leant against the garden wall and endeavoured to pull together his shattered energies.

"Shouldn't I just like to dissect that fellow, that's all!" he muttered. "But, no, I wouldn't," he added, in the same breath. "She—she loves him, and, and—that" something."

S. Perry.

Digitized by Google



The Difficulty.

"You understand that I expect you to look after my three rooms, sweep and dust, and all that sort of thing?"

"Yes," remarked Mrs. Peterson; "I understand. The rooms suit me perfectly," she went on as they passed downstairs again, "and I shall begin to move to-morrow. It will be so nice to turn round and not always be running into somebody. And now Mr. Peterson's sister is living with us. Well, good-day. The things will begin to come after to-morrow. Good-day."

Theodore Foster stood looking after her a moment; then he went into the empty sitting-room and took the large "Apartments to Let" notice from the front window. He carried it up to his own room. "I hope it will be a long time before I have to see you again," he told it as he put it in his desk.

It was the first time for a month that he had felt really happy. During that time he had tried to get a tenant for his house, but had been unable to find a suitable one. It had been horribly lonely coming home at night to a cold, echoing house. But now he would have the Petersons there, and he looked forward to the day after to-morrow with joy. He used to know Joe Peterson, but he supposed he wouldn't see much of him, as Joe was away from home all the week. There were the children, too. He was fond of children, even if he was an old bachelor. Then he remembered that the children must be nearly grown up by this time. Well, young people were almost as good as children.

It was the next day, while he was out taking his constitutional, that his friend Everson saw him and crossed the street to talk to him. "So you have got the Petersons?" he said, after they had walked some distance together. "Well, there's only one thing about them that you won't like."

"What is that?" questioned Mr. Fos'er.

"Their piano."

"Oh, I don't mind piano practice as some do," said Theodore easily. "In fact, I rather like it."

"You haven't lived with the Petersons yet," said Everson sententiously. "You wait a little. It's a terribly old piano. I could get more music out of a brass kettle and tin pans. It's all out of tune, too; and, worst of all, they keep banging away on it all the time. It's something awful! There are three girls who take lessons, and they keep the old thing going about nine hours a day."

Theodore's face had lengthened during this description. "What makes them keep such an antiquity?" he asked.

"Well, you see, they're rather poor, and they can't afford a new one."

Theodore walked moodily along after his friend had left him. Then suddenly his face brightened. "I can arrange matters all right," he said, and went on more briskly.

The next morning there was considerable grumbling from the two men who moved the Petersons' belongings because Mr. Theodore Foster insisted on helping them.

He was especially troublesome about the placing of the piano. He insisted on having it on the very end of the load, and tied it with his own hands. When the horses started, he trotted along beside it, and they reached the house at the same time.

It was a raw morning, and the men were putting blankets on the horses, when suddenly there came a jangling crash. They hurried to the back of the van and found Theodore looking in horror and dismay at the very badly smashed piano. "It's all my fault" was all he managed to say before a torrent of abuse and oaths loud and deep overwhelmed him.

Theodore went and told Mrs. Peterson about the accident, and after he had gone a loud wail rose from the three girls, but when the household effects were moved in and the Petersons themselves went to their new home, there, in the drawing-room, was a beautiful, brand-new piano awaiting them.

They all stood in the doorway and stared in amazement.

"Mr. Foster had it sent," Aunt Sarah Peterson explained. She had been there attending to that end of the moving. "He said that as it was due to his carelessness that the other was wrecked, he should take the liberty of replacing it by this one."

Maud, the eldest girl, went and tried the instrument. "Isn't it beautiful?" she cried rapturously.

Time went on, and the girls practised diligently. Their aunt also took advantage of the chance to play, so that Theodore had all the music he wanted.

One day Theodore asked Maud to go with him to the piano shop.

"I want you to try them all," he said, "and see if there is one you like better than the one at home."

Maud tried them. "No," she declared, "there isn't one so nice."

"By the way, won't you play that new waltz for me?"

She seated herself at the nearest instrument and began to play. When she had finished she looked round, but Theodore was not beside her as she had supposed. Instead she saw him at the far end of the room, coming towards her with a piece of paper in his hand. When he reached her he passed her the paper. "A birthday present, my dear. I believe it is your birthday to-day."

Maud looked at the paper blankly. Then it dawned upon her that it was a receipt for the piano at home, made out in her name. Maud would never tell her sisters what she did at that moment, but when she came home and told them about it they all declared that Mr. Foster was a "dear."

"Don't you think it would be better for you to go out of doors more, Miss Sarah?" Theodore asked her one day. "I would be greatly honoured if you would accompany me on my daily walks. It is rather tedious going alone."

And so it became the custom for the old bachelor and the maiden aunt to walk out every day together.

But after a year of this Miss Sarah told him one day that she was going away for a six months' visit.

Theodore was filled with consternation at this and begged her to reconsider. He pleaded so earnestly and eloquently that she finally promised to stay away only two weeks, and when she came back to "name the day."

That was the longest walk they had taken, and towards the end of it Theodore said: "My dear, there is something I have wanted to tell you ever since I have known you. It is about the piano."

"I don't think you will have to tell me now," she said. "I have known it all the time. I saw you do it."

"Saw me do it? Do what?"

"Cut the rope."

He stood still and looked at her.

"I was at the window. I had come over to see the things, you know, and saw you take out your knife, step up to the hub of the wheel and cut the rope."

"And you never told?"

"No: you see," she said confusedly, her colour rising, "it flashed upon me at once what you did it for—that old piano was an instrument of torture—and that was the beginning of the—of the end, I think."

"I don't understand what you mean by the end."

She turned a radiant glance upon him. "Why, don't you see—to-day!"

P. Trussler.

Digitized by Google

A HAPPY MISTAKE.

Showing how Violet Burroughs Accepted Her Lover.

JACK BARRY walked out of the hotel the picture of physical health and strength. He was handsome, too, and had he been rich the girl who could have refused his proffered hand would have been a curiosity. But, alas! Like most of his comrades he was poor. Not that he cared in the least, as he would have said himself, but he ascribed the one back-handed slap that he had ever received from Dame Fortune to his poverty—that is, to his income of £300 a year and no more. Of course it was a girl that did it. Young cavalry officers take nothing seriously except girls—and unfortunately very few girls take young cavalry officers seriously. It is one thing to flirt and dance with a handsome fellow in a fine uniform, and quite another to marry one and live in comparative poverty.

Jack had fallen in love with a girl almost before the ink on his commission was dry; he had danced attendance on her a whole summer at the seaside, and he had proposed and been quietly but firmly rejected.

The rejection was a terrible blow. He was convinced that the girl was in love with him. He rather thought that he was treating her with unusual fairness by being actually in love with her. She tumbled him off a very lofty perch with a little half-whispered "No." He hardly believed his own ears when she said it. Then he suddenly discovered how much he really did love her. He could not live without her—no, not a day. He meditated suicide all one night, resolved to commit it, unfortunately went to sleep in his chair, woke up with an enormous appetite, ate a good breakfast, and—changed his mind. He concluded that it would be much more romantic, and would make her feel worse, to waste his life and then some day to tell her it was all his fault. Ah! she would understand it all then.

After joining his regiment, however, Jack did not get an opportunity to waste his life. He was ordered abroad, and there was plenty of work to do, and he spent two years away from England, home and beauty. It was a good thing for him. He had no opportunity to spend his income, and therefore was obliged to save it, so that at the end of that time, when he had managed to get a three months' leave of absence, he had a little money and a good deal of common sense. He had developed. Instead of wasting his life, he found that he was full of healthy ambition, and while he could not forget that girl he had grimly resolved to get along without her. He did propose to do one thing, however, and that was to get to England as fast as ever he could, call on her, and let her know how well he was getting along without her. He reached the hotel at noon—he was just leaving the hotel to call on her at night.

She lived in Kensington. It was a delightful September night, with a full moon, and he walked down to the house, repeating on the way, a dozen times or more, the question, "Is Miss Burroughs at home?" so that his voice would not tremble the slightest particle even before the servant. His voice did not tremble either when the critical moment arrived, but he was a little astonished that the servant should usher him into the drawing-room without saying a word or even asking for his card. He was still more astonished to find that there was no light in the room save the stream of moonlight that slanted in at the windows. Astonishment was not the word for the occasion when he saw Violet Burroughs herself leaning on the sill of the window in the moonlight; and he almost gasped when she said in the most matter-of-fact way: "I knew you would come back!"

"Did you?" he exclaimed, sinking uninvited into a chair.

"Yes," she repeated. Then he noticed that she was crying.

"I hope that I don't intrude—perhaps I had better call again?"

She paid no attention to the suggestion, but still looking out of the window said: "Your voice has changed already a great deal."

"Yes, I suppose it has," he answered.

"You said you would be a changed man, but I did not suppose it would affect you so soon," she continued. "Oh, it is dreadful, isn't it?"

"My voice? I did not know that it was. I'll have it trained——"

"How can you jest? You know I mean this affair of ours—your love for me."

"Oh!"

"When you jest you make me feel that you are desperate. You will not commit suicide, will you? Promise me that you won't!"

The conversation was becoming rather rapid. Jack had called for the purpose of saying not a word concerning the old love that he had so manfully buried—for the purpose, too, of letting her see how well he had buried it, and how nicely he was getting along without her after all; and here she was plunging into it herself in a most unladylike manner, and dragging him along with her. More than that, she was rapidly opening the old wounds; and still more, she was resurrecting the old love. Why was she crying? Why did she expect him? How did she even know he was in town?

She must have expected him to call that very evening, else she would not be acting in this—to say the least—highly informal manner. But the thing that pleased him most was the fact that the whole thing was so fresh in her mind. It was possible that even now she might be won by him. He answered her last question.

"I did think of suicide—but I gave the idea up. There is too much in life to live for—there are too many changes of luck—too many opportunities to win in the end what was refused in the beginning——"

Digitized by Google

"Oh, no—no—do not think that you can ever win my love!"

"But, Miss Burroughs, I did not come here to win your love. You may remember that when we parted you assured me that you had a great respect for me, that you hoped you would see me often, in fact—er—I believe you said—er—that you would be a sister to me, or something like that—and I had no intention of compelling you to receive any unwelcome attentions."

"But you love me?"

"Well, I—er—I——"

"You must love me!"

"It shall be just as you say."

"I do not mean that, either. You would not have acted as you did unless you loved me."

"Well, I'll acknowledge"—he was getting just a little tender now—"that I do love you. I've tried to forget you, but I couldn't——"

"You haven't had a very long time to try to forget."

"It has seemed very long indeed to me."

"Yes, it has to me, too. I have been sitting here at this window crying ever since."

Barry nearly jumped. Sitting there crying ever since! Was it possible, or was the girl crazy? He never solved the problem. The girl continued:

"But I do not love you, and no matter what papa and mamma say I will never marry you. I have never told you why. I'll tell you now. I love another."

"Another?"

"Yes, and have for a long time—and I never expect to see him again, for I sent him away, and he may be dead now, poor fellow. I thought it would be fun to reject him, and I really didn't know how much I cared for him—and then I thought he wouldn't take 'No' for an answer. But, oh, he did, and I have been the most miserable girl in the world ever since. I love him—I love him—and he ought to have sense enough to know it!" She broke into sobs, burying her head, a quivering mass of disordered hair, in her hands.

"Then it has always been quite a hopeless case, so far as I am concerned.?"

"Yes."

"Well, let me show you how bravely I can stand it. Let me be a brother to you. Tell me who he is. I'll go to him and bring him back to you. I have an idea that he will be very glad to come, whoever he is."

"No," with a shake of the head, "he is too proud. He will never come back to me."

"Tell me who he is."

"You know him."

"Well?"

"He is Jack Barry, a lieutenant in the 71st Lancers. You remember him at the seaside two years ago?"

Jack pinched himself to discover whether he was really awake or dreaming. He felt like shouting, but concluded that it wouldn't be quite the correct thing. He wanted to laugh with happiness, but he couldn't laugh while she was crying there in the corner. He saw it all now. She thought she was talking to some other fellow whom she had refused just before. Finally he said:

"Yes, I know him very well, but he, too, has changed."

"In what way?" she asked anxiously.

"Well, his voice has changed, too."

"That's nothing. I don't care how he has changed, if he only loves me as he used to."

"He does—and, by-the-way, his voice is very much like mine now."

It was not the words he had used, but the tone of voice in which he had spoken them that gave her woman's intuition the spur. She looked quickly up. He was standing now where she could catch the outlines of his figure. She uttered a little exclamation, reached over to the wall, switched on the electric light, and—well, this is the end of my story.

Thomas Winthrop Hall.

THE NEW "HOUSE THAT JACK BUILT."

This is the Magazine YOU want.

All the month's news is found in the Magazine that YOU want.

Women and Men, as well as news, are found in the Magazine that YOU want.

Music and Art, Women and Men, as well as news, are found in the Magazine that YOU want.

All the new Books, the Music and Art, Women and Men, as well as news, are found in the Magazine that YOU want.

Extracts as well, from each Magazine, all the new Books, the Music and Art, Women and Men, as well as news, are found in the Magazine that YOU want.

All the new Plays are brightly reviewed, the Magazines and all the new Books, the Music and Art, Women and Men, as well as news, are found in the Magazine YOU want.

A special feature for Women's Work, and all the new Plays, the Magazines, all the new Books and Music and Art, Women and Men, as well as news, are found in the Magazine YOU want.

Then Country Life and Science as well, pages for Women and all the month's Plays, the Magazines, all the new Books, Music and Art, Women and Men, as well as news, are found in the Magazine YOU want.

This is the name of the Magazine that contains all this, and more, I mean THE RAPID REVIEW (for busy men, and women as well—and doesn't it sell!).

———

Number four is now on sale, so, before it's too late, be up-to-date and purchase a copy for Sixpence.

Digitized by Google

Her Experience.

Miss Greenleaf: "I have just been reading a book called 'How Men Propose.' What is your opinion on that subject?" Miss Yellowleaf: "That they don't."

Sought Advice at Proper Quarters.

He: "I am in love. Will you be my confidante?" She: "Certainly; I am at your service." He: "Well, would you advise me to propose to you?"

For Example.

Miss Flypp (coyly): "Do you believe that it's love that makes the world go round?" Mr. Staylate: "Indeed I do. Notice how soon midnight comes when I spend the evening with you."

His Choice.

"I don't know which is worse," muttered young Blunderheels at the swell reception, retreating to a corner, and wiping his perspiring brow; "but I believe I would rather be run over by a train than step on one."

Tit for Tat.

He (angrily): "Look at this bill. Four pounds for perfumery—for mere odours that fade away for ever." She (calmly): "They've gone to meet the smoke from the eight pounds' worth of cigars you have consumed during the last three months."

Of Course Not.

Little Johnny: "That young man who comes to see you must be pretty poor company. He hasn't any sense of humour." Sister: "Why do you think so?" Little Johnny: "I told him all about the funny way you rush about and bang doors when you get in a temper, and he didn't laugh a bit."

Sounded too Rough.

"Nellie," spoke the youth, with an air of confidence, "only say the word and you and I will sail together on the rough sea of life, bravely buffeting its waves, trimming our sails to meet the adverse winds that——" "Go, Geoffrey, go," interrupted the maiden. "The man who takes me on that journey must offer me a first-class passage on a steamer." Whereupon Geoffrey sailed out of her presence with a decided list to po t.

Settled Matters Easily.

They were at a picnic. "You see," he explained, as he showed her the wish-bone of a chicken at luncheon, "you take hold here and I'll take hold here. Then we must make a wish and pull; and, when it breaks, the one who has the bigger part of it will have his or her wish gratified." "But I don't know what to wish for," she protested. "Oh, you can think of something!" he said. "No, I can't," she replied; "I can't think of anything I want very much." "Well, I'll wish for you!" he exclaimed. "Will you really?" she asked. "Yes." "Well, then, there's no use troubling about the old wish-bone," she interrupted, with a glad smile; "you can have me!"

Cause for Satisfaction.

Ella: "I heard something horrid about you to-day." Stella: "I thought you looked pleased."

Ambiguous.

"How do you like my new hat, George?" "It is the dearest thing of the kind you ever had, love."

An Awkward Admission.

She (encouragingly): "Your step suits mine exactly, Mr. Robinson." He (nervously): "So delighted to hear you say so, Miss Sharpe! I know I'm such a wretched waltzer."

According to Custom.

First Poet: "I wrote Miss Starling a week ago, and sent her my love. I don't know why she has not returned it." Second Poet (absent-mindedly): "Did you inclose stamps for its return?"

He Thought Long and Deeply.

Said the married man who likes to be sympathised with: "My wife is never happy unless she has a grievance." "How happy she must be!" said the pretty girl, and then the married man grew strangely silent.

She was Pleased.

"Just one little kiss," he pleaded. "But only a little one," she said, relenting. "Of course," he replied. "How could I look for a big one from so small a mouth?" And after that he got as many as he wanted.

Rampant Curiosity.

Claribel: "You told me you were never going to write to young Hankinson again." Angie: "He's written me a dozen letters I haven't answered, but in his last one he left a page out, and I had to write and ask him what it was about."

Wanted an Interview.

She: "Ah, Count, you don't know how my love for you distresses my parents. I heard my father say this morning that he would give £10,000 if I could never see you again." The Count: "Ees your fazaire in hees offees now, you sink?"

Revenge, Sweet Revenge.

"No, Harold," said the sweet girl, "I can only be a sister to you." "Well, then," he savagely replied, as he heard a subdued chuckle, "as your brother, I shall claim the privilege of lying under the sofa while you make fools of the other fellows."

Fatal.

"Wasn't it brave of Chollie to rescue that child from drowning in the creek?" "Brave? The water wasn't more than four feet deep anywhere, and Chollie knew it." "Yes, but that was deep enough to utterly ruin the crease in his trousers."

Effectively Told.

Servant: "Oh, miss, that Mr. Borem is coming here again. There's no use telling him you're not at home, for he'll just push past me an' say he'll wait till you come back." Miss Beauty: "Then, for mercy's sake, tell him plainly that I'm engaged. Do it in such a way that he'll have to go." Servant: "Yes, miss." Mr. Borem (a minute later): "Is Miss Beauty at home?" Servant: "Yes, sir, but she is engaged; an' the feller she's engaged to is waitin' in the drawing-room for you with a stick." Mr. Borem went.

A Correct Diagnosis.

George: "Eh, you got engaged last night? Gus, my old, my dear friend, tell me how you did it!" Gus: "Really, I hardly know myself. Couldn't help it; just like falling downstairs. I was on the edge of a proposal, she gave me a push, and there I was—engaged." George: "Well, I haven't had any such experience. Every time I try to start my knees knock together, and my teeth chatter, and my tongue cleaves to the roof of my mouth. I've tried a dozen times to pop the question to Miss Horty, and got stuck every time." Gus: "And did she let you stick?" George: "Yes." Gus: "You are courting the wrong girl!"

Digitized by Google

BAFFLING A DETECTIVE.

Showing How Edward Meredith almost Fell in Love with a Rogue.

It was a dull, rainy day, towards the end of September—one of those days when earth and sky alike are grey and dreary, and the raindrops pattering against the window sound like human sobs. The clock that hung against the wall pointed to the hour of three in the afternoon; and I was sitting in our little inner office, looking out at the expanse of dull, grey wall that formed my only prospect from the not over-clean window, and thinking. I had read every square inch of type in the newspapers.

I was musing about Gracie Elton, and wondering how long it would be before I should be able to marry her. Dear little Gracie, she was as sweet and as patient as it was in the nature of a woman to be; but I knew it was a hard life for her in that over-crowded milliners' work-room, day after day, and month after month, and I longed to set her free from the monotonous captivity. She was a pretty, blue-eyed girl of twenty, with a dimple in her chin, and the sweetest roses on her cheek that ever inspired the pen of a poet. I was no poet, yet I think I understood and appreciated all her womanly beauty as fully as if my heart's thoughts could shape themselves into verse. And it was of them I was thinking when the door opened, and Mr. Clenner came in.

Mr. Clenner was our "chief"—a dark, silent, little man, with square, stern mouth, and clouded, grey eyes, which appeared almost expressionless when they were turned full upon you, and yet which seemed to see everything at a glance. He sat down beside me.

"Meredith," he said, in a quiet, subdued tone that was natural to him; "didn't you say you were getting tired of doing nothing?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, I have something for you to do."

"What is it, sir?"

"Something that will bring you both credit and friends if you manage it skilfully. I had intended to go myself, but circumstances happened untowardly, and I shall send you instead."

Bending his head towards me, and speaking scarcely above a whisper, he told me the special business on which I was to be sent.

There had been, it seems, a series of very skilful forgeries lately committed, with a boldness and audacity that fairly seemed to set the authorities at defiance. For some time he had been in doubt as to the exact perpetrator of the crime; but, after much quiet investigation and casting hither and thither, he had detected the hidden spring—one Perley Mattison—who had skilfully eluded all pursuit, and was now somewhere in hiding in the north of England.

His whereabouts had been ascertained as nearly as possible, and it was for me to go quietly up and apprehend him before he should become aware of our knowledge of all his movements.

I sat listening to all the various details of our plan as they were sketched out by Mr. Clenner. The reward that had been privately offered was high; my heart leapt as I reflected how much nearer it would bring me to Gracie Elton, nor did the enterprise seem particularly difficult to accomplish.

"Do you think you can do it?" Mr. Clenner asked, after the whole thing had been laid before me.

"Yes, sir. When shall I start?"

"Now, within half-an-hour."

"So soon?"

"Yes; why not?"

I could think of no sufficient reason except one, which I did not care to communicate to my superior—the longing wish to see Gracie once more before I started.

"Just as you decide, Mr. Clenner, of course," I said rising. "If I take the night express, I shall be there early in the morning."

"Yes, and that is altogether the best plan. He will not remain long in any one place just at present, depend upon it, and what you have to do must be done at once."

All through the long night journey I mused upon the task that lay before me. The house to which I was directed was quite in the country, about half-a-mile beyond the village of Berwood, and was the residence of Mrs. Mattison, the mother of the audacious forger. If help was needed, I was fully authorised to call for it upon the constabulary authorities at Kerstead; but I expected to need no assistance.

The rosy dawn was just flushing the eastern sky when I alighted, stiff, weary and jaded, from the train.

"Can you direct me to Mrs. Mattison's place?" I asked of the sleepy station-master.

"Mattison—Mrs. Mattison; I don't know her, but I can tell you where she lives. Just you follow the main street of the village out about half-a-mile, and ye'll come to a wood, with a footpath running through it. Get over the stile, follow the footpath, and in a little while ye'll see a yellow house—the last place in the world where you'd expect to see a dwelling. That's where Mrs. Mattison lives."

I thanked my informant and set out at a brisk walk, carrying my travelling-bag in my hand. It was half-an-hour ere I diverged from the main street into a quiet and secluded road, or rather lane. The stile at the end of the footpath through the wood was quickly reached, and the little yellow house—a cream-coloured cottage, literally overgrown with honeysuckles—presently rewarded my search; and as I knocked at the door, a clock somewhere struck the hour of seven.

A decent-looking, elderly woman, in widow's weeds, came to the door.

"Is Mr. Mattison in—Mr. Perley Mattison?"

"No," she answered quickly, with, as I imagined, rather a confused look.

I did not believe her, and asked quietly, "When do you expect him home?"

"Not at present."

Apparently she expected me to go away; but, instead, I slipped into the passage.

"Mother," said a soft voice, at the head of the stairs, "who is it?"

And then, for the first time, I became aware that someone had been watching and listening to our colloquy from the head of the stairs—a young girl, dressed, like the mother, in deep black, with very brilliant eyes, and a profusion of jet-black curls.

Digitized by Google

"Someone to see your brother."

She came half-way down the stairs, pushing back her curls with one hand, and looking at me with her wonderful eyes. Even then her beauty struck me as I stood gazing at her.

"Perley is not at home," she said, hurriedly. "He has gone away. We do not know when he will return."

Evidently this mother and daughter were in the secret of Mattison's villainy, and doing their best to screen him from its consequences. My heart bled for both of them; but it was no time to indulge in sentimental pity. Speaking as briefly as I could, I told them it was my duty to compel them to remain where they were while I searched the house.

Mrs. Mattison sat down, pale and trembling. Her daughter coloured high.

"Mother," she said, "why do you stand by and listen to such slanders? It is false! Let this man search the house if he will; my brother is as innocent as I am!"

No opposition was offered to my search. It was entirely fruitless, however; there was nowhere any trace of the missing man. Nevertheless, I resolved to remain there quietly, for a day or two, to see what a little waiting might bring forth.

The same afternoon Clara Mattison came in as I sat by the window, keeping a silent watch on all around.

"Mr. Meredith," she said, softly, "mother thinks I have been rude to you. She says it was not your fault, personally, that you were sent here on such a mistaken errand—and, perhaps, she is right. I am sorry if I have hurt your feelings."

The pretty, penitent way in which she spoke quite won my heart, and a few questions on my part seemed to unlock the hidden recesses of her confidence.

She talked at first shyly, but afterwards, with more assurance, of herself, her absent brother, and her mother, giving me a thousand little family details, which I almost dreaded to hear.

This twilight talk was one of the pleasantest episodes of my by no means universally pleasant life, and I was not a little annoyed when it was broken in upon by the arrival of the constables from Kerstead, who were to watch through the night.

At the sound of their footsteps, Clara rose up and sat down again, confused and frightened.

"Oh, Mr. Meredith, those men——"

"Be easy, Miss Mattison," I said; "you shall in no way be annoyed by them. Your privacy shall not be broken in upon, believe me."

"I know I am silly," faltered Clara; "but, oh, it seems so dreadful!"

My orders to the men were simple and succinct. I stationed them as seemed best to me, and then returned to spend the evening with Miss Mattison. And when I was at length left alone, I could not help thinking—God forgive me—how much more winning and graceful she was than poor Gracie Elton.

At last an answer came to my report to Mr. Clenner. It was short, and to the purpose:

Come back. You are only losing time. If the bird has flown, we must look elsewhere for him.

I read the missive with a pang. Clara Mattison's cheek deepened in colour as I announced my departure to her.

"You have been far kinder than we dared to hope, Mr. Meredith," she said, as I held her hand in mine.

"You will think of me sometimes, Clara?"

The reader will easily perceive from this how our intimacy had progressed. She smiled, hung her head, and, taking a pair of scissors from the table, severed one bright, black curl from the abundant tresses that hung over her forehead.

"Keep this, Mr. Meredith, in memory of me."

Was I foolish to press the jetty ringlet to my lips ere I laid it closely against my heart? Clara evidently thought I was, for she laughed, but did not seem displeased.

Mr. Clenner appeared to be a good deal annoyed when I got back to town—rather an unreasonable thing on his part, for I certainly did all that man could do under the circumstances.

"We have been mistaken all the way through, it seems," he said, biting his lip. "Strange—very strange. I never was mistaken before in my calculations. Well, we must try again."

I went to Gracie Elton's that night. She received me with a sweet, shy gladness of welcome, that should have made me the happiest man in the world; but it did not. Clara Mattison's dark beauty seemed to stand between me and her like a visible barrier. When I took my leave, there were tears in her eyes.

"Gracie, you are crying."

"Because you are changed, Edward. You do not love me as well as you did."

"Gracie, what nonsense!"

I was vexed with her, simply because I knew her accusation was true. But I kissed her once more, and took my leave, moody and dissatisfied.

When I reached the office next morning, Mr. Clenner was not there.

"He went last night to Kerstead," said my fellow-detective.

"To Kerstead?"

I was seriously annoyed. Did Mr. Clenner doubt the accuracy of my reports? Or did he imagine that I was unable to institute a thorough and complete investigation.

"It's very strange," I mused aloud.

Jones laughed.

"Well," he said, "you know Clenner has a strange way of doing things. Depend upon it, he has good reasons for his conduct."

I was sitting at my desk two days subsequently, when the door glided noiselessly open, and Clenner himself entered.

"You are back again, sir? And what luck?"

"The best."

"You don't mean to say you've got him?"

"I do mean to say it, Edward Meredith. I knew I could not be entirely mistaken. Perley Mattison is in the next room—half an hour from now he will be in prison."

"Where did you apprehend him."

"At home in his mother's house."

"But——"

"He was there all the time you remained there. Ned, my boy, you've made a blunder for once; but don't let it happen again."

"What do you mean, sir?"

For reply, he opened the door of the private inner room—his own special sanctum. A slight, boyish figure leant against the window, smoking a cigarette, with black curls tossed back from a marble-white brow, and brilliant eyes. He mockingly inclined his head, as I stared at him, with a motion not unfamiliar to me.

"Clara Mattison!"

"Yes," he said, in a soft, sarcastic voice, "Clara Mattison, or Perley Mattison, or whatever you choose to call me. Many thanks for your politeness, Detective Meredith; and if you would like another lock of hair——"

I turned away, burning scarlet, while Mr. Clenner closed the door.

"Never mind, my boy; it will be a lesson to you," he said, laughing. "He made a very pretty girl, but I am not at all susceptible."

What a double-dyed fool I had been! I had lost the reward—failed in the estimation of my fellow-officers—and behaved like a brute to poor Gracie—and all for what?

I went to Gracie, and told her the whole story; and, to my surprise, the dear, faithful little creature loved me just as well as ever.

"I won't be jealous of Perley Mattison, Edward," she said, smiling, "whatever I might be of his sister. And, dearest, don't be discouraged. I'll wait as long as you please and you will be a second Mr. Clenner yet."

She was determined to look on the bright side of things, this little Gracie of mine! But I felt the mortification none the less keenly; although, as Mr. Clenner said, it would undoubtedly prove a good lesson to me.

Frederick Coomber.

Digitized by Google

A Story of Love and Crime.

By ARNOLD BENNETT.

TWENTY-FOURTH CHAPTER.
The Bottle of Wine.

ALTHOUGH Racksole had now been twice worsted in a contest of wits within the precincts of the Grand Babylon, once by Rocco and once by Jules, he could not fairly blame himself for the present miscarriage of his plans—a miscarriage due to the meddlesomeness of an extraneous person, combined with pure ill-fortune. He did not, therefore, permit the accident to interfere with his sleep that night.

On the following day he sought out Prince Aribert, between whom and himself there now existed a feeling of unmistakable, frank friendship, and disclosed to him the happenings of the previous night, and particularly the tampering with the bottle of Romanée-Conti.

"I believe you dined with Prince Eugen last night?"

"I did. And, curiously enough, we had a bottle of Romanée-Conti, an admirable wine, of which Eugen is passionately fond."

"And you will dine with him to-night?"

"Most probably. To-day will, I fear, be our last day here. Eugen wishes to return to Posen early to-morrow."

"Has it struck you, Prince," said Racksole, "that if Jules had succeeded in poisoning your nephew, he would probably have succeeded also in poisoning you?"

"I had not thought of it," laughed Aribert, "but it would seem so. It appears that so long as he brings down his particular quarry, Jules is careless of anything else that may be accidentally involved in the destruction. However, we need have no fear on that score now. You know the bottle, and you can destroy it at once."

"But I do not propose to destroy it," said Racksole calmly. "If Prince Eugen asks for Romanée-Conti to be served to-night, as he probably will, I propose that that precise bottle shall be served to him—and to you."

"Then you would poison us in spite of ourselves?"

"Scarcely," Racksole smiled. "My notion is to discover the accomplices within the hotel. I have already inquired as to the wine-clerk, Hubbard. Now, does it not occur to you as extraordinary that on this particular day Mr. Hubbard should be ill in bed? Hubbard, I am informed, is suffering from an attack of stomach poisoning, which has supervened during the night. He says that he does not know what can have caused it. His place in the wine cellars will be taken to-day by his assistant, a mere youth, but to all appearances a fairly smart youth. I need not say that we shall keep an eye on that youth."

"One moment," Prince Aribert interrupted. "I do not quite understand how you think the poisoning was to have been effected."

"The bottle is now under examination by an expert, who has instructions to remove as little as possible of the stuff which Jules put on the rim of the mouth of it. It will be secretly replaced in its bin during the day. My idea is that by the mere action of pouring out the wine takes up some of the poison, which I deem to be very strong, and thus becomes fatal as it enters the glass."

"But surely the servant in attendance would wipe the mouth of the bottle?"

"Very carelessly, perhaps. And, moreover, he would be extremely unlikely to wipe off all the stuff; some of it has been ingeniously placed just on the inside edge of the rim. Besides, suppose he forgot to wipe the bottle?"

"Prince Eugen is always served at dinner by Hans. It is an honour which the faithful old fellow reserves for himself."

"But suppose Hans——" Racksole stopped.

"Hans an accomplice! My dear Racksole, the suggestion is wildly impossible."

That night Prince Aribert dined with his august nephew in the superb dining-room of the Royal apartments. Hans served, the dishes being brought to the door by other servants, Aribert found his nephew despondent and taciturn. On the previous day, when, after the futile interview with Sampson Levi, Prince Eugen had despairingly threatened to commit suicide, in such a manner as to make it "look like an accident," Aribert had compelled him to give his word of honour not to do so.

"What wine will your Royal Highness take?" asked old Hans in his soothing tones, when the soup was served.

"Sherry," was Prince Eugen's curt order.

"And Romanée-Conti afterwards?" said Hans. Aribert looked up quickly.

"No, not to-night. I'll try Sillery to-night," said Prince Eugen.

Digitized by Google

Eugen's body had slipped limply forward; his arms hung straight and lifeless; his eyes were closed.

"I think I'll have Romanée-Conti, Hans, after all," he said, later. "It suits me better than champagne."

The famous and unsurpassable Burgundy was served with the roast. Old Hans brought it tenderly in its wicker cradle, inserted the corkscrew with mathematical precision, and drew the cork, which he offered for his master's inspection. Eugen nodded, and told him to put it down.

Aribert watched with intense interest. He could not for an instant believe that Hans was not the very soul of fidelity, and yet, despite himself, Racksole's words had caused him a certain uneasiness. At that moment Prince Eugen murmured across the table:

"Aribert, I withdraw my promise. Observe that, I withdraw it."

Aribert shook his head emphatically, without removing his gaze from Hans. The white-haired servant perfunctorily dusted his napkin round the neck of the bottle of Romanée-Conti, and poured out a glass. Aribert trembled from head to foot.

Eugen took up the glass and held it to the light.

"Don't drink it," said Aribert very quietly. "It is poisoned."

"Poisoned!" exclaimed Prince Eugen.

"Poisoned, sire!" exclaimed old Hans, with an air of profound amazement and concern, and he seized the glass.

"Impossible, sire. I myself opened the bottle. No one else has touched it, and the cork was perfect."

"I tell you it is poisoned," Aribert repeated.

"Your Highness will pardon an old man," said Hans, "but to say that this wine is poison is to say that I am a murderer. I will prove to you that it is not poisoned. I will drink it."

And he raised the glass to his trembling lips. In that moment Aribert saw that old Hans, at any rate, was not an accomplice of Jules. Springing up from his seat, he knocked the glass from the aged servitor's hands, and the fragments of it fell with a light tinkling crash partly on the table and partly on the floor. The Prince and the servant gazed at one another in a distressing and terrible silence. There was a slight noise, and Aribert looked aside. He saw that Eugen's body had slipped forward limply over the left arm of his chair; the Prince's arms hung straight and lifeless; his eyes were closed; he was unconscious.

"Hans!" murmured Aribert. "Hans! What is this?"

TWENTY-FIFTH CHAPTER.

The Steam Launch.

Mr. Tom Jackson's notion of making good his escape from the hotel by means of a steam launch was an excellent one, so far as it went, but Theodore Racksole, for his part, did not consider that it went quite far enough. Theodore Racksole opined, with peculiar glee, that he now had a tangible and definite clue for the catching of the Grand Babylon's ex-waiter. He knew nothing of the Port of London, but he happened to know a good deal of the far more complicated, though somewhat smaller, Port of New York, and he felt sure there ought to be no extraordinary difficulty in getting hold of Jules' steam launch. To those who are not thoroughly familiar with it the River Thames and its docks, from London Bridge to Gravesend, seem a vast and uncharted wilderness of craft—a wilderness in which it would be perfectly easy to hide even a three-master successfully. To such people the idea of looking for a small steam launch on the river would be about equivalent to the idea of looking for a needle in a bundle of hay.

But the fact is, there are hundreds of men between St. Katherine's Wharf and Blackwall who literally know the Thames as the suburban householder knows his back-garden—who can recognise thousands of ships and put a name to them at a distance of half a mile, who are informed as to every movement of vessels on the great stream, who know all the captains, all the engineers, all the lightermen, all the pilots, all the licensed watermen and all the unlicensed scoundrels from the Tower to Gravesend, and a lot further. By these experts of the Thames the slightest unusual event on the water is noticed and discussed—a wherry cannot change hands but they will guess shrewdly upon the price paid and the intentions of the new owner with regard to it. They have a habit of watching the river for the mere interest of the sight, and they talk about everything like housewives gathered of an evening round the cottage door. If the first mate of a Castle Liner gets the sack they will be able to tell you what he said to the captain, what the old man said to him, and what both said to the Board, and having finished off that affair they will cheerfully turn to discussing whether Bill Stevens sank his barge outside the West India No. 2 by accident or on purpose.

Digitized by Google

Theodore Racksole had no satisfactory means of identifying the steam launch which carried away Mr. Tom Jackson. The sky had clouded over soon after midnight, and there was also a slight mist, and he had only been able to make out that it was a low craft, about sixty feet long, probably painted black. He had personally kept a watch all through the night on vessels going up-stream, and during the next morning he had a man to take his place who warned him whenever a steam launch went towards Westminster. At noon, after his conversation with Prince Aribert, he went down the river in a hired row-boat as far as the Customs House, and poked about everywhere in search of any vessel which could by any possibility be the one he was in search of. But he found nothing. He was, therefore, tolerably sure that the mysterious launch lay somewhere below the Customs House. At the Customs House stairs he landed, and asked for a very high official—an official inferior only to a Commissioner—whom he had entertained once in New York, and who had met him in London on business at Lloyd's. In the large but dingy office of this great man a long conversation took place—a conversation in which Racksole had to exercise a certain amount of persuasive power, and which ultimately ended in the high official ringing his bell.

"Desire Mr. Hazell—room No. 332—to speak to me," said the official to the boy who answered the summons, and then, turning to Racksole: "I need hardly repeat, my dear Mr. Racksole, that this is strictly unofficial."

"Agreed, of course," said Racksole.

Mr. Hazell entered. He was a young man of about thirty, dressed in blue serge, with a pale, keen face, a brown moustache and a rather handsome brown beard.

"Mr. Hazell," said the high official, "let me introduce you to Mr. Theodore Racksole—you will doubtless be familiar with his name. Mr. Hazell," he went on to Racksole, "is one of our outdoor staff—what we call an examining officer. Just now he is doing night duty. He has a boat on the river and a couple of men, and the right to board and examine any craft whatever. What Mr. Hazell and his crew don't know about the Thames between here and Gravesend isn't knowledge."

"Glad to meet you, sir," said Racksole simply, and they shook hands. Racksole observed with satisfaction that Mr. Hazell was entirely at his ease.

"Now, Hazell," the high official continued, "Mr. Racksole wants you to help in a little private expedition on the river to-night. I will give you a night's leave. I sent for you partly because I thought you would enjoy the affair, and partly because I think I can rely on you to regard it as entirely unofficial, and not to talk about it. You understand? I dare say you will have no cause to regret having obliged Mr. Racksole."

"I think I grasp the situation," said Hazell, with a slight smile.

"And, by-the-way," added the high official, "although the business is unofficial, it might be well if you wore your official overcoat. See?"

"Decidedly," said Hazell; "I should have done so in any case."

"And now, Mr. Hazell," said Racksole, "will you do me the pleasure of lunching with me? If you agree, I should like to lunch at the place you usually frequent."

So it came to pass that Theodore Racksole and George Hazell, outdoor clerk in the Customs, lunched together at "Thomas' Chop House," in the city of London, upon mutton-chops and coffee. The millionaire soon discovered that he had got hold of a keen-witted man and a person of much insight.

"Tell me," said Hazell, when they had reached the cigarette stage, "are the magazine writers anything like correct?"

"What do you mean?" asked Racksole, mystified.

"Well, you're a millionaire—'one of the best,' I believe. One often sees articles on and interviews with millionaires, which describe their private railroad cars, their steam yachts on the Hudson, their marble stables, and so on, and so on. Do you happen to have those things?"

"I have a private car on the New York Central, and I have a two thousand ton schooner-yacht—though it isn't on the Hudson. It happens just now to be on East River. And I am bound to admit that the stables of my uptown place are fitted with marble." Racksole laughed.

"Ah!" said Hazell. "Now I can believe that I am lunching with a millionaire. It's strange how facts like those—unimportant in themselves—appeal to the imagination. You seem to me a real millionaire now. You've given me some personal information; I'll give you some in return. I earn three hundred a year, and perhaps sixty pounds a year extra for overtime. I live by myself in two rooms in Muscovy Court. I've as much money as I need, and I always do exactly what I like outside office. As regards the office, I do as little work as I can, on principle—it's a fight between us and the Commissioners who shall get the best. They try to do us down, and we try to do them down—it's pretty even on the whole. All's fair in war, you know, and there ain't no ten commandments in a Government office."

Racksole laughed. "Can you get off this afternoon?" he asked.

"Certainly," said Howell; "I'll get one of my pals to sign on for me, and then I shall be free."

"Well," said Racksole, "I should like you to come down with me to the Grand Babylon. Then we can talk over my little affair at length. And may we go on your boat? I want to meet your crew."

How Jules is captured will be related in our next number.

Digitized by Google

"That will be all right," Hazell remarked. "My two men are the idlest, most soul-less chaps you ever saw. They eat too much, and they have an enormous appetite for beer; but they know the river, and they know their business, and they will do anything within the fair game if they are paid for it, and aren't asked to hurry."

That night, just after dark, Theodore Racksole embarked with his new friend George Hazell in one of the black-painted Customs wherries, manned by a crew of two men—both the latter freemen of the river, a distinction which carries with it certain privileges unfamiliar to the mere landsman. It was a cloudy and oppressive evening, not a star showing to illumine the slow tide, now just past its flood. The vast forms of steamers at anchor—chiefly those of the General Steam Navigation and the Aberdeen Line—heaved themselves high out of the water, straining sluggishly at their mooring buoys. On either side the naked walls of warehouses rose like grey precipices from the stream, holding forth quaint arms of steam-cranes. To the west the Tower Bridge spanned the river with its formidable arch, and above that its suspended footpath—a hundred and fifty feet from earth. Down towards the East and the Pool of London a forest of funnels and masts were dimly outlined against the sinister sky. Huge barges, each steered by a single man at the end of a pair of giant oars, lumbered and swirled downstream at all angles. Occasionally a tug snorted busily past, flashing its red and green signals and dragging an unwieldy tail of barges in its wake. Then a Margate passenger steamer, its electric lights gleaming from every porthole, swerved round to anchor, with its load of two thousand fatigued excursionists. Over everything brooded an air of mystery—a spirit and feeling of strangeness, remoteness, and the inexplicable. As the broad, flat little boat bobbed its way under the shadow of enormous hulks, beneath stretched hawsers, and past buoys covered with green slime, Racksole could scarcely believe that he was in the very heart of London—the most prosaic city in the world. He had a queer idea that almost anything might happen in this seeming waste of waters at this weird hour of ten o'clock. It appeared incredible to him that only a mile or two away people were sitting in theatres applauding farces, and that at Cannon Street Station, a few yards off, other people were calmly taking the train to various highly-respectable suburbs whose names he was gradually learning. He had the uplifting sensation of being in another world which comes to us sometimes amid surroundings violently different from our usual surroundings. The most ordinary noises—of men calling, of a chain running through a slot, of a distant sirene—translated themselves to his ears into terrible and haunting sounds, full of portentous significance. He looked over the side of the boat into the brown water, and asked himself what frightful secrets lay hidden in its depth. Then he put his hand into his hip-pocket and touched the stock of his Colt revolver—that familiar substance comforted him.

The oarsmen had instructions to drop slowly down to the Pool, as the wide reach below the Tower is called. These two men had not been previously informed of the precise object of the expedition, but now that they were safely afloat Hazell judged it expedient to give them some notion of it. "We expect to come across a rather suspicious steam launch," he said. "My friend here is very anxious to get a sight of her, and until he has seen her nothing definite can be done."

"What sort of a craft is she, sir?" asked the stroke oar, a fat-faced man who seemed absolutely incapable of any serious exertion.

"I don't know," Racksole replied; "but as near as I can judge, she's about sixty feet in length, and painted black. I fancy I shall recognise her when I see her."

"Not much to go by, that," exclaimed the other man curtly. But he said no more. He, as well as his mate, had received from Theodore Racksole one English sovereign as a kind of preliminary fee, and an English sovereign will do a lot towards silencing the natural sarcastic tendencies and free speech of a Thames waterman.

"There's one thing I noticed," said Racksole suddenly, "and I forgot to tell you of it, Mr. Hazell. Her screw seemed to move with a rather irregular, lame sort of beat."

Both watermen burst into a laugh.

"Oh," said the fat rower, "I know what you're after, sir—it's Jack Everett's launch, commonly called Squirm. She's got a four-bladed propeller, and one blade is broken off short."

"Ay, that's it, sure enough," agreed the man in the bows. "And if it's her you want, I seed her lying up against Cherry Gardens Pier this very morning."

"Let us go to Cherry Gardens Pier by all means, as soon as possible," Racksole said, and the boat swung across stream and then began to creep down by the right bank, feeling its way past wharves, many of which, even at that hour, were still busy with cranes, that descended empty into the bellies of ships and came up full. As the two watermen gingerly manœuvred the boat on the ebbing tide, Hazell explained to the millionaire that the Squirm was one of the most notorious craft on the river. It appeared that when anyone had a nefarious or underhand scheme afoot which necessitated river work Everett's launch was always available for a suitable monetary consideration. The Squirm had got itself into a thousand scrapes, and out of those scrapes again with safety, if not precisely with honour. The river police kept a watchful eye on it, and the chief marvel about the whole thing was that old Everett, the owner, had never yet been seriously compromised in any illegal escapade. Not once had the officer of the law been able to prove anything definite against the proprietor of the Squirm, though several of its quondam hirers were at that very moment in various of His Majesty's prisons throughout the country. Latterly, however, the launch, with its damaged propeller, which Everett consistently refused to have repaired, had acquired an evil reputation, even among evil-doers, and this fraternity had gradually come to abandon it for less easily recognisable craft.

"Your friend, Mr. Tom Jackson," said Hazell to Racksole, "committed an error of discretion when he hired the Squirm. A scoundrel of his experience and calibre ought certainly to have known better than that. You cannot fail to get a clue now."

By this time the boat was approaching Cherry Gardens Pier, but unfortunately a thin night-fog had swept over the river, and objects could not be discerned with any clearness beyond a distance of thirty yards. As the Customs boat scraped down past the pier all its occupants strained eyes for a glimpse of the mysterious launch, but nothing could be seen of it. The boat continued to float idly down-stream, the men resting on their oars. Then they narrowly escaped bumping a large Norwegian sailing vessel at anchor with her stem pointing down-stream. This ship they passed on the port side. Just as they got clear of her bowsprit the fat man cried out excitedly, "There's her nose!" and he put the boat about and began to pull back against the tide. And surely the missing Squirm was comfortably anchored on the starboard quarter of the Norwegian ship, hidden neatly between the ship and the shore. The men pulled very quietly alongside.

"I'll board her to start with," said Hazell, whispering to Racksole. "I'll make out that I suspect they've got dutiable goods on board, and that will give me a chance to have a good look at her."

Dressed in his official overcoat and peaked cap, he stepped rather jauntily, as Racksole thought, on to the low deck of the launch. "Anyone aboard?" Racksole heard him cry out, and a woman's voice answered. "I'm a Customs examining officer, and I want to search the launch," Hazell shouted, and then disappeared down into the little saloon amidships, and Racksole heard no more. It seemed to the millionaire that Hazell had been gone hours, but at length he returned.

(Another long instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

EARN A BICYCLE

distributing circulars and taking orders from sample machine furnished by us. Active Agents wanted in each district. Large profits easily made. Highest grade fully warranted

BRITISH MADE CYCLES

LATEST MODELS £2-10 to £6

New Departure Coaster Hubs, Best Makes Tyres, and best British made equipment throughout.

200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES all makes, £1 to £2-10 good as new.

Great factory clearing sale at half factory prices. We send on approval and allow Ten Days' Free Trial on every cycle. Money with carriage charges refunded without question if not perfectly satisfactory. Write at once for free catalogues and our special offer.

Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonos half prices.

MEAD CYCLE CO. Dept. 44e,
85-97, Paradise Street, Liverpool,
19, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

TELL COOK

KEATING'S POWDER

KILLS

BLACK BEETLES

Tins Only 3½ 6½ & 1/-

BORAX EXTRACT OF SOAP

For quick & easy washing, white, sweet clothes, and bright, healthy homes.

Use it in your next wash.

Sold in ¼-lb. packets everywhere.

By Special Appointment. Makers to the King.

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd Birmingham

WRITE FOR FREE SAMPLE, &c.

BORAX STARCH GLAZE
IMPROVES ALL STARCH.

2/6 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD.

Our warranted Timekeeper, with guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent, post free, to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/6 and four stamps extra for postage. During this month we give absolutely free a Mexican Silver Watch Chain. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.

GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS,
89 Pimlico Road, London, S.W.

From 6/- Monthly. Special Offer. 500 New Cycles £3 10s. 500 Genuine B.S.A. £6 10s. Sample Victory Motor Cycle £26. Sent carr. paid before payment. Agents Wanted
Dereham Rd. Cycle Co., Norwich

FREEMAN'S
TRADE MARK
THE ORIGINAL & ONLY TRUE
CHLORODYNE
Best Remedy for Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 6s., or postage free by the INVENTOR, R. FREEMAN, 70 KENNINGTON PARK ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

RECOMMENDED BY MEDICAL MEN.

N.B.—Lord Chancellor Selborne, Lord Justices James and Mellish, decided in favour of Freeman's Original Chlorodyne, and against Browne & Davenport, compelling them to pay all costs.
—"Times," 24-7-73.

TO CURE DRUNKARDS

with or without their knowledge. Send Stamp for FREE TRIAL PACKAGE of a wonderful remedy that has saved homes. Send no money. Address in confidence: WARD CHEMICAL Co., 51 Century House, Regent Street, London, W.

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

Nothing has been found to equal them as a general restorative and renovator of the human system. Bear in mind that BEECHAM'S PILLS will do what is claimed for them because—they are a special preparation of purely vegetable extracts, highly concentrated, finely balanced, and carefully compounded to suit the needs of the generality of men and women.

THEY CURE DISEASE BY REMOVING THE CAUSE OF IT.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

GIVEN AWAY
with next week's
HOME NOTES
(No. 542)

A PAPER PATTERN of this
CHEMISE

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents
PRICE ONE PENNY.

INDELIBLE DYES FOR HOME USE WITHOUT TROUBLE

Maypole Soap

WASHES AND DYES ANY COLOUR

Curtains, Frocks, Blouses, Silks, and Satins made bright & beautiful as new.

COLOURS, 4d. BLACK, 6d.

Send for Free Booklet "THE PERFECTION of HOME DYEING" to the Maypole Co., 17 Cumming Street, London, N.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Wooing by Strategy.

So, "ALGY," you have fallen in love with a rich young lady in the neighbourhood. You dare not reveal the fact to her, as you are afraid she would instantly reject you. Besides, she has many suitors much better off in the world than yourself, and much more suitable to be her husband. How should I advise you to act in the matter?

* * * * * * *

Poor young men have before now succeeded in attracting rich girls, but not by showing themselves too ardent. I know a young man who succeeded in something like the following fashion:

He used to frequently meet the girl at other people's houses, but instead of always seeking her company, he deliberately avoided her, and paid lavish attentions to other girls far less attractive.

Meanwhile the rich girl came in for compliments and attentions from every other young man. My friend alone seemed to avoid her. In time, needless to say, the girl grew very curious and not a little jealous. Why should this one young man of all others alone avoid her? The result was that, on every possible occasion, the girl tried to attract the young man, never, however, seeming to succeed. His manner whenever he spoke to her was very cool and offhand. At the same time he managed to let the intimate friends of the rich girl know that all the time he was madly in love with her, but dared not show it, as he felt it would be dishonourable to make overtures to a girl whom he could never marry.

These tactics finally succeeded. The girl sought him out more and more, until she forced him to confess. Their engagement was announced not long after, and nobody could accuse the man of having angled for her, seeing that things were the exact reverse.

❦❦❦

The Ways of Courtship.

"HOW," writes "ALFRED," "can I gain the affections of a young lady whom I first knew eight years ago? We were friends then, but I went to live in the country for four years, and our friendship was lost from then until now. I like her very much, and would wish her to be my partner in life. Every time I meet her she always smiles at me, and never fails to speak."

* * * * *

Well, it does not look as though you should have much difficulty in winning her affections. Take advantage of the next time you meet her in the street and enter into conversation. Ask her if she would care to take a walk with you. Avoid putting on the airs of a lover altogether. Just be quite natural, and seem as though you want her companionship. When you have become on these friendly terms you will be able to practise the higher arts of courtship. But you should first serve the apprenticeship of a companion.

Misplaced Chivalry.

"CISSIE," is perplexed. She often travels to town with a young man, and they generally manage to meet at the booking office. He always persists on paying for "CISSIE'S" fare, and first class, and will never hear of her repaying him. Ought "CISSIE" to permit this, or is it etiquette for the young man to pay?

* * * * * * *

It is not only not etiquette, but very impolite of him. He places you under an obligation to him, to which he is not entitled. You should do one of two things. Either get to the booking office before he does, and buy yourself a third-class ticket, or tell the young man with a show of dignity that you positively object to his paying for your ticket, and that it is impolite of him to wish to do it. It would be entirely different if you were travelling as the companion of the man by his invitation, in which case it would be his duty to pay. But as you are travelling on your own account, you should be expected to pay for yourself. There is the young man's side of the question, and I might say a word about it. Perhaps he only pays for you out of a mistaken sense of chivalry. Well, he should avoid meeting you until after you have booked your ticket.

❦❦❦

A Relentless Girl.

"SOME months ago," writes "GUS," "I had an appointment to meet a young lady friend. On the day of the meeting I was taken suddenly ill, and could neither keep the appointment nor write and excuse myself. I was in bed for a week, and was ordered to go for a sea trip on recovering. When I returned, I called on the girl to explain the whole affair, but, though I knew she was in, I was told she was 'not at home.' I wrote and explained matters, but received no reply. When I met her in the street she cut me dead. Now, how can I act under such circumstances?"

* * * * * * *

If, "GUS," it was really not your fault that you did not explain your failure to keep the appointment before—if, in fact, you were really ill, then I think she is behaving in an extraordinary manner. A girl who refuses to accept such an excuse as yours could scarcely be the sort of girl for a young man to think of further cultivating. No doubt at the time she firmly convinced herself that you were offering her a slight. For weeks afterwards, receiving no word from you, she continued to think so, and probably grew to mortally despise and dislike you. When your explanation came it had no effect on her, as her feelings had already developed too strongly. Write once more, explaining the whole facts, and telling her that if she declines to accept them you will take it that she wishes the acquaintance at an end. She may then relent.

❦❦❦

In Her Fiancé's Absence.

"ROSIE B." is engaged to a man who has been abroad for over four years, and yet she has allowed another man to make love to her and kiss her and has promised to marry him. How girls can be so deceitful, is beyond me! If she loves him really better than the man she is engaged to, her only honourable course is to write and tell him that she is tired of waiting for him, and has decided to return all his gifts and letters, asking him to forgive the pain she has caused him. I should advise her to think well, however, before doing this, as a man who persistently makes love to a girl, knowing her to be engaged to another, is guilty of such underhand conduct as proves him to be the sort of man not greatly to be trusted. No wonder she feels dissatisfied at what she has done.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildin, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

MISCELLANEOUS ADVERTISEMENTS.

Will be inserted in this column at the rate of 6d. per line of 8 words or part thereof. All advertisements should be addressed to Advertisement Manager, "Short Stories," 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., 11 days prior to date of appearance.

Pawnbroker's Clearance Sale. 10/6. Lady's 18-Carat Gold-Cased Keyless Watch, Jewelled movement, exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also long Watch-guard, 18-Carat Gold (stamped) filled; two together only 10/6; approval. 10/6. Gent's 18-Carat Gold-Cased Chronograph Stop Watch, Jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper; 10 years' warranty; also 18-Carat Gold (stamped) filled Double Curb Albert, Seal attached; three together, 10/6; approval before payment. 19/6. Lady's Six-Guinea Solid Gold Keyless Watch, richly engraved; splendid timekeeper; 10 years' warranty; week's trial; sacrifice 19/6. 10/6. Lady's Solid Gold (ball-marked) Five-Guinea Diamond and Emerald Doublet Half-hoop Ring; large lustrous stones, 10/6; approval. 3/6. Handsome Long Watch-guard.—Real 18-carat gold (stamped) filled; ditto, heavier (extra long), exceptionally choice design, 10/6; approval. 10/6. Field Glass, Four-Guinea Military Binocular; 50 miles' range; 10 Achromatic Crystal Lenses, Wide Field; saddler-made sling case; sacrifice, 10/6; approval. B. C. DAVIS, 26 Denmark Hill, London.

"Poultry Keeping for Pleasure and Profit," by F. E. Wilson. A thoroughly reliable and practical handbook. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (P. K. Dept.) 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Walking," by C. Leag Neil, is a thoroughly practical guide to pedestrianism, contains information as to how to train in order to become an expert walker, &c. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (W. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Small Gardens, and How to Make the Most of Them," by Violet Biddle, is just the book for those desirous of procuring the best possible results from their gardens. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (S. G. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Cricket," Edited by G. L. Jessop, contains practical instructions as to how to play the game by K. S. Ranjitsinhji, C. B. Fry, G. L. Jessop, and others. Price 1/2, post free, from the Publisher (C. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Photography.—"How to Take and Fake Photographs," by Clive Holland, contains all information required by the beginner. Price 1/2, post free, from the Publisher (P. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Album, containing 812 stamps, 1/6.—Ascot, Edgehill, Crediton.

Face Leathers, superfine quality, 1/- post free, in box —K. Henre-Frances, Brixton Road, London.

Old Artificial Teeth Bought.—Call or forward by post; full value per return, or offer made.—Messrs. O. Browning, Manufacturing Dentists, 128 Oxford Street, London. (Established 100 years.)

Field Glasses.—Extremely fine pair Regulatio Glasses (Army pattern) very long (30 mile) range, purchased for officer's use in Transvaal, not now required; leather case and strap; worth 75/-; will sacrifice for 11/9; approval before payment proof of genuineness.—F. Barker (Quartermaster), "Durdans," Brixton, S.W.

Baldness Cured. Free Trial.—A French Specialist who has devoted his life to the study of Hair Diseases, having cured thousands of almost hopeless cases, will send a genuine inexpensive treatment to all who write enclosing 2 stamps. New Hair grows in 4 to 10 days.—K. Henri-Francis, Brixton Road London.

Bicycles, 4½ guineas; ladies', gent's; free wheels, rim brakes, best tyres; guaranteed.—Manufacturer, 1075 Stretford, Manchester.

Eczema and all Skin Eruptions.—A victim who was cured after 5 years' suffering will gladly send full particulars of an inexpensive guaranteed Cure on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Address: F. M. Paciderma, 3 Swallow Street, Piccadilly, London.

Teeth Bought, Gold and Platinum. Banker's reference.—Apply, Teeth by Instalments Institute, 48 Edgware Road, W.

Art.—Work at home, tinting prints, post-cards, etc.; easily acquired; good prices. Addressed envelope, Art Company, 6 St. James Street, London, W.C.

Pip Digestive Pastilles.—Thousands of samples await application.—Fox, 128 Olive Road, Dulwich.

Height Increased.—French Shoe Co., 269 Regent Street.

Anti-Rheumatic Boots—French Shoe Co., 269 Regent Street.

Anti-Lame Boots.—French Shoe Co., 269 Regent Street.

Free Gifts of £5.—£10 10s. Cycle for £5 10s. Particulars free.—Headland, 17 Mantone Street, Leeds.

A Good Cycle

At a FAIR price is cheaper than a poor Cycle AT ANY price. Buy the best and avoid risks.
"CENTAURS," "COVENTRY CHALLENGE," "HUMBERS," "PREMIERS," "ROVERS," "SWIFTS," "SINGERS," &c.
Their names guarantee their quality.

FROM 8/- MONTHLY.

WITHIN YOUR REACH

A HIGH-GRADE COVENTRY CYCLE FOR £6
On approval. Two Years' Warranty.
Write for Lists (Free).
EDWARD O'BRIEN Ltd. (Dept. S3),
World's Largest Cycle Dealers, COVENTRY.

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

JUNO CYCLES

ARE THE VERY BEST FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN
Complete with All Fittings and Carriage Paid.

Rustless Roman Rims & Hubs.

CASH OR 12 MONTHLY PAYMENTS of
£8 0 0 „ 15/- ea.
8 8 0 „ 1/10 „
9 0 0 „ 16/8 „
9 10 0 „ 17/6 „

JUNO Motor Cycles, 3 H.P., £34, or Monthly Payments.

JUNO Two-Speed Gear Cycles, £12 12s., or 12 Payments of 23/4 each. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories; over 130 pages and Hundreds of Illustrations, sent post free.

Metropolitan Machinists' Co. Ltd., S.S. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London E.C.; and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

"No Better Food."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED

"Strongest and Best."
—Health.

Cocoa

TRY ALSO FRY'S MALTED COCOA

A Combination of Fry's Pure Cocoa and Allen and Hanburys' Extract of Malt.

Strongly recommended by the "LANCET" and "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL."

Digitized by Google

"MENE"

A SAMPLE ½ DOZEN OF THESE FAMOUS SANITARY TOWELS IN ASSORTED SIZES, WILL BE SENT POST FREE FOR SIX STAMPS.

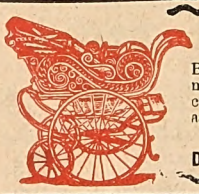
NONE EQUAL THEM FOR CLEANLINESS COMFORT & ECONOMY

SOLD BY ALL UNDERCLOTHING HOUSES AND CHEMISTS.

LADIES SHOULD WRITE FOR SAMPLE TO MISS HAYNES, 55, FANN ST. LONDON, E.C.

The daintiest thing for the table is

CEREBOS SALT



BABY CARS.

Buy direct and save 5/- in the £. Easy Payments from 3/6 Monthly. Good discount for cash. Every Car sent carriage paid, on approval. Our Catalogue shows many lovely styles, send for it.

DIRECT PUBLIC SUPPLY CO., COVENTRY.

ORDER

and Brightness Prevail where

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH is Used.

BRITISH ALL THROUGH.

Free from Acid, Poison, and Grit.

PRODUCES QUICKLY A LASTING BRILLIANCY.

Manufacturers: The "MATCHLESS" Metal Polish Co. Ltd., Liverpool.

THE BEST DRESSED MEN OF THE DAY WEAR

'OCEANIC' BOOTS

AND PAY

10/6

FOR THEM.

Manufactory: NORTHAMPTON

FENDERS AND BEDSTEADS

of Every Description Direct from Works.

Also CURBS, FIRE IRONS, BRASSES, FIRE GUARDS, &c.

Send particulars of your requirements. Sketches and Prices can be sent on at once.

SPARKHILL FENDER AND BEDSTEAD CO., B88 DURHAM ROAD, BIRMINGHAM.

I HADN'T SMILED

FOR MONTHS UNTIL I TRIED

THOMPSON'S CORN PLASTER.

CORNS DON'T WORRY the Man or Woman who Tries Thompson's Corn Plaster

It clears the feet of all Corns, Bunions, Enlarged Toe Joints. Easily applied. Thin as Silk. Never fails to Cure.

Packets, 1/1½, post free, from M. F. THOMPSON, 17 Gordon St., Glasgow.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 805 Week Ending June 4, 1904. Price One Penny.

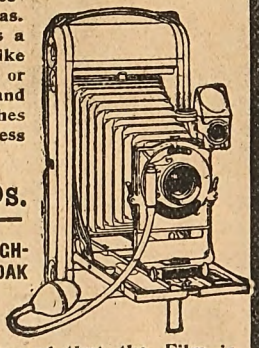
A beautiful woman in evening dress flung herself out of her carriage into the arms of a ragged man on the pavement.

(A Dramatic Incident from the Splendid Story, "A Charming Grass Widow." See inside.)

Google

KODAKS - For LADIES.

The Folding Pocket series is the most compact and convenient of all cameras. They are carried in the pocket as a book, or slung across the shoulder like a race-glass. They are opened or closed by one simple movement, and when folded are less than 1¼ inches thick, some of them weighing less than 12oz. The price varies



From 26s. to 90s.

They are DAYLIGHT LOADING THROUGHOUT, and with the aid of the KODAK DAYLIGHT DEVELOPING MACHINE no darkness is necessary in any process. In buying your camera be sure that it is a genuine Kodak and that the Film is N.C. Film. Success is then assured.

Ask your Dealer for a Price List, or write direct for full particulars of the New Photography to

KODAK Ltd.,
41-43 CLERKENWELL RD., E.C., And Branches.

ONE DOSE of

Kaputine cures in Ten minutes the most violent Headache or Neuralgic Pain no matter what the cause of the attack.

KAPUTINE is not an aperient, but is for one purpose only—to cure Headache and Neuralgia.
KAPUTINE

Cures in Ten Minutes.

Kaputine goes right to the seat of the trouble—the Nerves—it puts the Nerves right, that is why it cures almost instantly

Headache or Neuralgia.

Refuse dangerous white Headache Powders, such as have been condemned by the press. Demand Kaputine, the remedy that is backed up by medical testimony—the Safe Remedy.

Packets of 18 doses 1s.; Samples 1d. each. Of all Medicine Dealers.

Samples Free from Proprietors:
C. G. Kaputine, Huddersfield.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

Of all Chemists, or Post Free for P.O. only for 1/3, 2/10, and 4/7 from the Sole Proprietors:

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Mfging. Chemists, NOTTS.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST

FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN

Rustless Roman Rims & Hubs

Complete with All Fittings and Carriage Paid.

CASH OR 12 MONTHLY PAYMENTS of
£8 0 0 „ 15/- ea.
8 8 0 „ 15/10 „
9 0 0 „ 16/8 „
9100 „ 17/6 „

JUNO Motor Cycles, 3 H.P., £34, or Monthly Payments.

JUNO Two-Speed Gear Cycles £12 12s., or 12 Payments of 23/4 each. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories; over 130 pages and Hundreds of Illustrations, sent post free.

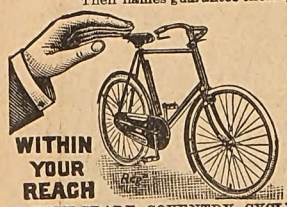
Metropolitan Machinists' Co. Ltd., S.S. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C.; and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

MOTH in BLANKET
"Ruination"
KEATING'S POWDER
"Preservation"
TINS 3d. 6d. & 1s. BELLOWS 9d.

DAILY EXPRESS
ONE HALFPENNY.

A Good Cycle

At a FAIR price is cheaper than a poor Cycle AT ANY price. Buy the best and avoid risks.
"CENTAURS," "COVENTRY CHALLENGE," "HUMBERS," "PREMIERS," "ROVERS," "SWIFTS," "SINGERS," &c.
Their names guarantee their quality.



FROM 8/- MONTHLY.

WITHIN YOUR REACH

A HIGH-GRADE COVENTRY CYCLE FOR £6
On approval. Two Years' Warranty.
Write for Lists (Free).
EDWARD O'BRIEN Ltd. (Dept. 53),
World's Largest Cycle Dealers, COVENTRY.

Beauty.

Without Icilma Natural Water, Soap, and Cream no woman can keep a clear, healthy, and delicately-tinted skin. Icilma invigorates, cleanses, and beautifies as no artificial cosmetic can do; by its use alone can natural beauty be assured. Prevents sunburn and refreshes. Cures nettlerash and mosquito bites. (Samples Soap and Cream, 2d.) Icilma (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

From 6/- Monthly. Special Offer. 500 New Cycles £3 10s. 500 Genuine B.S.A. £6 10s. Sample Victory Motor Cycle £26. Sent carr. paid before payment. Agents Wanted
Dereham Rd. Cycle Co., Norwich

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

TEN DAYS' FREE TRIAL

Allowed on every cycle bought of us. Your Money with carriage charges refunded if not perfectly satisfactory. Highest grade fully warranted

British Made Cycles
LATEST MODELS £2-10 to £6
New Departure Free Wheel and Hub Brake, Best Makes Tyres, and best British-made equipment.

200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES all makes, good as new, £1 to £2-10
Factory clearing sale at half prices.

EARN A CYCLE taking orders from sample machine furnished by us.
Active Agents wanted in each district. Large profits easily made. Write at once for free catalogues and our special offer.
Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonos half prices.

MEAD CYCLE CO. Dept. 44e
85-97, Paradise Street, Liverpool.
19, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

41·6·1904 LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

No. 805.] [One Penny.

Week Ending June 4th, 1904.

ANNETTE.

Telling how she Chose Between her Lovers.

She was swinging on a gate; a most undignified position for a girl who was seventeen years old, and who had just come into possession of an avowed lover.

Her quiet elder sister had met him in the lane a minute before, with the flash of early manhood in his frank blue eyes, and the energy of youth and hope ringing in his quick step.

When she reached the gate, she found the young girl laughing until the tears rolled down her cheeks. She stood and looked at her in amazement.

"Annette, what is the matter?" she demanded.

"What do you think? I'm engaged!"

On hearing the reply, her sister laughed, too, until she could not stand, but sat down on a great stone in the lane, just by the fence.

Annette sprang off the gate then, and came beside her. She wore a pink cambric dress, with a white ruffle at her throat; her lithe, girlish figure; her fair, fresh face, her soft, brown hair, braided down her back, and tears of mirth in her dark eyes, she made a picture.

Janet felt as if she had never really seen her before; she grew sober at once. Seventeen years old, and had a lover! It was nothing to laugh at; it was sad, earnest, real; the child had become a woman.

"There is no use in being serious, for it is altogether too funny!" And the young girl laughed afresh, wiping off the tears on the back of her hand; her handkerchief was in the pocket of her dainty apron, but she seemed to scorn its use for such jolly tears.

"But, my dear—" began Janet solemnly.

"But, my dear!" interrupted Annette, with a fresh burst of merriment.

"You don't seem to realise what you are doing!" continued her elder sister, her voice quivering with anxiety.

"Now, Janet, you can't give me a realising sense of things—you know you never could. This world isn't all catechism and creed. Part of it is a joke; jokes are horribly improper, but I like them, and this is such a one!"

"It is a pretty serious joke; when you come to marry you will find it out," was the grave reply.

"Marry! Who ever spoke of marrying, Janet?" And the young girl grew suddenly quiet, wiping the tears off the back of her hand on her apron.

"Why, you did."

"I? No, indeed, Janet, you are mistaken. I said I was engaged," was the earnest protest.

"Engaged—what for?" demanded her sister.

"Fun!" laughed the girl.

Janet looked very serious.

"Does Mark Colton think it is for fun?" she asked.

That set Annette off again; when she could grow sober she said:

"Oh, no, indeed, he was so dreadfully in earnest—that is the funniest part of it. He wanted me to promise to be his for all time and eternity. Did you ever hear of anything so silly? I told him that eternity was a thing which we knew nothing about; that time, as compared with it, was only a point, and that I despised points."

Janet would not even smile.

"So I just agreed to be engaged to him, and he sighed, and made the best of it."

"What will aunt say?"

"When she knows, it will be time enough to speculate on that," was the careless retort. Her elder sister looked disapproving.

"Now, Janet, I know that you are going to marry the minister," said the young girl.

"Why?" and the question was accompanied by a slight blush.

"Because you grow more serious every day, and people in love are always serious."

"Then you certainly are not in love," retorted Janet; and rising, opened the gate and led the way up the garden-path to the house—a low-browed, weather-stained farmhouse, with projecting eaves, and brown moss and lichens covering the roof.

They both entered, and Annette ran upstairs to her quaint little room under the rafters.

There was something fine and tender in the girl's nature—she went round the shadow, instead of stepping on it; then she sat down in the window, where the sunlight was the broadest. Most people look best in the shade, but the sunlight always brightened Annette into beauty. She had some tatting in her pocket, and now drew it out, her small brown hands weaving the delicate fabric with rapid motion. As she sat thus, something wistful came into her dark, piquant face.

Digitized by Google

She had known Mark Colton from her very babyhood; his father's and her aunt's farms were separated only by the lane of which we have spoken. He was four years her senior. When children, he had taken her on his shoulder many a time and carried her over the brooks that plentifully watered that pleasant section of country; they had ridden the same horse, she seated behind him; had swung on the same gate; and had done a thousand other things together, through all the slow years of childhood.

Of late they had hunted four-leaved clovers and cut their names in the bark of trees, and hovered about love, not knowing it was there—yet held by those many little acts, so full of poetry and romance. Mark was the first to learn.

When he first came face to face with this fact, he was alone, pruning trees in his father's orchard; the blood surged to the roots of his flaxen hair; he dropped his pruning-knife and started impetuously towards the farmhouse on the other side of the lane. He only went a few steps, though, then turned back, and picking up his knife, went on with his work.

That same day he met Annette, and was so quiet and reserved, that she demanded, in a pet, what he was so cross about; and that night, at a party in the village, she would not look at him, but devoted herself to the other boys, especially the new minister's brother Philip, a pale-faced, interesting youth, who was studying theology.

That was four months ago. The trees in the orchard had blossomed and budded, and now were heavy with fruit; and all that time Mark Colton had kept the secret that he found in his pruning that day.

Since then Annette had not been able to understand him; he had been unreasonable, exacting, cross, she said; and she, because she knew it troubled him, though she hardly comprehended why, was especially kind and merry with Philip, whilst the young student dreamt of her both waking and sleeping.

During three months she never looked at Mark when others were present, and when alone with him, laughed at and slighted everything he said. He bore it all in his patient, manly way, but this day of which we have been telling, took the matter in his own hands, told her his love in an impetuous way, and brought her to the unsatisfactory terms which we have recorded.

The girl was thinking of all this, sitting thus in the sunlight. Suddenly her tatting fell into her lap, and she held her two hands up, and looked at them. Mark had kissed them.

"What a silly boy!"—that was the thought, with a little quivering smile upon her lips that would never have grown into a laugh. Then her aunt Helen's shrill voice rang out from the foot of the stairs:

"Annette! Annette!"

She put her tatting in her pocket, and went to answer the summons. The minister and Philip were coming to tea, and she was wanted.

Janet was moving about in a sort of blissful dream. She wore a white dress, and had a scarlet geranium in her black hair. Twenty-four years seemed terribly old to Annette. She had never supposed Janet would be in love; she thought she was too old. Her quiet elder sister had always been beautiful to her, but she had never seen her so lovely as now.

They came just at tea-time. Annette opened the door for them; she was always bashful with the minister, but everything merry in her nature seemed to develop for Philip. She ushered the minster formally into the drawing-room, and, motioning to Philip, detained him in the hall, and put a bunch of flowers in his buttonhole.

The tea-bell rang almost instantly. Annette's plate was laid beside the minister's, Janet's by Philip's. The minister smiled a trifle at the arrangement. Annette saw the smile, and did not feel so much afraid of him. He looked like Philip, only he had force and vitality.

Aunt Helen did most of the talking. The minister gave polite attention to what she said; but Philip sat and gazed at Annette in a sort of dream, and never heard a word until she came to these:

"They ought to have been plain Jane and Ann, but their mother was a Spanish woman, and insisted on the ette; and their father was always so bewitched with her that he had but little sense."

"Does Janet look as her mother did?" asked the minister, smiling into the dark eyes on the opposite side of the table. Annette saw that smile, too, and gave Philip a funny look that capitivated him. Since he was not thinking of either his brother or Janet, he took it all to himself.

"The girls both favour her, only she was deemed handsome," was Aunt Helen's dry retort.

A little later Annette and Philip stood watching Janet and the minister stroll down the lane.

"See, they are in love," whispered the girl, with a smile.

"They are going to be married," said Philip, and sighed.

Mark Colton joined them just in time to hear this. For the first time in her life his approach brought a quick blush to Annette's dark cheeks.

Philip saw it, with a bright look on his dreamy face; he thought he had called it forth. Mark thought the same, and his brow clouded. Annette saw the mutual mistake, and a sudden coquetry seized her.

"Mark, they are going to be married," she said, accenting the words exactly as Philip had done, and pointing to the retreating figures in the lane.

Philip looked both hurt and embarrassed. The cloud on Mark's brow was instantly dissipated; he caught the upraised hand in his.

"Annette, it is as impolite to point as to whisper," he said.

Philip turned pale. She drew her hand impatiently away. Mark abruptly left them, and went out on the balcony, grieved and troubled. She and Philip stayed in the window, laughing and talking, until the twilight deepened, and the moon and stars came out. Then they also came upon the balcony. Mark paid no attention to their coming. Philip sat down beside him. Annette stood in the doorway.

"See, Philip, how pretty that white rose looks in the moonlight! Can you get it for me?" she said.

He went down the steps for it gladly. The moment he had gone, she whispered in Mark's ear, so close that her long braid of hair fell on his shoulder, "What a silly boy you are!" and took the seat that Philip had vacated. Just then he came back, followed by Janet and the minister, and a few minutes later Mark and Annette went to the gate to watch the brothers out of sight as they took their way to the village.

As they stood thus, Mark took her hand in his, and she did not draw it away. His face was troubled.

"When I took your hand when Philip was here, you were offended; and yet we are engaged. Why?" he asked.

"What is the use of telling all the world?" she replied gaily.

"You mean what's the use of telling Philip?" he retorted. She was silent. He continued:

"When we are married, even Philip will have to know."

"I do not know any one who is going to be married excepting Janet and the minister," she said coolly.

He bade her "Good-night" instantly at that, and she went into the house and up into her own room. She sat down on the edge of her little bed and cried, "I wish I had never seen either of them," in the midst of her tears.

* * * * *

The summer wore away, and the autumn came. Janet and the minister were married, and went to live at the parsonage in the village.

During this time, Mark, Philip, and Annette had lived in a most unhappy, discontented way. Of the three, Annette was the most wretched, for she suffered the continual reproach of an outraged conscience.

All these summer months the young student had lived in an unreal world, dreaming a dream that would never be realised. She knew this, yet did not undeceive him. At first an innate coquetry prompted her to silence, and after that she had not the courage to give him pain. She loved Mark, but Philip called forth all the pity in her nature; and pity with some women is almost as strong as love.

Digitized by Google

The course which she had pursued had wrought a great change in Mark. A slow discontent and jealousy took possession of him; he became sullen and unreasonable. At length one day his unhappiness took form, and shaped itself into a resolve. He was becoming dwarfed and embittered; the manly purpose had gone out of him; he saw it all, realised it all. The girl did not love him as he loved her—probably never would. If he continued as he was now, she would very justly grow to despise him.

His father had long wished him to attend a course of study in a neighbouring town; he would release her, set her free, and go at once.

He acted instantly upon his resolution.

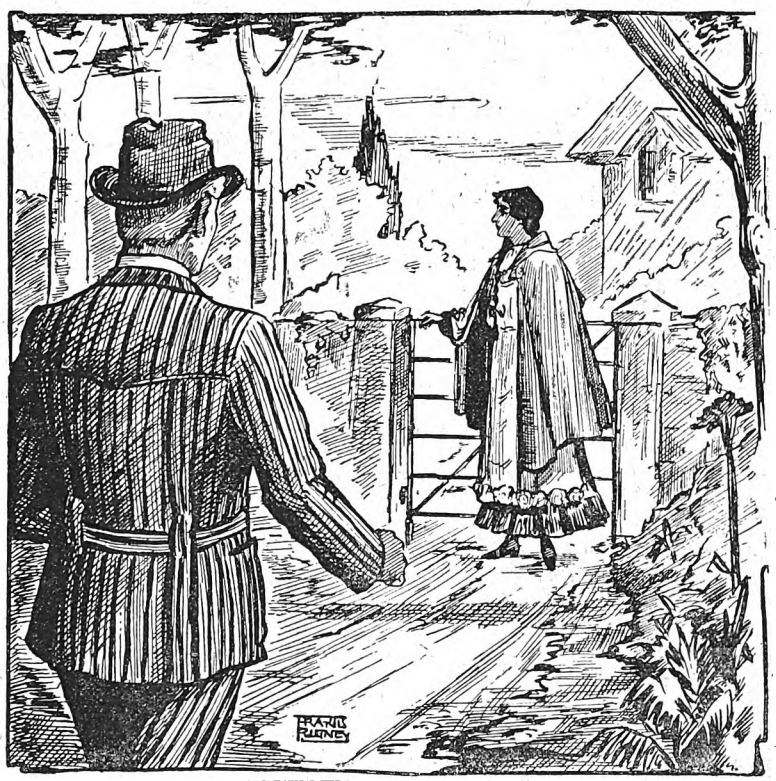
As he went down the lane he saw her standing at the gate, quite where he had told her of his love those months gone by. The lane was bordered by trees, whose foliage was all crimson and gold; she had a scarlet cloak thrown over her shoulders, and looked a part of the autumn. It seemed as if he could not do it, but he did, with the old manly look coming back into his face. Even her lips grew pale.

"You are right, Mark! It is best that we should both be free."

Then she was alone.

He strode down the lane to hide his anguish from what he thought her careless eye, and she sat down on the stone outside the gate where Janet had sat the day she told her she was engaged, and burying her face in her hands, moaned.

When it was known that Mark had gone, the conclusion drawn was this: "Then it is at last decided that Annette is to marry Philip." Philip thought so, too, yet his natural timidity restrained him from learning the truth from the girl's own lips.



As he went down the lane he saw her standing at the gate.

Annette was wretched, she learnt that she loved Mark better than her life; that the days without him were endless and sad. She had never been separated from him before. Sometimes she cried bitterly.

Her disposition had been evenly sweet and joyous; now she became moody.

Aunt Helen noticed the change, and with her keen instinct guessed the secret. She said nothing to Annette, however, for under her stiff ways beat a kind heart.

The minister's wife felt rather than saw the change in the girl. There was something, for all her gay and careless manner, that disquieted her sister

Did she care that Mark had gone away? It hardly seemed possible, she had such a frank, unconcerned way of speaking of him. Did she love Philip? She was very kind to him—too kind; she was gentle, almost pitying, to him.

Philip's was a nature that would always be craving sympathy, a clinging, dependent nature; Annette was strong and self-sustained; one could supply the want of the other; but would Annette always be content to supply? The minister's wife was excessively troubled, and it was the only trouble which she could not take to her husband.

She could not talk to anyone of it; she did not suppose that Aunt Helen had noticed any change in her, and she had not the courage to speak to the young girl herself.

So the winter passed, and the spring, and the summer, and yet Mark did not come. His father advised him to see a bit of the world during his vacation, and he did so.

Then it was another autumn, and a whole year had passed since they had parted. There was bitterness in Annette's heart; he had doubtless forgotten her; why should she not forget him?

It was when this bitterness possessed her that Philip told her of his love, and besought her promise to be his wife.

She was standing at the gate where she had last seen Mark.

Our fates swing on very small pivots. Had she been anywhere else than at the gate, in her present mood, she would have accepted him; as it was, she did the first wise thing that she had done since she first knew him; she asked time to think.

He begged her to promise there and then, with a sudden pallor coming into his face, but she persistently refused, and he turned from her sadly and went away.

She watched him go down the lane as she had Mark a year ago,—watched him coldly, critically; then that dangerous element of pity in her nature asserted itself, and she came outside the gate impetuously, as if to call him back; but her wiser, truer nature restrained her.

"It is my punishment to make him suffer as I do. I would die before I would marry him," she said, and sat down upon the great stone by the fence.

As she sat there, Janet came up the lane, and stood beside her. The unhappiness on the girl's face was so apparent that she yielded to her first impulse, and asked anxiously:

"Annette, my dear child, tell me what is the matter?"

The girl's effort for gaiety was painful.

"Why, Janet, at last I have got a realising sense of things."

Digitized by Google

"Tell me about it," said the minister's wife, with her voice full of tenderness.

"There is nothing to tell," was the reply, and Annette rose and led the way to the house.

Aunt Helen stood in the doorway; she had a basket of pippins in her hand, which she had just been gathering.

Annette took one and tried to eat it; she could not—it choked her. She threw it away, went into the house, and up to her own room.

Aunt Helen and the minister's wife looked at each other, and in that moment, for the first time in their lives, each understood the other. Aunt Helen loved Annette "as the apple of her eye," and Janet had only just found it out.

"She cannot do anything. God forbid that she should marry for pity!" she said, and her keen, critical eyes had tears in them.

The next afternoon Philip came into the parsonage with a pale face. Janet had seen him go away, and watched anxiously for his return. She felt instinctively that he had gone to Annette to learn his fate and hers. There was a sudden prayer of thankfulness in her heart when she saw him. They were both saved.

He came into the sitting-room where she was, and threw himself on the sofa. He was restless, and occasionally moaned. He never even saw Janet. She left the room with tears in her eyes.

After an hour had passed she returned. His face was flushed, his eyes bloodshot. She went beside him, and placed her hand on his forehead. He had a hot fever.

"You are not well, Philip," she said gently.

"I? No, I believe not. I think I will go to bed," he said, and went up to his own room.

Annette had seen this ahead of her for a whole year, and now stood there condemned. Her own heart condemned her—hence God, who is greater than our hearts, condemned her, too.

That was her moral attitude, this her actual physical one. She stood in the upper hall, right outside the door, and heard Philip, in sad delirium, tell her trouble, and his, to all who came to his bedside—to Janet and the minister, to the kind old doctor and Aunt Helen. He told it over and over again, sometimes in the very words she had told it to him, for she had accepted it as part of her punishment to let him know of her love for Mark.

At first she suffered bitter shame and mortification in having them all know how she had been slighted; and this soon gave place to anxiety, for the doctor said that Philip's life was very uncertain.

He had not been well all summer—had had a sort of fever in his veins. They assured her repeatedly that this would have been the result at any rate; but she censured herself wholly, and grew thin and pale with dread.

"If he dies," she said, "I have killed him."

Several times she tried to stay in the room, but, although he did not know her, her presence increased his delirium, so she remained in the hall, watching the face of each one who came out, with eyes grown hollow and despairing. In the end they were as anxious for her as for Philip. Even the minister forgave her the sorrow she had caused his brother, in pity for her retribution.

So many days and nights went by, and at last the doctor said to Aunt Helen:

"There are worse things in this world than death. No brain will bear a continual strain of remorse and fear."

Aunt Helen's strong, angular figure quivered. He left her, and went into the hall.

"Annette," he said kindly, but firmly, "you must take this."

She took the powder as submissively as a child. They had placed a sofa in the hall for her. A little later, when Aunt Helen came out, she found her lying on it in a heavy, dreamless sleep. Whilst she was in that sleep Philip passed the crisis and lived.

Several months passed. In that time the young student struggled reluctantly back into health, and went away for a final year in college, and Annette, subdued and saddened by her late bitter experience, stayed very closely at home with Aunt Helen.

Her friends, only knowing half of the story, censured her greatly, setting her down as a cruel flirt and jilt. At first she persistently shunned society, refusing every invitation; but at length her natural pride asserted itself, and she made great efforts to be her old self and take her old place.

So another year went by, and the village was all astir. Mark Colton was expected home, and so was Philip, and there was a round of gaiety planned for their reception. Mrs. Colton opened the season by issuing a great number of invitations. Mark was expected to arrive on a certain morning, and his friends were to meet him in the evening.

Philip was already at the parsonage, and someone had seen him several times walking with Annette in the pleasant lane that separated Aunt Helen's farm from Mr. Colton's. This was told over and over in the village. Of course nobody knew who the someone was who had seen this, but each one considered his or her informant perfectly reliable, and that was sufficient. There had been a great deal of wonderment as to whether Annette would dare run the risk of meeting Philp by accepting the invitation, but, of course, this settled the question.

Some of the girls secretly sighed over it; they had hoped Annette would not join in the gaiety. Mark had left on account of Philip, and now both Mark and Philip were back, and in the time that had elapsed Annette, who was always pretty, had bloomed into positive beauty.

Whilst her little world was discussing her probable course of action, Annette was struggling between her heart and her pride. The former begged her to stay at home, the latter sneered at her weakness and taunted her with being afraid to meet one who had not thought of her for two long years.

Aunt Helen never asked her what she intended to do, but Annette saw them both look at her anxiously, and she secretly shed many bitter, mortified tears. So far as walking in the lane was concerned, why, so unreliable was that indefinite someone that the whole thing was a fabrication; she did not even see him until the day of the party. Then he came to the house and waited on the balcony until she came out. Somewhat later, she went into the sitting-room, where Aunt Helen sat knitting. "I have decided to go to-night with Philip," she said.

The spinster pushed up her spectacles and looked at the girl with surprise.

"He is going to be married, and is as happy as can be. I needn't trouble over that any more," she continued, joyfully.

"I never saw a man yet who hadn't a surprising capacity for loving," commented Aunt Helen.

Annette laughed, then grew suddenly grave. "I think, after all, it is well they are so constituted, Aunt Helen," she said, and went up to her room to decide on her toilet.

Everybody was at that first party—old and young, married and single. Even Aunt Helen went, causing a general expression of astonishment by her presence; for she had not been to a party for forty years. She started early, telling Annette that she meant to see the whole thing through, from beginning to end.

Mark stood beside his mother, and more than once found his blue eyes brought directly to meet the keen, critical eyes of the spinster. She did everything from principle, was honest to the backbone; hence she treated him with the coldness and displeasure which she felt. He had always been a favourite with her—hence he was perplexed and troubled by her manner.

When we love we feel a sort of attraction towards anyone who is in the habit of being near the object of our affection. Mark had such a feeling for Aunt Helen, and her rebuff seemed like a shadow of Annette's; for in these years—wonderful fact to record in the history of man!—he had been wholly constant to his first love.

He had heard from his mother of her refusal of Philip, and had begun to think that, perhaps, he had been over-hasty, and to entertain a faint hope of winning her after all.

In courts of law men have often been wrongly condemned on circumstantial evidence. Annette this evening was placed in a like position. When she came into the room on Philip's arm everyone considered the matter settled.

Digitized by Google

Mark grew deathly pale—even his lips were white, and he clutched the back of the chair by which he stood, as if for support.

Philip led her directly to him. She had never looked more lovely; she held out her hand in frank, cordial welcome, the bright crimson mantling her cheek. She had been preparing herself for this all day. He was taken unawares—hence at a disadvantage; and Aunt Helen's shrewd eyes took it all in with a smile breaking up the lines of her face.

Mark shook hands with them both; he tried to be cordial, but failed signally, and the moment they joined the gay crowd that were promenading, he abruptly left his mother to receive the guests, and left the room.

Aunt Helen did everything on principle; she acted according to the rule of her life now, and followed the young man. She found him on the balcony.

"You are not well?" she said.

There was always a pleasant courtesy about Mark. He thanked her for her kindness, saying he would be all right in a minute.

"What made you so unhappy?" she asked.

There is a great deal of power in a direct question. Mark found himself face to face with this one, and did not know how to escape it.

"Aunt Helen," he said, and his voice quivered painfully, "so Annette is going to marry Philip after all?"

"You are very much mistaken! Philip is going to be married, yet not to Annette. But what is it to you whether Annette marries or not?"

In his sudden joy he was wholly off his guard.

"It is so much to me, Aunt Helen, that if my surmise had been correct, I should wish that I were dead!"

"Dear me! It is curious how two ordinarily sensible people can misunderstand each other," commented the spinster drily; and a moment after went back to the drawing-room, with her arm resting stiffly on Mark's.

Mark Colton made a delightful host that evening. Everybody was charmed and enjoyed themselves to the full, excepting Annette, yet she seemed the gayest of the gay; she even danced repeatedly with Mark, and laughed and talked as lightly as if he were a new acquaintance that she was delighted to make. Once or twice after a dance he tried to lead her out on the balcony, but she shivered, saying it was too cold, though there was scarce a chill in the late May evening.

At length he came beside her, and, throwing a shawl of his mother's over her shoulders, said, and there was something teasing in his earnest voice:

"You have no excuse now."

She took his arm instantly, the colour deepening in her cheeks. Just at that moment the music started for a quadrille, so they found the balcony deserted.

When once there, she drew her hand from his arm. For a moment there was an uncomfortable silence; then he said in an embarrassed tone:

"So you are not going to marry Philip after all?"

"I? Oh, no; of course not!" she answered, as if such a thing had never been thought of before.

"Whom are you going to marry, then?" he asked.

She laughed.

"Oh, no one; I'm going to be an old maid, like Aunt Helen."

Philip led her straight to him.

She had been restlessly clasping and unclasping her bracelet. Now it fell to the floor—he picked it up—she held out her hand to take it, but he clasped it round her white wrist himself, and then unclasped it and clasped it again. The crimson flooded her cheeks for an instant, their eyes met, a smile came into his; she looked quickly away.

"Annette, you have tormented me for two years," he said.

"Discipline is healthy," she retorted, with a laugh, though there were tears of joy on her long lashes.

"Am I the only one who has been disciplined?" he asked, with grave eagerness.

"I despise questions," she replied, and dashed the tears away.

"Yet you must answer one now, Annette," he said. "Will you love Mark Colton and be his wife?"

"That is two questions," was the provoking reply.

"One answer will do for both," he said, and bowed his head until he received it.

Annette was among the first to go home. She came with Philip and went with him. The gossips were entirely off the track. Aunt Helen was among the last guests, and Mark made everyone laugh, the spinster heartiest of them all, by coolly kissing her "Good night."

In less than a week everybody knew it, and that autumn, in the little village church, the ceremony was performed by the minister, assisted by Philip, who had just been ordained.

S. Chesnewood.

THE BOYS' LEADER.

"The Paper a Boy Can Take Home."

ONE PENNY WEEKLY.

Digitized by Google

Containing the Incident depicted on the Cover.

A Charming Grass Widow.

Telling How She Became So, and What Happened Afterwards.

When Horace Lingard married Doris Dallas all he brought that pretty, vivacious, though quick-tempered, girl was a sheaf of unpaid bills.

Doris was very much in love with the scapegrace—thoughtless, good-humoured young fellow—and that explains everything. For Doris, you see, had a cool £4,000 a year in her own right, while Horace's sole income was a meagre allowance from his father, a retired major.

Young Mrs. Lingard paid her husband's debts without a murmur. She even set aside a sum that ought to have been more than sufficient for her spouse's requirements. But Horace was not satisfied. In spite of his "don't-care-a-hang-about-anything" kind of style, in spite of his appropriating the sum set aside for him by his young wife, every farthing of which he most religiously spent, it galled him to think that he depended so entirely upon his pretty bride. Yet he never attempted reformation. Life was too short to quarrel with one's lot, he argued, especially when it happens to be a rosy one.

Mrs. Dallas, Doris' mother, was not like most mothers-in-law. Immediately after the wedding breakfast she had called Horace aside.

"Horace," said she, "you've an excellent wife, so be good to her. Don't turn away, I'm not going to lecture you. All I want to tell you is that I shall come and stay with you for one day every six months. Newly-married couples don't want mothers-in-law hanging round them, so remember I give you six months' grace. Good-bye."

When the couple returned from their honeymoon, Mrs. Lingard made a suggestion to her husband.

"I've been thinking, dear," she began, "that it must sometimes be unpleasant for you to know that—that—well, that you spend my money instead of your own. No, no! Don't look cross, I have a suggestion. You told me once you had written a few short stories. Suppose you were to rent a room in some nice chambers in Chancery Lane. You could have a big brass place on the door inscribed in large letters: 'Horace Lingard, Author.' Now, haven't you a really clever little wife?"

Horace did recollect one boastful moment when he told the pretty heiress he had written short stories, but he had neglected to state that no editor could be found who would print them.

"But, my dear girl," he replied truthfully, "I can't write stories or articles or anything else for toffee. I should never earn sixpence at it."

"Oh, you silly boy," said Doris, laughing heartily. "No one wants you to. When people say to me, 'What is your husband's profession?' I shall promptly reply, 'Oh, he's an awfully busy man. He's an author, you know.' Some authors, Horace, earn thousands of pounds a year."

"And some earn nothing," added her husband. "But still, the idea's not half bad. Perhaps I shall be able to turn out something decent—if I can settle down."

And at that moment he really meant it, too.

So it was settled. A room was taken, a brass plate was fixed on the door, a brand new typewriter was purchased, which was never used, and the author turned out each morning with the strongest intention to begin work, which usually ended in the consumption of many cigars, chats with innumerable pals, and nothing else.

Doris' mother kept her promise to the letter. She, of course, corresponded regularly with her daughter, but during the whole six months she did not once set foot in the couple's house.

The day for her visit eventually arrived.

"Now, look here, Horace," said Doris one morning, "Mamma has written that she is coming to-day to see us, and I want you to come home by two o'clock. Never mind about that novel you are writing, which has kept you so late at the office recently. Be here to show mamma how dutiful and loving a husband you are."

"All right, dearest," rejoined Horace. "I'll finish up a chapter and come straight home."

"What is the number of the chapter you are writing?" asked the young wife with just a faint tinge of suspicion.

"Oh, well—I couldn't really tell you, my dear, offhand. But I'll be home punctually to the minute, you can rest assured at that."

The "author" departed. His great novel, which was going to take the reading public by storm, except for its title, did not exist.

* * * * * * *

"Yes, mamma," said Doris, "Horace will be certain to be here by two o'clock. He promised me faithfully."

But two o'clock brought him not.

"He's soon got like the rest of them," muttered Mrs. Dallas, hurt at her son-in-law's undutifulness.

"Don't be harsh on him, mamma. Horace may have been detained by important business, or he may even have met with an accident." The young wife brushed her eyes with a dainty silk handkerchief.

But as the hours passed both ladies began to get angry, especially Mrs. Dallas. They were both in a bad temper when at seven o'clock they sat down to dinner alone.

"I'm sure something must have happened to him," exclaimed the young wife for about the fiftieth time.

Mrs. Dallas laughed derisively.

"Don't talk to me of happenings, child," said the older woman sarcastically. "I used to think the same of your father. Business detained him sometimes, but more often something else. I know the sort of happening which keeps young married men away from home when their wives' mothers visit them. His absence is a deliberate insult to me, and considering that I have denied myself the pleasure of seeing my own daughter for six months, it is shameful."

"But, mamma——"

"Don't make any more excuses for him. Your husband is like most other men. He will come home after midnight—intoxicated."

"If he does I will never forgive him."

"Oh, yes, you will, and be as full of excuses for him to-morrow as you are to-day."

"Never. He will not return intoxicated. He has never done so. Why are you so bitter against him?" The young wife burst into a fit of sobbing.

"There, there, my dear, don't cry like that," said her mother, drawing Doris' slim figure to her. "Perhaps I'm wrong in thinking Horace married you merely for your money. Anyway, I'm going to stop the night with you, and if he does come home intoxicated, I'll tell you how to talk to him."

Digitized by Google

Now it so happened that the very day Mrs. Dallas had chosen for her visit was Derby day. Heroically putting aside all inclination to see the race for the "blue riband of the Turf," Horace Lingard pursued his way to his Chancery Lane chambers. In the Strand he ran up against Robson, of St. Peter's, an old college chum.

"You're the very chap we want to complete the quartet," said he, after the usual formula of greeting had been gone through. "I'm on my way to meet Baxter and Stevenson—both St. Peter's boys; you know them. We're going to the Derby. You really must come."

"Can't, my boy," said Horace. "Fact is, I'm writing a book. Don't laugh! Yes, a real novel, and I can't spare the time."

The figure of the elegant Robson doubled up with laughter.

"Upon my word, Lingard," he gurgled, "you're a born humourist. You stand there looking as sober as a stuffed toad and tell me you're a hard-working novelist—you, the laziest scoundrel in London. Oh, the impertinence of married youth." Tears were pouring from Robson's eyes.

"Well, it's like this, old chap," returned the abashed Horace, who felt such twitting keenly, "I haven't really begun the book yet. I've been making up my mind to start this past three months. But, I say, I'll come with you and see the boys. What have you been doing lately?"

Thus adroitly changing the conversation, Horace accompanied his friend to a certain Strand restaurant. An hour later the quartet, Horace's feeble refusal being entirely disregarded, commenced their journey to Epsom. At the Derby the gaiety about him, the people he knew, and the champagne he drank with one and the other, drove from his thoughts all remembrance of Doris, her mother, and his promise to be home at two o'clock that day.

Immediately after the great race nothing would please his three companions than that Horace should dine with them at their West End club.

"But, my dear boys," protested Horace's thickened voice. "I can't dine with you in these." He was dressed in a suit of light tweed.

"Oh, that's all right," explained Stevenson. "My diggings are just by the club. We're all going to change there. You can have my spare suit. You're about my figure."

Two o'clock the next morning, Horace, still wearing the borrowed dress suit, but a weary, limp, unsteady Horace, was carried home in a hansom cab.

He ascended the steps leading to his house with exceeding difficulty. Greater trouble was experienced in finding the keyhole, which, when found, refused to open the door at the insertion of a pocket knife. After ten minutes' weary effort Horace was beginning to expostulate when the door was suddenly opened from the inside. Horace staggered into the hall, to be welcomed with stern glances from Mrs. Lingard and her mother.

"Will you be good enough to come into the drawing-room, Mr. Lingard," said his wife, with frigid sarcasm.

"What's the matter?" he asked innocently, and endeavouring to speak naturally. Mrs. Dallas followed him into the room.

"Oh, merely nothing. Allow me to introduce my mother."

"Dear me! Pleased to see you. Won't you sit down. Make yourself at—— Just remembered, my dear. Ought to have come early, of course, but——"

"You ought, sir," interrupted the young wife, coldly. "Perhaps you will tell me how you managed to get into the house to dress, and why you left it without seeing me?"

Horace looked helplessly at his borrowed clothes.

"Upon my honour, my dear," he stammered, "I haven't been home at all!"

"You went out in morning dress?"

"So I did, Doris; so I did. Where did I get these clothes? Bothered if I know. They fit all——"

"Just listen to me, sir, if you are sufficiently sober. Some hours ago I said that if you came home intoxicated I would never forgive you. You have insulted me, you have insulted my mother, and I shall never forgive you." The young wife was almost hysterical.

Both ladies left the room.

Horace awoke next morning with a fearful headache. He had passed the night in an easy chair in the drawing-room.

In the breakfast-room plates were laid for one.

"Where is your mistress?" he asked the maid.

"She breakfasts in her own room, sir."

Horace went upstairs and knocked at his wife's door.

"Well? What is it?" his wife inquired.

"Doris, dear. Are you ill?"

Horace felt very ashamed of his conduct. At an encouraging word from his wife he would have made a clean breast of the previous day's doings.

"Go away. I don't want to see you," replied Doris.

"Let me in, my dear. I'll explain."

Mrs. Lingard had not slept a moment. "Where had her husband obtained that dress suit?" she asked herself a thousand times. Her mother had encouraged her in her suspicions.

"I shall not let you in," she cried. "You have deceived me"—her voice rose to an hysterical pitch—"you've insulted mamma. Go away, and don't come back till you've money of your own to fling away in drunken orgies."

The words struck Horace like the lash of a whip.

"Do you mean what you say?" he asked angrily.

"Certainly I do."

He paused a moment, then he said quite calmly—

"Well, good-bye, then." But his wife made no reply.

Horace Lingard left the house. He did not return that day nor the next. Doris became very uneasy. She was already sorry for the words she had uttered. A week passed, and she became seriously alarmed. She and her mother went to Horace's chambers in Chancery Lane. His room was "To Let." He had paid his rent bill some days previously. Inquiry at his banker's elicited the fact that he had drawn out every penny—his account did not exceed fifty pounds. Major Lingard, his father, had not seen or heard of him.

A month passed without tidings of the runaway. Mrs. Lingard became seriously ill. Three months' stay in the Riviera improved her health, but made her still more anxious for the return of the good-humoured though thoughtless husband.

Heartrending advertisements in the principal newspapers, investigation by "Captain Bertram Lynx, the up-to-date detective," carried on over a period of months and running up a bill which exceeded £200—all efforts were of no avail.

When a year had gone by Mrs. Lingard became somewhat reconciled. As for Mrs. Dallas, who blamed herself for being the cause of the trouble in suggesting to her daughter that she should throw into her husband's face his dependence upon her purse, the really good-hearted old lady tried to atone for the mischief by whirling Doris from one form of excitement and gaiety to another. The grass-widow seemed not to mind. She visited theatres, attended concerts, opened bazaars—every day she was busy at some public or Society function.

Entertainments on behalf of charitable undertakings especially appealed to the pretty Mrs. Lingard, and the stall over which she presided was always certain to bring in large receipts. Perhaps it was due to the mystery which shrouded her husband's sudden disappearance, the reason for which, of course, the world did not know.

It was quite eighteen months after Doris' cruel words had driven her husband from his home when the great flower bazaar was begun at the Albert Hall. It was one of those usual smart affairs, when folk allow themselves to be robbed right and left in "charity's sweet name." The great hall was superbly decorated with flowers, and stalls for the sale of certain blooms were presided over by pretty women who were dressed to represent the flowers they sold.

Mrs. Lingard disposed of bluebells, and was herself dressed to represent this pretty flower. Her fair, perfectly-chiselled features looked out from a bonnet shaped like a bluebell; her rich silk gown was similarly shaped. Indeed she was pronounced to be the most prettily dressed among dozens of fashionable women attired to represent favourite flowers.

Digitized by Google

The grass-widow sold her button-holes at ten shillings apiece; her bouquets fetched from two to five guineas. She was in the act of pinning one of these button-holes in the coat of an admiring purchaser on the third evening of the bazaar when her eye was caught by the unkempt, unwashed figure of a man.

She wondered for a moment why they had ever allowed such a ragamuffin into the hall. As a matter of fact, the authorities had resisted the man's invasion, but he had put down his half-a-crown, and in a determined tone had declined to leave.

He was a regular scarecrow. His bowler hat was battered and greasy; his coat was torn and threadbare; his trousers were frayed at the bottoms; his boots were worn at the heel. He had not been shaved for a week, and his face and hands were grimy.

He sauntered slowly along, heedless of the shuddering of fashionable dames or the pointed remarks of well-dressed men.

At the pretty grass-widow's stall he stopped.

"How much for this?" he said, taking the bluebells into his grimy fingers.

"Ten shillings," said the living Bluebell. The pink had left her cheeks.

"I'll take it; please fix it in my coat." Doris' senses were reeling, but she noticed that, despite the scarecrow's clothes, he had the voice of a gentleman.

Mrs. Lingard fastened the button-hole in the man's greasy coat. She tried to avoid looking into his face, but the impulse was too strong for her. A moment later a woman's shriek rang through the building. Doris had fainted.

Immediately the flower stall was surrounded by eager questioners. The disreputable-looking man had been seen by the stall. A search was made for him. He had vanished.

Mrs. Dallas was at her daughter's side when she recovered.

"What is it, darling?" she anxiously inquired.

"Home, mamma; home, at once," was her only reply.

In her own home the grass-widow broke into a fit of passionate sobbing. Her mother left her to have her cry out.

"Tell me, dear," asked Mrs. Dallas, "what it was that alarmed you? Was it that scarecrow who——"

"That scarecrow was—was Horace."

The following day the advertisements again appeared in the agony columns of the newspapers. Yet though many callers and letters were received, no news was gained of the missing husband. Mrs. Lingard kept to her room. Her health gave way. She cried repeatedly for her husband and lover. At last Mrs. Dallas insisted that Doris should go to the theatre. Doris was too weak to resist. She dressed mechanically, and walked to the carriage at her door as if in a dream.

It was a few minutes to eight o'clock, and the Strand was thronged with vehicles. Mrs. Lingard's carriage was compelled to proceed at a walking pace; now and again it stopped. On one of these occasions it paused where the lamps of a public-house threw a strong glare on the pavement. The grass-widow was looking out of the window. Suddenly, before her mother had the least idea of what she was going to do, she flung the door open and was out on the pavement.

And then the public were treated gratis to as dramatic a scene as ever was witnessed in the house of melodrama close at hand.

A woman, in light attire, with bare arms and neck, and diamonds in her hair, had flung herself into the arms of a dirty man on the pavement, and was sobbing as though her heart would break.

The dirty man lifted her up tenderly, half carried her to the carriage, shouted "Home" to the coachman, and took his place beside her.

Mrs. Lingard was the first to speak when the carriage was well on its way back.

"Oh, Horace," she cried, "forgive me those harsh words. I never meant them, really. I love you sincerely. And you, poor boy, have been living all these months in London in poverty."

"Don't reproach yourself, my darling," answered Horace Lingard, for he it was; "it is the best thing that could have happened to me. It has made a man of me. And I'm not poor now, Doris. I've been mining in Western Australia. I could write a cheque for thousands."

"But why," asked Mrs. Dallas, "are you dressed so—so—unconventionally. Why did you come to the flower bazaar?"

"I wanted to see if Doris would cut me, that's all. I wasn't certain, so I followed your cariage to-night. I was going to meet you at the door of the theatre. But, you see, it was quite unnecessary."

"Yes, quite unnecessary, dear Horace," repeated his wife, passing a soft, white arm round his grimy neck. "But you must be a good boy and—and wash yourself when we get home, and we'll live happy ever after, as they do in the story books."

J. G. Jones.

NEARLY A TRAGEDY.

Showing How He Laughs Longest Who Laughs Last.

The old clock standing in the corner of the kitchen had just struck ten, and had then burst out into song, so to speak, of the five old, old tunes which its maker, with perverted ingenuity, had affixed to its internal economy.

"Beautiful old tune," said Mr. Willie Lamb, who was in the humour to be delighted with anything, as the rusty old mechanism, after two or three gasps and rattlings, changed from "The Lass of Richmond Hill" to a pathetic rendering of "Old Dog Tray."

"I am glad you like it—it is quite a family relic," said Miss Amy Marjoribanks, who was sitting on a low stool by his side with her hand resting affectionately in his.

"Ah," murmured the gentleman," "we must try to get a family relic or two when you consent to make me the most foolishly happy of men."

"Foolishly happy!" said the lady archly. "Oh, Willie, you ungallant man! And I'm afraid papa will not give you the chance. I wonder why he is so prejudiced against you?"

"I suppose he thinks my position is not good enough," answered Mr. Lamb despondingly. "I know of nothing else."

"I wonder what would happen if he caught you here?" remarked Miss Amy, her delicate frame convulsed with a shudder.

"Kicks!" said the gentleman grimly.

"Oh, Willie, surely—surely you don't mean that you would kick papa," faltered the lady.

"No, my darling—no; Heaven forbid! I have too much respect for him (and his weight too)," muttered the lover; "but I could hardly expect him to exercise such forbearance. He is a very violent man."

"He is a little violent," agreed the dutiful daughter; "but I think it is his wretched health more than anything else."

Digitized by Google

"His—" blurted the gentleman, and then stopped suddenly. A mental picture of the invalid in question—stout, ruddy, and with the fabled digestion of the ostrich—rose suddenly before his eyes; but he understood women, and he altered his sentence: "Yes, you are right, my love, as you always are; that must be the cause."

This happy agreement led to several tender passages in which Mr. Lamb shone to much advantage, when the happy couple were suddenly disturbed by the distant grating of a key in a lock. As they listened, horrified beyond all measure, their unwilling ears heard the street door open and shut, after which the house shook and rattled as the invalid wiped his boots on the door-mat.

"Fly!" gasped the terrified Amy.

Mr. Lamb's white, dry lips formed the word:

"Where?"

"Anywhere," said the lady lucidly. Then she seized his arm, and said: "Coal cellar!" And, dragging him to the end of the kitchen, flung open a door, and, pushing him in, hastily closed and locked it. Sounds of stumbling were heard—Mr. Lamb was falling over the coals. Miss Marjoribanks pressed her hands to her bewildered head, and sank into a chair.

"Well," roared Mr. Marjoribanks, in a voice that shook the rafters and Mr. Lamb's terrified soul, as he entered the kitchen; "where's the supper?"

"What supper?" murmured his daughter, who had not yet recovered her presence of mind.

"What supper?" said the astonished old gentleman. "Why, my supper. Come, where is it? Have you taken leave of your senses?"

"Oh, I'll get it in a minute, dear," was the response; "my head aches so that I hardly know what I am doing. Shall I draw you any beer?"

"Shall you draw me any beer?" repeated the irritable old man. "Why, what's the matter with the girl? Have you ever known me to miss my beer yet—eh?"

Supper, except for the unnecessary noise which Mr. Marjoribanks deemed requisite to its proper mastication, proceeded in silence. The unfortunate Amy, snugly ensconced in a cushioned chair, thought of her lover sitting disconsolately on a heap of coals, and had much ado to restrain her tears.

"Ah, that's better," said the old gentleman at length, wiping his mouth on two square yards of red handkerchief, and shifting his chair to the fire.

"Fill my pipe, give me that hassock, and hand down the whisky;" all of which directions having been silently obeyed, he proceeded with great zest to enjoy himself. "Anyone been?" said he suddenly.

"No," said his daughter untruthfully, almost jumping out of her chair.

"Well, just fill my pipe again, and give me a kiss and get to bed."

"I don't want to go yet, dear," she ventured timidly, with a sidelong glance at the cellar-door.

"You don't want to go? But I say you are to go, miss. The idea of a girl your age presuming to contradict her father. I shall have my hands full with you yet, my girl, I can see."

This innocent remark so probed the conscience of the unfortunate Amy that she gave way to tears, and goaded her rather unreasonable parent almost to the verge of fury by dropping a couple in his eye when she kissed him.

Her state of mind when she reached her bedroom was most unenviable, for she saw only too plainly that the hapless Willie would have to pass the night in his uncongenial quarters; Mr. Marjoribanks being in the laudable habit of locking the kitchen-door before retiring, and putting the key in his pocket. The outlook for Willie was not pleasant.

* * *

"You can put your hat on and come out with me," said Mr. Marjoribanks, as they sat at breakfast next morning. "We'll see about that jacket of yours."

His daughter murmured her obligations rather confusedly. She was wondering whether their small domestic would discover Mr. Lamb when she went to replenish the scuttles, and whether she would scream or not? Knowing her to be a nervous girl, she was afraid she would, and the fear made her almost frantic. She knew her father too well to venture to differ from him, or she would have stayed at home and let the prisoner out herself.

"Now," said her father, after they had got some distance on their journey, "you walk on to the shop, my dear; I've got a call to make."

He appeared to be in a high state of merriment over something or other,

"Amy," roared a voice, "have you and that girl gone mad?"

Digitized by Google

and ambled down the street with his huge face wreathed in smiles. She had barely reached the shop when he rejoined her, still in the same unusual state of good-humour, and ushered her inside with the air of a man going to buy up the whole stock-in-trade.

"What can I do for you this morning, miss?" inquired a bland shopman, approaching the couple.

"I want a jacket for my little girl," said Mr. Marjoribanks.

This was one of his daughter's greatest trials. He knew about as much of women's clothes and millinery as a tame elephant, but nothing could have persuaded him that his judgment and taste in such matters were little short of exquisite.

He was as bad in one way as a woman, for it took three shopmen about an hour to satisfy him, and then he bought such an extraordinary garment that two ladies who were looking on retired precipitately in a series of suffocating gasps. His daughter, who was brooding over the fate of the unhappy Willie, and whose mind was, therefore, possibly a little bit unhinged, cast but one glance at it, and immediately sat down in violent hysterics.

"And now you must have a hat," said the generous parent, when his daughter had recovered.

His tastes running somewhat high this morning, he purchased a magnificent broad-brimmed covering, almost hidden in feathers and roses, on which huge beetles of the most pronounced brass were presumably feeding.

"You'll astonish the neighbours," said he proudly as they left the shop. "I never saw such a hat before!"

"Nor I," said his daughter, with much feeling.

"Well, you'd better get home now," resumed the old gentleman. "I'm going to call on old Jackson; I shall soon be back."

Miss Marjoribanks needed no second bidding, and flew to the rescue of Mr. Lamb on the wings of the wind. In a very short time she stood panting at the door.

"Dinner ready?" she inquired of the small servant who opened it.

"No, miss; not yet."

"Then you had better go upstairs and lay it at once. Oh, Mary," she continued, in tones she vainly strove to calm, "where's the key of the cellar? I couldn't find it this morn-morning."

"Don't know, miss," said the girl; "I couldn't find it when the men brought the coals."

"Coals!" said her mistress. "What coals?"

"Why, the coals master sent this morning," answered the girl. "Three ton, miss, and it was all the men could do to get them in. They're right up to the cellar-door, and how we are to open it without their falling out, I don't know."

Miss Marjoribanks gave a dreadful scream, and nearly went into hysterics for the second time that morning. Recovering herself by an effort worthy of the occasion, she demanded:

"Where's Willie?"

"Who?" said the small girl in great astonishment.

"Willie—my Willie. Where is he?" said Miss Marjoribanks wildly.

"I don't know anything about your Willie," whimpered the girl, who thought her mistress was going mad. "Do you mean the youngest coal-man, miss?"

"No," said the other, her voice rising to a perfect scream. "A Mr. Lamb, who was shut in here last night. If he's in there now he's dead—oh, he's dead! Run, Mary, and get some men to come and dig him out—perhaps he is yet alive.

While the small girl was absent on her errand of mercy, the unhappy girl was on her knees vainly endeavouring to peer through the cellar keyhole.

"Willie!" she cried; "Willie, speak to me if you can—Willie!"

But no loved voice responded to her fervent appeals, and, moved to desperation, she seized a hatchet and splintered the lock. The door burst wide open, and for a few seconds it rained coal; then, as the dust cleared away, Miss Marjoribanks looked eagerly into the cellar, only to find her glance obstructed by coals piled to the very rafters.

At this moment the small servant returned with a policeman and two dustmen, whom she had secured with a shrewd eye to their shovels.

"Burglar, miss?" inquired the man in blue.

"No, a gentleman—a friend," she answered feverishly; "left in here last night. Oh, make haste and dig him out, for pity's sake!"

The dustmen at once commenced operations, and with the experience born of innumerable dustbins, worked fast and well, the small servant laboured assiduously, the constable was a host in himself, and even Miss Marjoribanks aided in flooding the lower rooms of the house with coal. Half-way through, and no signs of the missing man yet. Dustman No. 1 drew the back of his hand across his mouth, and shook his head despondingly. Dustman No. 2 drew the back of his hand across his mouth, and shook his head despondingly, and made a remark which referred to the well-known properties of malt liquor as an aid to clearing cellars and finding missing men.

The small servant, fearfully and unwholesomely interested in this tragedy in domestic life, nearly broke her small back in her efforts—and still no Willie Lamb.

The work was at its heaviest, the excitement at its height, when a terrific noise was heard on the stairs, the foot of which was blocked up by a ton and a half of best Silkstone.

"Hush!" said the constable, holding up his hand to command silence. "What was that?"

All at once ceased their labours, and the origin of the noise became apparent. It was a grievously astonished old gentleman venting his wrath, bewilderment, and indignation in the very plainest of old English, and a sudden fear fell upon all.

"Amy!" roared a hoarse voice from the stairs, "have you and that imp of a girl gone mad? What's the matter here?"

And the speaker, leaping over the uneven coals, which scrunched beneath his weight, burst into the kitchen.

"It's poor Willie, papa. He was shut in here last night, and he must be lying dead under these coals."

And the poor girl sobbed bitterly.

Mr. Marjoribanks made two or three great gulps for air, and tugged fiercely at his collar, while his red face worked convulsively. At last he got his breath and turned to his daughter.

"I let him out last night," he said, and paused from sheer incapacity to say another word.

A loud roar went up from the dustmen and the constable, in the midst of which the small servant's shrill snicker was distinctly audible.

"Why didn't you tell me, papa?" asked Amy.

"Because," said her father, shifting uneasily from one leg to the other, and glaring hideously at the grimacing dustmen "because I thought I would give you a lesson and have a joke at the same time; that's why I sent the coals in. But the joke," said the old gentlemen, tugging at his collar again, while his eyes rolled, "doesn't seem to have been quite a success."

"An' there ain't been nobody there all this time?" said the small servant.

"Go and sweep up that coal, you little villain!" said the old gentleman furiously.

"Sweep it up?" exclaimed the damsel. "My word!"

* * * * *

It has since transpired, from information received from the small servant, that the whole of the coal was ultimately restored to its proper quarters, and that Mr. Lamb has never renewed his acquaintance with them, although he has since been a constant visitor at the house. Indeed, the small servant has gone so far as to hint darkly to certain acquaintances that they need not be frightened out of their boots if they should observe a wedding-party leave the house, as she, for one, is quite prepared for it, and, what is more to the purpose, so is Mr. Marjoribanks.

William W. Jameson.

Digitized by Google

Telling How a Good Woman's Love Found a True Resting Place.

"Do you really think that's true?" asked Stella, looking up into the dark, earnest face of Colonel Egerton, as he stood beside the piano.

She had been singing a sad, sweet, little love song, and he had been listening to the music of her voice without paying any attention to the words.

"I'm afraid I don't quite know what you mean."

"Why, I mean the words of the love song I've just been singing. Do you think they are true?"

"They are just nonsense. There's no meaning in them at all," said Bobby stoutly.

Stella had not known that he was in the room, and she gave a slight start. Bobby was a dear boy, a kind of cousin near enough to have been a friend and playmate in early days, distant enough to make a flirtation quite a pleasant amusement. Stella was fond of him, but there was no denying that he was at times a bit of a nuisance. At this moment he certainly was.

Stella was in the first raptures of hero-worship, and Randolf Egerton, V.C., was an ideal hero. Handsome, distinguished, clever, he was the very man to win a girl's fancy, and Bobby seemed a most insignificant being beside him.

"What do you think, Colonel Egerton?" she repeated, swinging round on the music-stool to face the two men.

"I think it a pretty song, sweetly sung," he rejoined, smiling

"But do you think a first love is really the strongest? Do you think it would haunt a man all his life and prevent his ever being happy with another woman? Is a man's first love the one real, true passion of his life, or is a later love perhaps the stronger and deeper?"

"Better be a man's last love than his first," put in the incorrigible Bobby. Stella turned on him.

"Bobby, be kind enough not to interrupt. I am not talking to you at all."

Bobby's round, boyish face flushed, and he jumped up.

"All right, I'll be off. But the mater asked me to remind you that you are going to drive with her this afternoon."

"I had not forgotten," returned Stella with dignity, and Bobby walked off in a subdued manner.

"You've hurt young French's feelings, I'm afraid," observed Colonel Egerton, looking after the offended youth.

"Oh, it's only Bobby," said Stella carelessly. "He's a dear boy, but he's awfully dense and commonplace."

"Well, he may not be a judge of poetry, but he's a thoroughly good fellow, and you are awfully down on him," remonstrated Egerton.

"Oh, it's only Bobby," Stella repeated. "He doesn't mind. But, Colonel Egerton, what do you think about the song? Can a man's first love spoil his whole life as the song says it does?"

"Ah, I don't know that, Miss French; I hope not."

She was still sitting on the music-stool, her back to the piano. Colonel Egerton bent over her.

"I hope it isn't true," he went on. "Dear, I have learnt to love you very deeply and truly, but you are not my first love."

Stella's cheeks glowed crimson; her big blue eyes glanced up into the dark face so near her own, then fell again.

"Sweetheart, do you care for me a little bit? Shall we try and make each other happy? Say 'Yes,' darling."

Stella said nothing, but she let him draw her into his arms and cover her with kisses in a silence that seemed to give consent.

"Will you tell me about your first love?" she murmured presently. "How long ago is it?"

"My first love affair? Oh, ten years ago. I was twenty-eight, and Alice twenty-two."

"Then she'll be thirty-two now, quite old; so I needn't be jealous of her even if she did come back to try and do mischief," thought Stella, who was just nineteen, and considered thirty old age.

"She and her sister lived with an old aunt, on whose bounty they were entirely dependent. That fact, perhaps, is the key to the situation, for I am certain Alice loved me. But her aunt disapproved of our engagement. I was not very well-off in those days, you see, and Alice had another suitor, a millionaire. One day I got a note from Alice to tell me never to see her again; she had yielded to her aunt's persuasion, and accepted Leigh.

"I simply wouldn't believe it. I went off at once to see her. She was out, the servant said, but I saw her sister, May, who told me that Alice had indeed accepted Leigh. I wrote several times to Alice after that, but had no answer, so at last I gave it up. During the ten years that have passed, I have never heard her name, nor thought twice of her. She is dead to me, and I have never loved any other woman. Little one, will you try to love me, and be as true to me as she was false?"

It was a lovely little face that Stella raised to his in mute reply, and as Egerton kissed the rosy lips so sweetly, innocently offered, he felt well satisfied with his fate.

* * * * *

"Are you expecting many more guests to-day?" asked Stella, nestling down beside Mrs. French, as the two started out for their drive. The girl felt rather guilty and undeserving of her hostess' kindness, for she well knew that the petting she received was solely for Bobby's sake. She certainly had flirted with Bobby, Stella reflected, and his doting mother would no doubt be very angry when she learnt that she and Colonel Egerton were engaged.

"Well, I'm expecting two by the 4.35 train, dear, and I shall drive round by the station to meet them. I am sending to meet the 6.12, of course, for there will be quite a crowd by that train."

"Oh, of course, for the ball," cried Stella joyously. "I do love a ball."

Stella had very pretty ways with elderly people, and was a general favourite among them. Mrs. French looked very benevolently at her little cousin.

Digitized by Google

"I like to see young people enjoying themselves, my dear, and Bobby loves dancing. I hope you have kept him a great many dances?"

"Yes, I have a great many," replied Stella, somewhat gloomily, for as yet her fiancé had not asked for a single dance, and she had already given away all her waltzes. Not much more was said until the station was reached.

"Now, Stella, you will see the most beautiful young woman I have ever seen," said Mrs. French. "And what a life she must lead with that sour old aunt of hers, poor soul!"

Miss Chester certainly looked the very quintessence of vinegar, and was by no means gracious even to her hostess, while her niece and her maid were treated with the most undisguised ill-temper. The niece was really lovely, tall, dark, with exquisite colouring and perfect features. Stella could not help thinking that this stately maiden would make a more suitable bride for her soldier-hero than her insignificant little self."

"But he loves me," she whispered to herself, and felt comforted. She was not at all jealous of Egerton's former love, but she knew she could be very jealous of any woman he might admire in the future.

She did not happen to be present when Egerton was presented to Miss Chester and her niece, or she might have found food for jealousy at once. Egerton went white to the lips as he bowed and murmured something about having met before and Alice Chester lost her rich bloom, and trembled visibly.

* * * * *

"Why, I do believe I'm the first down."

Stella, fairly-like in her white robes, radiant in youth and happiness, stood looking round the vast empty room.

"No; I'm here," said a voice behind her, and she whisked round at once.

"Oh, it's only Bobby," she cried, disappointed. "But since you are here, I want to ask you something. Let me off the first waltz I am engaged to you for. It's the fifth dance."

Her radiant eyes were raised expectantly to his, and she laughed out like the sudden chiming of bells as she saw the change in his face.

"Oh, how cross you look, Bobby! I never saw you look so before. Don't be cross, Bobby. I never was so happy in all my life, and I mean to enjoy myself to the very utmost to-night. You'll let me off that dance, won't you, Bobby?" She touched his arm coaxingly with her white fan.

"No, I won't," said Bobby savagely. "Why should I? You want to dance it with Egerton, and I can't bear it, Stella." His voice shook, and his boyish face was drawn and white with pain. "You know what you are to me; what you've been to me from a tiny child; you know how I love you——"

"Hush, Bobby," Stella broke in. "Oh, I mustn't let you go on. I'm sorry, dear, so sorry. I like you so much; I—almost—love you, but—but—Bobby, I've told no one else, but I'll tell you. Colonel Egerton and I are engaged."

"Engaged, are you? Well," and Bobby gulped down something in his throat, "I hope you'll be happy, and that Egerton loves you even half as much as—I—do."

Stella had promised several dances to different members of the house-party, and did her duty bravely, though her heart longed for her lover. She saw nothing of him. He was not dancing, nor even in the ballroom, and she felt vaguely unhappy.

Bobby came up to her.

"Our dance, I think," he said resolutely.

"Oh, Bobby, dear, I don't want to dance. Can't we sit it out?" she said appealingly.

He saw that her lovely eyes were full of tears, and took her to a quiet nook in the conservatory.

"Let me get you a glass of wine, Stella," he said anxiously.

"Some water, please," and she leant back and closed her eyes wearily.

She was only half conscious when the sound of someone near roused her. She was completely hidden by some plants, and before she could make her presence known, Egerton's voice, low but distinct, came to her ears:

"I have granted you this interview, Miss Chester," he said sternly, "as you have asked it in the name of justice, but you can have nothing to explain. The play was played out ten years ago. I was certainly astonished to find you still Miss Chester, and I own that I am agitated at meeting again the woman I—once—so dearly—loved."

His voice faltered. Stella made an effort to break the spell that seemed to hold her and move away, but she was powerless.

"My sister is dead," began Miss Chester abruptly. "She died three years ago, and she made me promise if ever I met you again, that I would repeat to you her death-bed confession. And this is it: Mr. Leigh promised her a sum of money large enough to make her independent for life if she could bring about my marriage with him. We were miserable with our aunt, and she thought, poor May, that it would be better for me to marry a rich man than a poor one."

She paused, but there was no answer except the hurried breathing of the man at her side.

"Go on," he said hoarsely, after a moment.

"May could imitate almost any handwriting. She wrote to you as if from me, dismissing you. I had a letter, apparently from you, giving me up. She intercepted some letters on each side, and the thing was done. She could separate us—yes—but she could not make me marry any other man. And that, Colonel Egerton, is why I am Alice Chester to this day."

She rose, and with a slight bow, was moving away, but in an instant he had sprung up and caught her to his breast. Gone were the ten years of contempt and hatred, gone all recollection of the little girl for whom that very afternoon he had professed affection. He only knew that his old sweetheart was in his arms again, and that love and trust were his once more.

"Alice, my own, my darling," he cried passionately, "say that you are still my own, that you love me still!"

"Hush, hush!" she said, with a startled look round, "you forget there may be people near. Come, take me to my aunt, and tell her—tell her what you please."

They were gone, and Stella sat on, in a kind of stupor. Egerton had actually forgotten her very existence.

It was thus that Bobby found her a few minutes later, when he returned with a small assortment of refreshments. Setting the tray carefully on a seat near, he scrutinised the girl's face.

"Stella," he said in some alarm, "what's the matter? You look so queer and white. Shall I fetch Egerton?"

"No, I wouldn't do that," she returned with forced composure, "you might find some difficulty in recalling me to his remembrance. He has just found out how he was tricked into losing the girl he loved many years ago, and it's all made up. He's going to marry her and he's forgotten all about me."

To Bobby's consternation, Stella burst into tears.

"Stella, don't cry, darling. You're breaking my heart. What am I to do, dearest! I'll do anything you like, only don't cry." And here Bobby fairly took her in his arms, and comforted her as in the days gone by he had consoled her for a lost doll.

Stella made no resistance.

"I feel such a silly," she sobbed. "Why, I was engaged to him, and he's forgotten all about it. I don't care a bit for him now, but I don't like being made a fool of."

"Never mind, darling, nobody knows anything at all about it except me, and I'm nobody; only Bobby, you know."

Stella's sobs ceased, and she rested her bright head on his shoulder in a confiding way that emboldened him to go on.

"Look here, darling, I'm not a V.C., or anybody distinguished, and goodness knows I'm not a beauty, but I do love you with all my heart. Could you put up with me, sweetheart? Will you marry me, Stella? That is, if you're quite sure you don't love Egerton still."

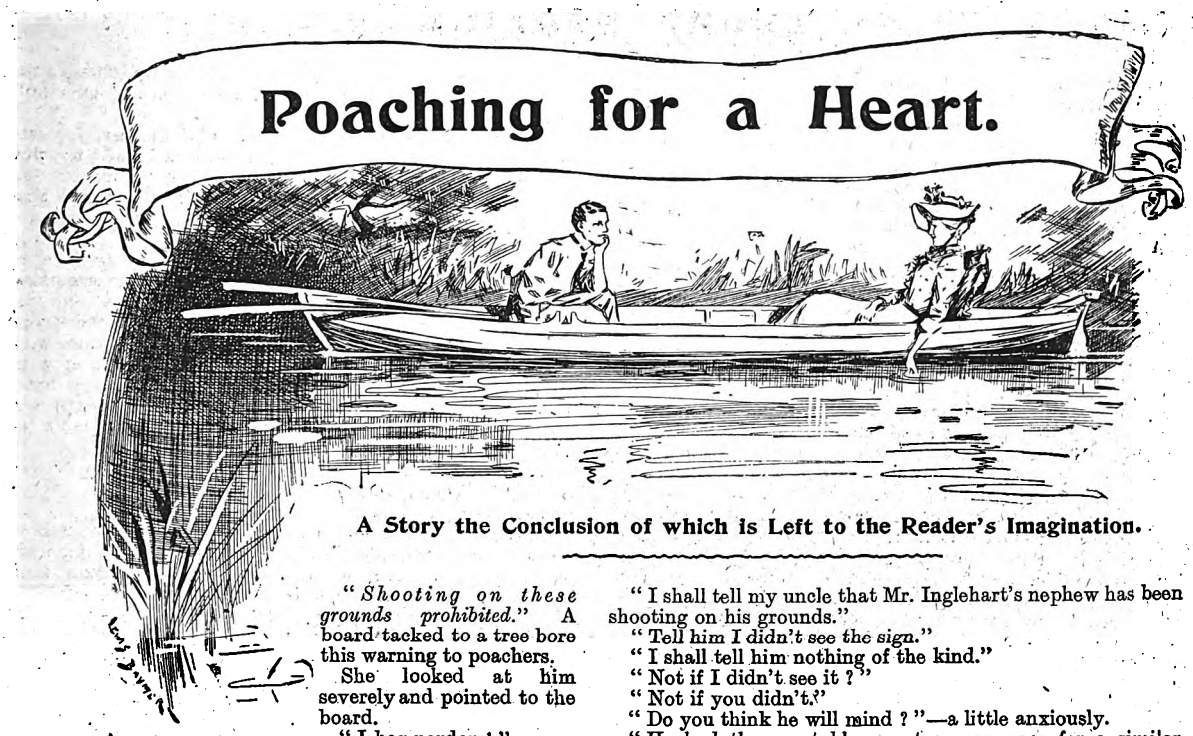
Stella raised her head quickly, and her eyes sparkled through her tears.

"I'm quite sure I don't love him any more. I'm quite sure that in all the world I love—only Bobby."

Vera Serkoff.

Digitized by Google

Poaching for a Heart.



A Story the Conclusion of which is Left to the Reader's Imagination.

"Shooting on these grounds prohibited." A board tacked to a tree bore this warning to poachers.

She looked at him severely and pointed to the board.

"I beg pardon!"

He lifted his cap and stared at her. He had shot into a covey of birds from an adjoining field, and then leapt the fence to get the game.

"You are careless with your gun," she said.

Though startled, she was angry. He dropped the butt of his gun to the ground, and continued to stare as he might have stared at an apparition—a lovely one. An apparition might have disconcerted him more, for his look was bold. She flushed indignantly.

"You are insolent!" her glance said, as plainly as speech could have done.

"I am distressed!" he exclaimed, pausing between the words, as if speech were difficult.

"Indeed!" with a look that should have withered him, but it did not.

"You were in no danger, but I am sorry to have frightened you."

"I am not frightened."

"Oh, that relieves me."

His cool impudence exasperated her, yet his open-eyed astonishment was ludicrous. His eye did not leave her face for an instant. Was she really so beautiful that this rustic gaped in wonder? The thought softened her.

"You are not concerned about the trespass?"

"I did not see the warning."

She did not doubt that he had seen it a hundred times. She looked straight at him, partly wondering how he could tell such a story, partly thinking how handsome the sunburnt fellow was.

"Who are you, sir?"

She did not note his curious smile.

"Mr. Inglehart's nephew, Tom," he replied, with significant emphasis.

She looked no wiser.

"Mr. Inglehart lives across the valley," he added.

A farmer, was her thought. No doubt this lazy fellow lived on his bounty. Though tanned, he had not the look of a field-hand. He was a habitual poacher, she did not doubt. He wore a hunting-cap and jacket, both the worse for briers and wear; and his age might have been three-and-twenty.

"I shall tell my uncle that Mr. Inglehart's nephew has been shooting on his grounds."

"Tell him I didn't see the sign."

"I shall tell him nothing of the kind."

"Not if I didn't see it?"

"Not if you didn't."

"Do you think he will mind?"—a little anxiously.

"He had the constable arrest a man once for a similar offence."

This was a fib, pure and simple—not inexcusable, though. The fellow needed the lesson; besides, it was not certain that some culprit had not been arraigned during the ten years this weather-beaten board had given warning to poachers.

"I will give you half the birds; I suppose that will make it right?"

"I don't suppose it will! I wouldn't touch one of them. See how the poor things bleed and writhe! Others went away wounded, to suffer and die more slowly. You ought to be ashamed of your cruelty!"

His swarthy face coloured; he eyed her keenly and in surprise; then, all of a sudden, his countenance fell; he glanced ruefully at the fluttering birds.

"I suppose you do not eat birds, nor wear feathers in your hat?"—a little sullenly.

Then she coloured—deeply, too; his glance rested maliciously on the rich plume in her hat.

"Why do you stand there?" she asked impatiently, and a little disconcerted.

"Pardon me; may I tell you?" with an audacious smile.

She looked at him quickly, intently; then averted her face, a little scared. A suspicion darted across her mind—a suspicion, nothing more. In a moment it vanished, and she was angry again: yet not very angry, nor long so. The absurdity of his manner upset her temper. There was no mistaking the admiring glances of the young countryman; his admiration was as honest, too, as it was bold.

Being modest and not over-vain, she accepted this view of her charms with some grains of allowance. She knew that she had fair cheeks and dimples, brown eyes, and a dainty waist, and that people stared at her. Now, this man stared, not for want of manners, but because he could not help it. On him she had made a genuine impression. She half-wondered what the foolish youth wanted to say, but she cut him short:

"Why don't you take the birds and go?"

"I am in no hurry; they won't expect me home much before dinner-time."

"I don't like to be stared at; I came here to gather flowers. Please go."

Digitized by Google

"I am good at gathering flowers myself; let me help you over the fence!"

In the meadow across the fence was a large pond of water-lilies; and, beyond, a wooded rocky slope, a-bloom with wild flowers.

She was uncertain whether to rebuke him with a show of greater severity for his audacity, or to accept his proffered services. She glanced at the high stone wall and at the tempting flowers, then doubtfully at him. She remembered that her uncle knew Mr. Inglehart—an old resident of the neighbourhood, of course—and this was Mr. Inglehart's nephew. His appearance was in his favour, and the water-lilies had tempted her before. They were beyond her reach, nor was it easy to get over the stone wall unaided. Should she cast aside conventionalities? He looked only a simple countryman! And she doted on water-lilies!

He read her mind.

"I got my sister a big lot of lilies yesterday."

"How did you get them?"—with interest.

"I waded."

Whether this were true or not, it settled the matter. She put out her little hand; he took it, showed her projecting stones on which she could put first one foot, then the other; by means of these and his assistance, she was speedily on the top of the wall; then he sprang over, and helped her down on the other side.

He found a shallow place in the pond, and threw in some boulders to stand on; she sat on the grass under a tree while he got the water-lilies—a great armful, more than she could carry; then he ran round the pond to the hill-side, and brought as many more flowers from there: ivy-blossoms, wild honeysuckle, sweetbrier, and a great variety beside—all of them pretty, some very sweet. She gave him a grateful look, and he sat down beside her to arrange them.

"You spoke of your sister"—suddenly—"where is she?"

"At my uncle's."

"You both live there?"

His face lighted as with an inspiration.

"At present—yes. Would you like to see her? Perhaps you find it dull in these parts."

"You think me a stranger?"

"I shouldn't think you lived here."

"Why?"

He shrugged his shoulders.

"Do I look different from the country-people—from your sister, for instance?"

"I don't think she is like most people."

"You may be partial."

"You ought to see her!"

"How old is your sister?"

"Nineteen. I should like you to meet her. I could bring her here to-morrow, if you would come"—eagerly.

"Oh, she might come to my uncle's—Mr. Wayne's."

"This is a nice place." His fine eyes looked beseeching. "She comes here often," he added quickly; "it is such a pretty spot, and there are so many flowers."

She laughed softly. The slanting shadows crept over the meadows; the sun dipped behind the hills; the breeze scarcely stirred the leaves and clover-blossoms; the lull and mellow fragrance of closing day fell upon wood and field. The pair sorted the flowers, and she listened to his talk, forgetting that he was a stranger.

There is a snare in the green fields and woods, the blue skies and scented air of the country; I warn my young readers to beware of it. The young lady came to her sober self with a start and a look of dismay. The sky was tinged with twilight. What a fool she had been for having had anything to say to this man! She scowled at him, as if he were to blame. She grew confused; and, in her confusion, she did not know what they had talked about, what he had said, what she had said, or why she had stayed so long.

"I will walk home with you, if you will allow me," he ventured to say.

She declined the offer rather haughtily. He helped her over the fence, then put the big bunch of flowers in her arms.

"You need not expect me to-morrow," she said, turning away.

"My sister will be disappointed. I hope I have not offended you?"

She paused and glanced up at him, as he sat on the fence. He looked hurt. She had promised to meet his sister; this she remembered, and it was about all she did remember. Why should she change her mind so soon? She ought not to have promised!

"I think you need not expect me," she said slowly, looking straight at him, and turned away.

He watched her till she was out of sight, hoping that she might look back; but she did not.

It was nearly dusk when the young lady reached the farm-house. No notice was taken of this, however, as she was often out late in the orchard and meadows near the house. By degrees her conversation with the young stranger came back to her. She slipped into the house and upstairs to her own room, there to think it all over. At first it came distinctly, she was so confused; after a while it came vividly. Now she burnt with anger, now with vexation, that she should have so forgotten herself as to talk to this stranger. But she recalled his handsome appearance, his kindly grey eyes, his broad brow, his fine, smiling mouth almost hidden by the brown moustache, his clean-cut nose and chin, and finally his easy, unembarrassed manner. She would find out all about him.

And she said to her uncle:

"I saw a man shooting in your fields this afternoon."

"Who was the man, dear?"

"How should I know, uncle?"—dropping her eyes.

"Was he a young man?"

"Yes, uncle."

"Lord Inglehart, I expect. He's the best shot in the county."

She was silent a moment, then said:

"Who is Lord Inglehart, uncle?"

"The most popular man hereabouts, my dear, and the Lord of the Manor of Foxberry. He is on a visit to his uncle."

"John, I saw his sister to-day. You wouldn't know her," remarked Mrs. Wayne.

"Likely not; it's been nearly three years since she was here."

"Three in October. What a slim and weakly thing she was! I never saw any living thing alter so. She's the finest looking girl I ever saw. I dare say you won't believe it's she when you see her; I didn't, till she asked about you and everything about the place. She makes me think of Helen, only she's dark and half a head taller."

Helen smiled demurely.

"And a great deal more beautiful, auntie?"

"Now, that couldn't be, my child," returned the old lady, with a fond glance at her niece.

"Is she coming over?" questioned the uncle.

"Yes. I told her about Helen; and she said she would be glad to see her; she'll be great company for her."

Our heroine would doubtless have learnt much more about the Inglehart family; but at this moment a man ran in and said that a favourite horse had been hurt. The old couple hurried away, and Helen was left alone with her reflections.

The reader perhaps will be greatly surprised when I say that Helen decided, next day, to keep her appointment.

I do not know myself why she went. She may have kept the appointment on account of Tom's sister, feeling that she ought not to disappoint her. She may have planned a pleasant surprise for the old people, intending to bring her home with her, letting Tom go where he wished. If this was the case, however, she was disappointed. Tom came; his sister did not.

She was angry, very angry.

"Where is your sister?" she demanded.

"She is at home with a sprained ankle,"

The fence was between them; he rested his elbows and chin on the top stone.

Digitized by Google

"You are making fun of me!" she exclaimed vehemently.

He stared at her like a simpleton, as she turned abruptly.

"One moment, I beg! My sister met with a serious accident. Besides the sprained ankle, she is bruised and scarcely able to be up. She was very sorry she couldn't come."

She paused, flashing upon him a look of severity and distrust.

He had pushed his cap back from his brow. His face was perfectly frank and honest, and strikingly handsome; she had not had a good view of his features before. The easy pose of his shapely head and the composure of his features were striking.

"My sister sent you a letter."

He drew a letter from his pocket, and held it towards her. She hesitated, and asked:

"Why didn't you give it to me at once?"

"I ought to have done so. Sister says I am always doing the wrong thing. Won't you please take it now?"

She still hung back, though relenting a little.

"Lottie could hardly write, her arm was so painful," he added.

She took the letter and broke the seal, drawing out a dainty perfumed sheet, written all over, with four postscripts. Helen smiled while reading it; then she glanced at him with a smile, but frowned immediately.

"Tell your sister I shall be very glad to see her, and hope she may soon be able to come."

She was going.

"One word, please!"

"I have stayed too long already. I did wrong to meet you here, to speak to you, or have anything to do with a stranger. Good day, sir."

"May I come with my sister?"

She paused to say:

"I—I do not know you."

"I shall come with my sister!" he said.

"I think it better you should not."

She was gone.

Yesterday she would have asked any number of questions about Tom Inglehart, or any member of the family; asked a little slyly, perhaps, because she had been imprudent, yet she would have asked them. But for the accident to the horse, and a lack of subsequent opportunity, she would have gone to bed on the previous night, knowing all about all the Ingleharts.

To-day her cheeks burnt, her heart palpitated; she started when she saw her aunt in the carriage drive; paled when the kindly old uncle crossed the lawn. She ran up to her room, locked herself in, lay down on the bed, and cried.

Several days went by, but no word came from the Ingleharts. Helen never mentioned the Inglehart name. Her moods were fitful; she started when she heard the tramp of horses or sudden footsteps. She wondered how his sister looked; whether the sister had got well; why she did not come; whether she would come at all, or had gone away. Sometimes Helen hoped she had gone, or would go without coming; again she felt an unaccountable desire to see her, yet dreaded her coming.

One day his sister came. How like him she was! The same smiling mouth, turned up at the corners; his broad, low brow, his deep, tender eyes; tall, dark, beautiful!

A bronzed, broad-shouldered man, clad in a riding suit, stood beside her, bowing and smiling. He was a young man, self-possessed and handsome.

Mrs. Wayne introduced his sister to Helen as Lady Inglehart, who said:

"Miss Blake, my brother Tom."

Did her eyes deceive her? Her head went round. What were they saying?

The next day he called again; she had gone to the village. He went there, too, but missed her. During the next three days he tramped the woods and fields, entered the Wayne inclosures, invaded the orchard, shadowed the house and premises, hoping to get a glimpse of her.

To detail the state of his mind, his efforts to see Helen during the next ten days would unduly lengthen this story. He persevered, however, and one day he stood before her so suddenly, that he might have dropped from the sky.

"You have been unkind!" he stammered.

"You deceived me!" she said.

She was all ice and dignity.

"Can't you forgive me?"

"I ought not even to speak to you. I thought you were a plain countryman. I took you for another person, and you did not undeceive me. Now go, if you please!"

"I told you I was Mr. Inglehart's nephew," he said. "But I did not tell any falsehood. Had I told you who I was, you would have gone away. I loved you then—I love you now! Ah, if you knew how well, you would not have the heart to frown on me. I ask but little of you—a very little now: your smile and your forgiveness!"

She ought to have been startled and angry at this bold and hasty avowal. She was neither; but, if she softened within, there was no betrayal in her manner.

"I do not think I shall ever like you," she said slowly. "Let us end this interview!" She was going, but he caught her hands.

"Put me on probation!" the rude fellow cried.

The reader sees how this story must end. Why should I go on?

Mabel Varney.

Your Editor Chats.

Men or Women?

"Do you believe," writes a Newcastle correspondent, who signs himself "L. M.," "that men write more readable short stories than women do?"

No, I don't, "L.M." That is to say, I think that a lady is quite as capable of writing a good, interesting short story as a man is. In fact, women excel in tales of a pathetic type. On the other hand, men seem to have the power of writing a humorous story in a better vein. Regular readers of this paper will have noticed that there are usually quite as many tales in a number from the pens of ladies as there are from those of the sterner sex. I can assure "L. M." that there are no fewer women aspiring to literary fame than there are men.

Next Week's Cover.

IT may interest my readers to know that next week's cover will not illustrate an incident from a story, but it will be a strikingly pretty pictorial one. Look out for it in the newsagents' windows and on the bookstalls.

"Kindly Spare a Trifle."

How often have you seen or heard spoken the above words? Many and many a score of times, I have no doubt. But never have you heard the words in connection with a more deserving institution than Pearson's "Fresh Air Fund," which is doing its level best to cheer the hearts of the poor children of the slums by giving them a day in the country.

The costs of the railway journey and the required food for one whole day necessitate an expenditure of ninepence on each child; that is what I want you to bear in mind. If you contribute ninepence you know you are giving one grateful child a much-needed day in the green fields and open air. All the expenses of management are borne by the promoters.

Subscriptions should be sent to the Honorary Secretary, "Fresh Air Fund," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., who will send collecting forms to any who would care for them.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

The Spitfire.

The Tale of a Terrible Temptation.

"I'm afraid I've been a terrible trouble to you of late, dear."

There was a little pathetic note in Cora's musical voice as she uttered the words.

"Don't talk nonsense!" replied her sister, putting down the coffee-pot with no gentle hand. "I hate to listen to such rubbish! You've been ill, and we've had to make the best of it, that's all, and there's an end of the matter!"

Cora sighed. There was little sympathy in the reply. And yet the invalid instinctively felt that her sister's brusqueness was merely surface deep.

"All right, dear," she said gently. "I won't offend again. But you've been very good to me, Hilda. I only wish we could have contrived to keep out of debt."

"Debt!" exclaimed her sister sharply, yet with an alert glance at Cora's pale face. "Who said we were in debt?"

Cora smiled.

"I did," she replied. "I know only too well that my illness has plunged you into difficulties, and——"

But Hilda stopped her with a gesture.

"Then let me tell you," she said decisively, "that we are in nobody's debt. So don't worry your head any more over things that do not exist. I've seen you fretting for days about something. I suppose this is the explanation?"

She stirred her coffee vigorously and looked questioningly across at her sister. Cora nodded guiltily.

"I couldn't help it, dear," she admitted. "But you can't have paid everything out of your salary. The doctor's bill itself must have been a heavy one. And—and it is not over yet."

Her voice ended in a little tremulous shake. Hilda's white teeth met the red line of her curved lip. She was not the sort of girl to display feeling.

"I've settled everything," she affirmed doggedly. I—I've been doing a little extra work at the office, and made it up that way. But that's my business, not yours. All you have to do is to get well and set to work yourself. Your book is nearly finished. Not that that will do any good, for publishers are slippery people and difficult to hook. So don't count on that. And, anyhow, the book can wait. As I said just now, what you have to do is to get well."

She rose and pushed her chair away.

"I'm off now," she said, as she pinned on her hat. "I hope the day won't drag with you. Good-bye. And don't be so silly as to continue a speculation that has positively no foundation."

She stooped to kiss her sister, and the latter put her thin arms impulsively about her neck.

"Good-bye, sis," she said caressingly. "It's a great weight off my mind to hear you say we are in no debt. I'm afraid I was fretting about it. And I can't make out how you've contrived to manage. Oh, dear, what should I do without you?"

The tears were in her eyes as she kissed Hilda's cheek. But the latter disengaged the clinging arms, and, once more bidding her good-bye, went downstairs and out into the street.

Once outside she walked quickly, as though the fever of her thoughts communicated its influence to her feet. The journey to the office was not a short one, but even a twopenny 'bus was a luxury nowadays in which she dared not indulge. Her salary, as such salaries go, was not a small one. But her sister's illness had drained her resources and left her, despite her dogmatic assertions to the contrary, irretrievably and hopelessly in debt.

The more she considered their position, the more heart-breaking it became to the struggling girl. And yet, cost what it would, the difficulty must be overcome before her sister could become aware of its existence.

There was a frown on her dark face as she hurried along the busy thoroughfares. Yet she held her head erect and gazed straight before her, as though defying the world to crush her, as it seemed likely to do, by this most sordid of all earthly burdens—debt. For she was proud to a degree. Patience, resignation, fortitude, were not virtues likely to weigh with Hilda Gray. Fate and Fortune might harass her at every turn, but, right to the very end, she would defy them all, and then—grow desperate.

And she was even now reaching the limit of defiance and turning the corner into that other and dreaded path that leads no one knows whither. She had been brusque with her sister—almost domineering—yet she loved her with an infinite tenderness—a tenderness so deep and real that she dared not allow it utterance. It was kinder to appear cross rather than betray the truth—the bitter, heart-breaking truth—that she was in debt. Her very love for her sister demanded that she should keep that from her, whatever happened.

And yet—how was she to conceal it? Those dreadful bills would soon come pouring in, and then—— She dared not think of it. Cora's illness had been a serious one, and she was even now liable to a dangerous relapse. The doctor had said as much when he had ordered her to be kept quite and free from the smallest worry or anxiety. The frown deepened on Hilda's dark face as she thought of it. She must find some way to pay off those horrible debts. But how could she get the money?

Her brow had not cleared when she entered the office. But the small, delicately-shaped head was even higher than usual, and, as the door of the private office closed behind her, and she took her place at the typewriter, the general opinion of the clerks in the outer office was that "Spitfire seemed more than commonly unapproachable to-day." She had been secretly dubbed "Spitfire" from the first day of her coming. One or two had attempted to scrape acquaintance with her, but her replies were so short and her manner so coldly aggressive that no one attempted it twice. She was there, she said, for business, not for gossip, and the clerks took the hint.

Even in the inner office her manner was far from attractive. Her employers were both young men, who treated her with respect and consideration. But she appeared not to notice this, much less allow herself to be touched by it. She took her instructions both from Lionel and Victor Leighton, though, as Lionel, the elder brother, undertook the bulk of the firm's correspondence, she came into more frequent contact with him than with Victor. Lionel Leighton was a man of two or three and thirty, with clear grey eyes, a firm, square chin, and a look of quiet dignity and reserve. He was abnormally fond of the study of character, and in Hilda Gray he had great opportunities for indulging this penchant. And the result? Well, we shall see.

Digitized by Google

Slowly the day wore on. Listening to the clear, decisive voice of Lionel Leighton as he dictated the outgoing correspondence, typing with a rapidity that astonished even herself, yet always thinking, thinking of those dreaded debts and the still greater dread of their coming to the knowledge of her sister, whom she, with all her brusqueness, loved so dearly.

Swiftly she took the note, but she had been detected by Lionel Leighton.

Lionel watched her with new interest. Something in the troubled yet defiant face of the girl touched him strangely. Some secret, he could see, was eating out her heart — a secret which, despite the proud poise of her small head, was none the less potent in its hidden bitterness. He tried in vain to divine its cause. That she and her sister were orphans, he knew well enough, but of that sister's recent illness he had not been told.

So, unable to fathom the trouble which he knew to be there, he could only watch and wait until a favourable opportunity gave him the chance of asking her if he could be of service to her. But before that opportunity came, an incident occurred that sent a chill to his very soul, and, with it, the knowledge that, almost unknown to himself, he had loved this proud, defiant girl who told no one her difficulties and asked the sympathy of none.

It was early in the afternoon. Victor, the younger brother, was still at lunch, and the two were alone. Lionel was busy over a calculation in one of [the firm's private ledgers. Presently he closed the book, and, turning to some papers that lay before him, spoke mechanically to the girl at her machine.

"Miss Gray," he said, "would you mind replacing this ledger in the safe? It is open, I think."

Hilda was accustomed to carry the smaller books to and from the safe when not otherwise employed, and she rose to comply with the request. Lionel immediately became immersed in his work. Taking up the ledger, Hilda went up to the safe and opened the heavy door. As she replaced the book in its accustomed position her eye fell on a small fixed cash-box in one corner of the safe.

She knew quite well what was in there. It was the custom of the firm to keep a little ready money in case of emergency, and the amount never varied. Nearly two years' experience had taught her the habits of the firm by whom she was employed. At the bottom of the cash-box lay the sum of thirty pounds in gold, and above this one twenty pound, three ten pound, and four five pound Bank of England notes. There had been an emergency once, when Victor suddenly wanted a sum of fifty pounds after closing hours at the bank, and ever since that occasion he had adopted the present means of avoiding a recurrence of the inconvenience arising therefrom. It all rose up in the girl's mind now as she quietly slipped the ledger back in its place. All in a moment the temptation surged within her to take the means at her command.

Never before had she felt how fierce and almost irresistible is the voice of the tempter, when to yield means freedom from further anxiety. Alas, she did not pause to consider what that other anxiety would be—the anxiety that springs from wrong-doing.

Lionel was absorbed in his papers. Once again the temptation surged within her.

For a moment or two she struggled to free herself, and then, alas! it overwhelmed her. The lid was not locked.

Lifting it quietly, and with one swift glance behind her, she drew forth one of the white, crisp notes and hid it in her chatelaine. Then, with heaving bosom and kindling cheeks, she went back to her seat.

But the soft rustle of the note had reached the ear of Lionel Leighton. Raising his head, he had just been in time to witness the lowering of the lid of the cash-box, and a horrible dread of what had occurred entered his heart. But he controlled himself with an effort and again brought his eyes back to the papers before him. But he could not work now. She —a thief! The thought cut him to the heart. What must he do? He could not accuse her. And yet—why not? And then he knew the truth. He loved her. The thought that she was a thief tortured him and would not let him rest. He picked up a letter and turned to her.

"I want a letter written," he said in a strange, husky voice, and Hilda prepared to type the required communication.

Digitized by Google

And as she worked he watched her, marvelling at the change, and reading the signs of shame and guilt in the heightened colour of her cheek and the nervous twitching of her fingers. But that was not all. For the first time since he had known her the proud, defiant little head had lost its erectness. When the letter was finished he sent her into the general office to search for some past correspondence.

As soon as the door had closed behind her, he slipped to the safe and examined the contents of the cash-box. The twenty pound note was not there. With a heavy heart he returned to his seat and tried to think. Oh, why had she not told him she needed money? What was he to do? If Victor went to the safe, he would discover the loss—and then! The thought made him shiver.

Hilda came back with the letters in her hand, but he scarcely noticed her. And then an idea came to him—an idea that swiftly merged into a resolve.

If he loved her, he must save her. Taking out his private cheque-book, he drew a cheque for twenty pounds, payable to bearer. Then he locked the safe, put on his hat, and drove round to the bank. When he returned, Hilda was still alone in the office. There were traces of tears in her dark eyes, and he sent her again into the general office on some pretext. Then swiftly he unlocked the safe, opened the cash box, and placed a new twenty pound note within. He had barely reached his seat when his brother returned, and the business of the day was resumed.

All that afternoon Hilda sat at her table, suffering the torments of remorse. Had Lionel left the safe open while he went to the bank she would have replaced the note. But, once taken, she could not draw back, and the guilt and shame of what she had done tortured her almost beyond endurance. To confess would mean open disgrace, perhaps—perhaps a prison cell! And then—her sister! She dared not even think of it. The shock would kill Cora. Poor Cora! And so the day wore on till once more the clerks filed out and the day's work drew to a close. Victor was the first to leave. Ten minutes later Lionel put on his hat and prepared to depart. As he passed the girl he paused and looked gravely down into her face.

"Miss Gray," he said, "you have not been yourself to-day. Is anything the matter? Believe me, I would do anything—anything in my power to help you. Can't you trust me?"

His voice was deep, resonant and rich, with a note of earnest sympathy underlying it. For one moment the girl wavered. A wild desire to confess her guilt before it was too late flashed through the tormented brain. But the awful possibilities of exposure recurred to her, and she answered doggedly, though her dark face twitched with nervous pain:

"Thank you. I need no help."

Lionel sighed and went quietly out of the office. Hilda dropped her head upon her hands and great tearless sobs rose in her throat. But she controlled herself with a great effort The thing was done now, and must be got through with. Hurrying out, she cashed the note and made a tour of her creditors, paying their bills one by one. It was late when she reached the little flat in which she and Cora lived, and of the twenty-pound note but three pounds remained. Cora looked up as she entered.

"You're late, dear," she said. "More overtime?"

Hilda nodded and began bustling about, tidying the little room. She spoke little, and Cora watched her attentively. And then, for the first time, she noticed that Hilda's cheeks were paler than of old and that the slim figure was thin, Constant attention on her sick sister, together with the ever-accumulating anxiety as to their needs, had told on Hilda's vigorous constitution. And now that other trouble was hitherto added to the list, and the shame of it was crushing her very soul. But she bore up. Week after week went by. Cora grew strong again and finished her book—the novel in which all her hopes had been centred. And she had sent it to a firm of publishers. Day by day she waited eagerly for their reply, hoping and fearing alternately. And day by day the anxious, tortured look on her sister's dark face deepened, though Cora saw it not. The girl was bewildered. Twice Victor had looked through the cash-box in the great safe, yet he had made no comment. Was it possible he could have overlooked the missing note? She could not account for it. Mechanically she performed her daily duties, strung up to the highest pitch of nervous apprehension. And when each night she returned to her home it was to pass a sleepless night tormented with the fear of what the morrow might bring.

And then two things happened. Cora's book was accepted. The publishers had made her a handsome offer for its purchase and praised the work she had done. Money was now theirs in plenty, and Cora's heart beat high with exultation.

But a new shadow was soon to fall. Poor overwrought Hilda found herself unable to rise from her bed one morning. There was a deep red flush on her cheeks and a strange light in her dark eyes. The doctor was sent for and pronounced her to be suffering from an attack of brain fever.

Cora dispatched a note to Leighton Brothers, acquainting them with the circumstance, and, in reply, came a kindly note from Lionel, expressing his sympathy and intimating that her place would remain open until her recovery. As it chanced to be the first of the month, he inclosed Hilda's salary, and begged her to accept a few flowers which he would send later on. Hilda flushed as she read the note, and when the flowers arrived, turned away from them with a gesture of mute distress.

And then that terrible delirium that so often accompanies brain fever set in, and the sick girl began to talk of things that made her sister reel as though a sudden blow had been dealt her. But she remained quite still. With a patience touching to witness, she nursed the invalid girl back to health. And all through those five long weeks not a day went by that did not bring some kindly offering from Lionel Leighton.

Then Hilda began to mend and was able to leave her bed and sit in a chair by the window of their little sitting-room.

One day a letter arrived at the office of Leighton Brothers, marked "Private." Opening it, Lionel read aloud the following request:—

"Gentlemen,—Can you make it convenient to call upon us some time to-day? My sister and I have something to communicate to you, the nature of which is as grave as it is important. Faithfully yours, "Cora Gray."

A puzzled look came into Victor's face as he listened, but upon that of Lionel rested an expression of distress. What that letter portended he knew but too well. He must do something to avoid it. Yet what could he do? Cora, too, was in the secret. The next to know would be his brother. His brows contracted at the thought. Was there no way out? All day long he pondered, and towards the close of the afternoon the two brothers made their way to the flat where Hilda and her sister resided. Cora's face was very pale as she preceded them into the room where Hilda was sitting. At the first glance Victor seemed fascinated by Cora's gentle and refined face. From time to time, and in spite of the, to him, strangeness and incomprehensibility of the conversation, his eyes wandered back to her face. Lionel watched him and marvelled. As soon as all were seated and the brothers had made their usual solicitous inquiries as to the invalid's progress Hilda, whose dark face had grown suddenly white, began to speak.

"I have something to tell you," she said. "A few months ago my sister was ill. We ran heavily into debt. I did my best, but there was no help for it. My sister began to fret about it, and I knew the anxiety would impede her recovery. One day I stood at the safe in the private office. Mr. Lionel was in the office, and he was very busy. I knew where you kept the notes, and—and I took one. It was for twenty pounds, and with it I paid all our debts. But the thought of it has tormented me day and night. In my delirium I revealed the truth and my sister heard it. It is now our duty to repay the money, after which I am ready to suffer whatever punishment you deem just."

Digitized by Google

Cora took a little packet from the mantelpiece and counted out twenty sovereigns upon the table. Victor looked from one to the other in blank astonishment.

"My dear Miss Gray," he said, in utter bewilderment, "I cannot for the life of me comprehend what you are saying. Why, it is scarcely three weeks since I had occasion to use the hundred pounds we keep in the safe, and I assure you the precise sum was there. I don't understand. You say my brother was in the office when you took the money?" And he turned to Lionel in mute amazement.

But Lionel was looking straight into Hilda's dark eyes. His face was calm, yet with an expression of wondrous sympathy in the clear grey eyes.

"Miss Gray," he said gently, "did it never occur to you that this delusion may have been the first symptom of the malady from which, for upwards of five weeks, you have suffered? I know something of these things, and, believe me, this is the correct explanation of the otherwise astonishing statement you have just made. The firm has lost no money. My brother would quickly have discovered it if we had. It is all a delusion, which, in order to get well again, you must endeavour to forget as speedily as possible."

It was now Hilda's turn to look bewildered.

"But our debts were all paid!" she persisted. "I have the receipted bills to prove it."

Lionel smiled. There was something very convincing and masterful in his treatment of the matter.

"That is not remarkable," he said. "Most honest people pay their debts. Believe me, you have been the victim of some hideous hallucination. If there were the least grain of truth in your statement we should have discovered it long ago. Now let the matter rest. It is absurd to talk of it any more." And he pushed the money back to Cora Gray.

For a moment or two there was silence in the little room. But it was clear that both Victor Leighton and Cora Gray had accepted Lionel's view of the matter without question. Hilda, however, was slow to believe it. The remembrance was too real, the shame too keen. Yet if her story were true, how came it that no discovery followed the theft of the note? The more she debated the question, the more hopelessly involved did she become, and finally she gave it up in very despair.

Presently Cora and Victor left the room together. Victor was anxious to ask the girl what she thought of her sister's recovery. This new development had shattered their recent hopes. And Lionel was left alone with Hilda. Going up to her, he stood quietly by her chair.

"Hilda," he said, "I wonder if you could care for me? You are so difficult to approach." And he smiled down at her with a twinkle in his deep grey eyes. "Even the clerks call you 'Spitfire.' But I have studied you from the first day of your coming into our office. And I have learnt to love you very dearly."

There was a sudden suspicious flash in Hilda's dark eyes as she lifted them to his face.

"Is that the reason you covered up my sin?" she asked fiercely.

Upon his answer depended hers, and Lionel knew it.

"I covered up no sin," he said decisively. "You must forget the delusion as soon as ever you can."

"It is not a delusion!" The words came fiercely.

"It is a delusion."

His tone was calm, and he looked her squarely in the face. With a little sigh, Hilda let her eyes fall before his, and he lifted one thin hand to his lips.

"Hilda," he pleaded, "don't say no to me, dear. Say you will be my wife. Trust me."

The fierceness was gone now. Even the old defiance seemed to have deserted her. The voice of her own heart was crying aloud:

"I love him—yes, I love him!"

She did not resist when he lifted her in his arms and kissed her.

"Now make haste and get well," he said tenderly. "You will come to me soon, won't you?"

And she promised him.

And six months later Lionel heard the news, for which he was quite prepared, that his brother Victor had proposed to, and been accepted by, Hilda's blue-eyed sister Cora. The day that witnessed their double wedding was bright and sunny, and to this day Lionel persists in affirming that people with brain fever sometimes begin by deluding themselves into the belief that they have stolen something which does not belong to them.

Walter J. Mowbray.

A Little Interloper.

Telling How She Wasn't in the Way at All.

Betty was making cakes.

Anything more absolutely bewitching than Betty engaged in domestic labours cannot be imagined. A dainty white apron covered her blue serge frock, the sleeves of her bodice were pushed up to her shoulders, revealing snowy, rounded arms, her cheeks were flushed to a lovely rose in her earnestness, and her pretty eyes shone with the joy of success as she turned and tossed the dainty bits of pastry.

"I do love cooking," she cried gleefully. "It's delicious. I feel just like Ruth Pinch making the beef-steak pudding in 'Martin Chuzzlewit,' you know, Diana. Only there is no John Westlock to come in and see me."

"It's to be hoped not," somewhat gloomily responded her cousin, who was watching operations with disfavour, while, at the same time, she deftly trussed a fowl. "Considering you've sent out our one and only domestic for more eggs—and what you want with them is beyond me—it is to be hoped that no John Westlock or John Anybody will call till she gets back."

"Why not?" retorted Betty, dropping the last cake into its place, and beginning to strip the dough from her fingers. "I should open the door, disguised as Martha. Why, there's a knock at this very moment. I'll go, Di."

"It's most likely someone for father, and he's out. I'll go and see. You ridiculous girl," for Betty had snatched up Martha's cap, and was pinning it firmly on her brown curls; "do you really think that you look like a general servant in that cap and apron? You look like a maid on the stage or in private theatricals. Don't go."

But Betty had dashed out of the kitchen, her high heels going pitter-patter down the passage, and in another moment she had opened the door.

"Is your master at home?" asked a man's voice, and, to Diana's indignant horror, she heard her cousin make demure response in the affirmative, imitating the absent Martha's voice.

Digitized by Google

"Yes, sir. Please come this way."

There was a sound of feet in the hall, of opening and shutting a door, and then Betty danced in, bubbling over with pretty, girlish mirth.

"You little wretch," cried Diana, "what do you mean? That was Dr. Hartley's voice I heard. He wants to see father, not me."

"I know it," giggled Betty. "He asked for my master, so you see I do look just like a proper housemaid."

"He's so short-sighted as to be almost blind. But why did you bring the poor old man in? I shall have to go and tell him that father is out."

"Because there was a young man with him," promptly rejoined Betty; "a nice young man; a—listen, Diana," impressively—"a most charming young man. Now, just trot into the drawing-room and say the maid was mistaken, for uncle is out. Then I shall come in, and you shall introduce that dear young man to me. I saw him in church on Sunday. He looked hard at you, I noticed, and then even harder and more admiringly at me," concluded Betty modestly.

Diana's clear pallor suddenly changed to carnation colour, and she turned angrily aside.

"I suppose I must make the best of it," she said unwillingly, "and go and explain. You had better put those cakes in the oven at once or they'll be as heavy as lead."

"Then the boys may eat them," said Betty heartlessly. "Diana, I shall change my dress, and they won't recognise me, will they?"

"Dr. Hartley may not, as he's nearly blind and all but stone deaf, but Geoffrey Musgrave's eyesight and hearing being perfect, I don't see how he can possibly help recognising you. I advise you not to come in."

And Diana walked away with her head in the air.

When Mrs. Saville wrote to her brother-in-law, begging him to take charge of her only child for the winter while she went to India, the kindly rector was perfectly willing to comply.

Diana was not altogether delighted. She had reigned in the old rectory ever since her mother's death, and did not at all relish the idea of another girl coming to possibly share her dominion over father, brothers, curates, and parish. Besides, Mrs. Saville had not taken the smallest notice of them for many years, and Diana resented her aunt's making a convenience of them.

Nor were her young brothers better pleased. What, they demanded, were they to do with a stuck-up, fine lady? However, Mr. Tracy had made up his mind, and, accordingly, Betty came, saw, and conquered. From the Rector himself to his youngest boy, from the curates to the organist, everyone with whom Betty came in contact, fell in love with her, and even Diana, who had looked upon her as an interloper, could not resist her charm.

She was very pretty; a slim little thing with a sweet, innocent, baby face, big, wondering brown eyes, a pink-and-white complexion, and a mass of nut-brown curls.

Diana was taller than her cousin, and had more regular beauty of feature, but her face lacked colour and animation. Her eyes were lovely, a clear, dark grey, and she had quantities of soft dark hair, without curl or wave in it.

She looked very dignified as she greeted her unlooked-for guests.

"I am sorry my cousin misled you," she went on uncompromisingly. "My father is out, and will not be home until late."

"That was your cousin, Miss Saville, who opened the door, wasn't it?" asked Geoffrey Musgrave eagerly.

"Yes," answered Diana, with a queer little pain at her heart. "The maid is out, so Betty went to the door, and put on Martha's cap for fun. You wanted my father?"

"We did; on some business," replied Dr. Hartley ponderously, "and, as he is not here, we will no longer detain you."

Geoffrey's looks plainly indicated a desire to remain, but for once Diana felt inhospitable, and even betrayed an inclination to hustle her visitors out. While Dr. Hartley, however, was still apologising and explaining, the door opened, and Betty appeared; Betty, radiant in a white silk blouse, with a knot of blue ribbon in front and another among her brown curls; Betty with laughter in her sunny eyes and on her rosy mouth.

Diana introduced the visitors with unwonted austerity of manner, adding hastily:

"As father is not at home, they are just going."

But Geoffrey rebelled.

"Dr. Hartley is just going," he corrected mildly. "He has business to attend to, but as I have none, I will remain and have tea and a chat with you. Why, I've seen nothing of you since I came back from Paris, except that peep in church. Miss Saville, intercede for me. Your hard-hearted cousin wants to turn me out."

"You shall stay," Betty assured him, with gentle friendliness, while Diana conducted the old doctor to the door. "Sit down and make yourself at home, and I will protect you. You shall have tea presently, and the most delicious cakes you ever tasted. I made them myself, and they are quite delightful."

"I don't know about that," observed Diana, returning from the hall, and joining the other two, who already, to her jaundiced eye, appeared to be deep in a flirtation. "Unless you put those cakes in the oven before you came in, I don't expect they will be eatable."

"But I did put them in the oven," triumphed Betty, "and Martha had come in and promised to attend to them, so they'll be all right. Let's have tea soon, Di, there's a darling, for I'm perfectly ravenous."

If Betty had calculated on Diana retiring to superintend the tea-making and leaving her free to enjoy her flirtation with Geoffrey, her calculations were correct. After a little more conversation, Diana went away to order tea, and if more than one hot tear splashed down on the tea-tray she was daintily arranging, there was no one to notice it.

She had felt rather sore over Betty's prompt adoption into the family. It had been hard to see her father lavishing the tenderness which had always been so specially hers upon this little interloper, and she had resented the hearty affection with which her young brothers soon came to regard their cousin. But the secession of Geoffrey Musgrave was the bitterest drop in her cup of woes. Geoffrey had been her own special friend since the day the fourteen-year-old schoolboy had found the little maiden, barely eight years old, asleep on her mother's grave, and had carried her to Musgrave Hall, to be petted and comforted by his parents.

Diana went back to the drawing-room, followed by Martha with the tea. The cakes turned out a success, done to a turn, and light as a feather.

"The most delicious cakes I ever tasted," solemnly pronounced Geoffrey, stretching out his hand for another. "Miss Saville, you are a genius."

"You are a greedy, grasping person," cried Betty gaily, snatching away the plate. "Why, you have had seven already. Diana, do have another before they are all gone."

Diana was doing her best to be bright and cheerful, but she was not very successful, and the two laughed and chattered together as if they had been old friends. Her heart swelled within her as she watched Geoffrey's admiring glances at her cousin, and heard his ringing laugh at Betty's nonsense. She had never been able to amuse him like that, she thought bitterly, and the dull pain at her heart grew more intense.

* * * * *

"You are going to help us with the church decorations, I hope, Betty?"

Before Betty could answer her uncle, a chorus of intreaties burst out.

"Oh, do, Betty; it will be such fun," cried her boy cousins simultaneously.

"Miss Saville has such taste that her help will be most valuable," added one of the curates, who had dropped in, ostensibly to consult his rector on some parish business, really to look languishingly at Betty.

Digitized by Google

"If Miss Saville would but take directions of the whole, her taste would insure the decorations this year being an undoubted success," chimed in the other curate, who had come unprovided with any reason for his visit except the obvious one—to worship Betty.

"And the flowers sent by Mrs. Musgrave,' of Musgrave Hall, are so exquisitely beautiful that only Miss Saville's fingers are worthy to arrange them," observed the first curate, with a fatuous smile, and his head cocked sentimentally on one side.

Diana felt a wild inclination to box the ears of both curates, but, restraining herself nobly, she merely suggested that they had better begin early next day, so as to complete the decorations, if possible, by daylight. If Betty chose to help, they would finish all the sooner.

Accordingly, the cousins set out for church almost directly after breakfast on the following morning.

Diana and Betty were the only young girls present. Two old maids and a middle-aged widow were the only other ladies who had put in an appearance, and they worked steadily on, while Betty flitted about like a will-o'-the-wisp, carrying in her train all the men helpers, including Geoffrey Musgrave.

Diana felt so thoroughly out in the cold that she retired into a dark corner and fashioned yards of evergreen rope-work in resentful dignity.

It was growing dark when most of the workers began to think of lunch, and very soon nobody was left except Betty, Geoffrey, and Diana. The two former were busily at work on the same wreath, and eagerly conversing as they worked. In the silence that followed the exit of the boys, Diana caught one or two sentences.

"Now you have made me betray myself," cried Diana. "Go away, you interloper!"

"But, mother—I don't know what mother will say," said Betty.

"You leave your mother to me," returned Geoffrey, in his masterful way. "She won't refuse me. But the question is this—is your love strong enough to brave all obstacles? Is it real, true love, or——"

Diana knocked down a pile of prayer-books, and went into a fit of coughing. She could not be guilty of eavesdropping.

* * * * *

An imperative tap sounded on Diana's door.

"Come in," she called.

Betty entered, radiant, in floating robes of the softest pale blue.

"How sweet you look, Diana," she exclaimed; "I like you best in white."

"Do you?" coldly returned her cousin. "Can I do anything for you?"

"I only came for a little chat," said Betty. "But you look so pale and sad, dear. Is there anything wrong?"

"Nothing," answered Diana, in rather a choked voice. "I've never seen that frock before. It's very pretty, but isn't it rather grand for home wear?"

"Geoffrey is coming this evening," murmured Betty, with a lovely blush and down-cast eyes, "and—and perhaps—someone else."

"Geoffrey—you dress for Geoffrey?" cried Diana. "Oh, Betty, why need you have taken him from me? You have so much; why take all from me? I don't so much mind father and the boys, and I don't care at all for the curates, but, Geoffrey—if you had not come, he would have loved me. And now you have made me betray myself. Oh, go away—go away, you—you—you interloper!"

Betty stood petrified.

"Good gracious!" she ejaculated, after a pause. "Diana, you surely don't think——"

"Think? I know," broke in Diana passionately. "I heard you—talking—you and Geoffrey—in the church. Oh, go away! Haven't you humiliated me enough? Go away."

And Betty went.

Diana appeared at dinner, composed and dignified as ever, and only Betty, glancing furtively at her cousin now and then, noticed the pale cheeks and faint redness round the eyes. Betty herself was restless and disturbed in manner, and after the rector had retired to his study, and the boys had dispersed to their own pursuits, she flitted about the drawing-room in a nervous way that highly irritated Diana.

A little later Betty ran across the room with outstretched hands to meet Geoffrey Musgrave, who had just entered. Diana retreated behind some curtains.

A second later Geoffrey parted the curtains.

"Are you here, Diana? That's right; I want a talk with you."

"But where's Betty?" asked Diana.

"Betty is settling matters with Clifford," replied Geoffrey.

"Clifford!" repeated Diana faintly.

"Yes, Clifford Musgrave, my cousin, you know. It seems that he and Betty were engaged, but her mother managed to separate them, and bring about a misunderstanding. Poor old Cliff hasn't much money, you see, and Betty's mother didn't like the marriage, so she packed the poor girl off here to keep her out of Cliff's way. Betty confided in me, and I undertook to clear matters up. I've done it, and now, Diana, I want to do the same with my own affairs. Why have you been so cold to me lately?"

"I thought—Betty—you seemed," faltered Diana.

"You were jealous, in fact. That must mean that you love me a little bit. Darling, say you love me."

And Diana said it.

Eva Prosser.

Digitized by Google

A Mercenary Wooing.

Showing How Dane Provyn Sought to Retrieve his Fortune, and what came of the Attempt.

"THAT is a pleasant piece of intelligence, certainly!" observed the elder man, Mark Provyn. His tone was quiet, but there was much bitterness in it. "So it comes to this, Dane—the business is as good as smashed up, all in two years."

"I am sorry to say that you have stated the fact exactly," responded the younger man, Dane Provyn, who was nearly twenty-four. His answer was given flippantly.

"I am fifteen years your senior," continued his brother. "I worked that business up from nothing; I thought that I could give you a chance, for I always liked you, although you were a kind of scapegrace. I left some of my money in it, feeling that it would help you, and believing that the interest on that money and on my other investments would just enable me to live very quietly for the remainder of a life that is not likely to be long. And now, when this complaint is getting a firmer hold on me and is steadily incapacitating me, you come to tell me that the business is gone to the dogs."

"To the creditors," interposed Dane suavely. "It is not very polite to call them dogs; they wouldn't like it, I'm sure, if they heard you."

"I worked for the money like a horse; you have spent or wasted it like an ass," cried the elder, losing his self-possession for the time.

His cheeks became flushed with anger. "I tell you what it is, Dane," he went on warmly; "you owe it to me to return that money to me—my share, I mean—and if you have any single spark of manliness in you, if you have not become so soddened with your own selfishness, you will see to it that the creditors are paid in full and that I am paid in full also, thus relieving my name from any stigma and myself from poverty at a time when I most need to have a small competence."

Mark Provyn's face was glowing now. He half rose from his chair, but fell back again with a great sigh. Raising his hand, he waved it towards the door. "Leave me now; I can't bear the sight of your callous face just now. Come to me to-morrow, when you have had time to think over what you have done," he cried.

Dane was on the point of uttering another flippant remark, but some unaccountable feeling took possession of him and the words died away on his lips. Bother the man! Why did he go on in that strain? If the business could—that is, if he, Dane, was to be expected to—— Somehow, he couldn't find the excuse which he wished for in order to shield himself. He wished to pose as an injured individual, but he did not see his way to assume that role, even in his own mind. Confound things! For almost the first time in his life he felt uncomfortable with a sense of guilt. He surveyed his brother, whose face betrayed pain; he understood that Mark had had one of those sharp attacks, and he experienced a sensation of dejection.

"Look here, Mark, old fellow!" he began remorsefully. "I'm awfully sorry, but I don't see how it could have been averted. Anyhow, it's done. So now I must see what else I can do. There is enough to pay all the creditors twenty shillings in every pound, so that needn't lie on your mind; but there won't be any for you and me when they are all paid. I wish I knew what to do. I wish some heiress would fall in love with me and no questions asked; that would be an easy way to the top of Fortune Hill, and I don't see much chance of my ever getting there by any other road. Yes, yes," he added, as his brother moved one arm impatiently; "I'll go now."

Mark's expression changed as Dane moved towards the door; those last words of his careless brother had aroused an idea.

"What about Miss Royston?" he articulated faintly. "You ought to stand a good chance there. Think of it. Try it."

Dane Provyn started, hestitated a moment, and then turned and walked back to his brother.

"I believe there's something in that, by Jove!" he said slowly. "I will think about it. Good night."

In another minute he was in the street, and half an hour later he was in his own lodgings, but exactly how he got there he could not have explained, for his mind had been full of his brother's suggestion and the thought to which it gave rise.

"Mark is right," he agreed, as he threw himself heavily into a chair. "In the circumstances, I ought to stand a good chance. And she will be worth a mint of money when the old fellow retires from this vale of tribulation. I had the good luck to pull him away from the front of a 'bus that would probably have knocked him down and spoilt his appearance, so he would be charmed to have me for a son-in-law—perhaps! I expect he is on the look-out for a titled husband for her, but she is possibly romantic and would fall in love with her father's heroic rescuer. I flatter myself that I am good-looking, although I have nothing else that is good about me."

He rose and surveyed himself in the glass. It was no exaggeration to say that he was good-looking; and the face, to any student of human nature, was a guarantee that there was nothing really bad about him. He was indolent, selfish—though not so selfish as his brother had described him—and careless of consequences; he was the kind of man who might develop into a criminal, but who might also be easily roused to take a proper view of his surroundings and become a hard-working citizen and a credit to society.

Digitized by Google

"Yes, I'll try it," he decided. "I am convinced that I should make her, or any other girl, a thoroughly good husband, while Miss Royston will, no doubt, prove an agreeable life-partner. If she doesn't, I shall travel for a month or two at a time and leave her to her papa."

* * * * *

The energy displayed by Dane Provyn during the next few days in his efforts to obtain an invitation to the country residence of Sir Charles Royston, Alderman and sometime Lord Mayor, was a proof that he had something in him which, if directed into the right channel, would take him a long way up Fortune Hill. At the time of the rescue he had treated the affair in his usual careless manner, instead of improving the acquaintance, as so many other people would have done. He quickly and skilfully repaired that blunder now, and his diplomacy met with a prompt reward.

His business was in the hands of a receiver who was acting for the creditors, so that he could afford to go away for a week; he did not go to see his brother, but contented himself with a few lines of scrawl which set forth briefly how matters (public and private) were progressing.

"According to the old saying, Fortune favours the brave," mused Dane Provyn, as he steamed along in the fast train to Rixdale. "I am not so certain about that; I should be inclined to say that Fortune favours the bold—well, yes, the impudent. But there, I needn't worry myself about the accuracy or otherwise of old sayings. It is sufficient for me that Fortune is favouring me, and that there is every probability of my becoming the son-in-law of Sir Charles Royston. Why, I may even be an Alderman and a Lord Mayor one day myself! Who knows?"

Sir Charles Royston was a pompous personage, who insisted upon the due observance of formality in anything appertaining to himself, although he was not so particular about it when it concerned other people. He had been Lord Mayor during an unimportant year, and had just by an effort obtained a knighthood; but he thought he had been scantily treated and was still of opinion that a grateful Sovereign would make up the deficiency, and create him a baronet as soon as the facts were made known.. Dane Provyn understood him to be one of those who would make their sons address him as "Sir Charles" in private life, rather than call him by the more affectionate term "dad" or "father"; therefore, as the worthy Alderman had no sons, it was most probable that even his daughter would have to call him "Sir Charles."

"Daughters sometimes manage to get the right side of fathers," thought Dane meditatively, "so I may hear her address him very familiarly, but I must not be surprised if I find that the utmost formality exists."

Rixdale Hall was a large mansion situated in a lovely part of the county and surrounded by an estate of considerable extent. Dane's eyes sparkled as he rode up to the house in the carriage placed at his disposal by his host; he felt something akin to a choking sensation at the thought that he might become the owner of this domain.

"If I don't succeed in captivating that girl, I'll—I'll——" Dane stopped for lack of ideas. "I shall deserve to be punched!" he concluded helplessly.

He wondered if Sir Charles would welcome him at the front door, but his host did not appear, and his daughter was also invisible. He was conducted to his room and informed that Sir Charles would see him in the library when he had made himself comfortable.

Dane did not hurry over his toilet. If Sir Charles was not demonstrative, neither would he be; if he took things coolly, it might teach the worthy Alderman that he was entertaining someone who had a good opinion of himself, and Sir Charles would be impressed. It was therefore more than half-an-hour later before Dane Provyn was ushered into the library.

"I am pleased to see you," was Sir Charles' pompous welcome. "You did me a service, young man, and I do not forget such things."

The condescending tone jarred on Dane's feelings. Most people would have called it a "great service" to have been saved from such peril; moreover, although he said that he did not forget such things, Sir Charles had not shown any strong disposition to remember this "thing."

However, Dane had a game to play, so he swallowed his resentment and accepted the proffered hand with a dignified air and suitable reply. The truth was that the young man had seen another figure which sent a curious thrill through him.

"I must introduce you to Miss Royston," said the host in his usual stiff manner. "Mr. Dane Provyn, my dear, who rendered me a—— Yes, I'm sure Miss Royston is—er—delighted to see you, Mr. Provyn!"

In the inmost recesses of his heart Dane fervently hoped that she was, and he could heartily reciprocate the compliment. Miss Royston was about his own age, full of womanliness and grace, with a sweet face that indicated both gentleness and resolution. She was the kind of woman who would lead a man to put forth all that was best in him and induce him to strive for the highest positions which his mental, moral and physical gifts fitted him to hold.

The greeting between them was formal, but there was a hidden warmth in it that was quite spontaneous.

"What a sweet creature she is," thought Dane, as he conducted her into the dining-room.

Somehow, he felt a little ashamed of himself and his mercenary motives, but his case was desperate and he crushed the sentiment.

"And what an old pig to insist that she shall call him by his title!" Dane had noticed that she always addressed him as "Sir Charles."

The dinner would have been a quiet, not to say dismal, affair had it not been for Miss Royston. The host kept up a conversation at first, but it flagged, and then the fact dawned upon Dane that his host was not especially pleased at having to entertain the young fellow.

After dinner Sir Charles excused himself on the ground of having still some business to attend to in connection with the county politics, and he left Dane and Miss Royston together.

"He is an unmannerly lout," muttered Dane. "He is the sort of man who would think the greatest service was rewarded if he handed you a £5 note, and who prefer to discharge their obligations by parting with money which they do not value because they have so much. You have given them something, so to put it, and they reward you by bestowing upon you what is nothing to them and they want to see it in big type in the papers.

"However, he is playing into my hands, for he is leaving me a clear field so far as his daughter is concerned. I wonder if he will refuse his consent? H'm, that would be awkward. No, I don't think he will; he doesn't care what she does, he thinks only of himself."

Dane passed a delightful time with his companion, and he flattered himself that he had already made an impression on her by the time they separated for the night. And as to himself? Dane shrugged his shoulders and did not attempt to answer the thought.

Digitized by Google

Sir Charles Royston did just what was demanded of him as a host and no more. Whenever he could find an excuse for getting out of Dane's society, he took advantage of it. Miss Bessie Royston—for Dane discovered that her name was Bessie—endeavoured unobtrusively to make up for Sir Charles' delinquencies, and so it came about that they were constantly together and the time passed very agreeably for the young man.

How pleasant were the strolls about the estate, the rides in the surrounding country, the hours spent in the old mansion together. Dane made good use of his time and wondered that the Alderman did not perceive the danger of leaving the two so frequently alone; he was making good progress and mentally resolved that he would propose before he quitted Rixdale Hall.

"It is turning out most fortunately," murmured Dane, with a light laugh. "She is the sweetest woman a man could hope to wed; she is growing fond of me—I'm positive of it—and I'm falling in love with her. Who could help it? I don't feel that I am good enough for her, but that girl would make an angel of any fellow, she is so good herself! Dane, you're a lucky dog!"

"Who is Miss Jessie Royston?" asked Dane on the fifth morning, and it was Bessie Royston to whom he addressed the inquiry. "I heard the name this morning for the first time, and I thought that it was a mistake, and that the man should have said Bessie, but it proved to be Jessie."

"Oh, that is my cousin!" cried Miss Royston, with a smile. "Our names sound rather alike, but here we usually distinguish between daughter and niece by calling me Miss Royston while my cousin is called Miss Jessie. She is younger than I, you see; she is not twenty!"

"That is one way to distinguish between you," laughed Dane. "But I wonder that Sir Charles did not have you called Miss Bessie and his niece addressed as Miss Royston."

"Well," she began, with a queer smile; but she could not continue, for Dane's glance was so ardent that she was compelled to drop her eyes.

"Do you know," he said, taking her hand in his, "that I should like to have the right to call you Bessie?"

She raised her eyes swiftly and as quickly lowered them; her bosom heaved and a slight flush stole over her cheeks. They were in a secluded corner of the flower garden, whither she had conducted him in order to show him some new specimens. They were side by side, but he drew round so that they faced one another. The time had come when he must secure this prize; he had a double motive in winning her now, for she had become dear to him and she was an heiress.

"Bessie, dear! I may call you that, may I not? You have become very precious to me. I wonder if you could ever learn to care for me as I care for you?"

She gazed at him with eyes full of love; he was startled at the depth of affection which he saw in them. She uttered no word, but that look was enough and he took her in his arms and kissed her passionately.

"I don't deserve this happiness, dear!" he cried, and he was conscious that he was speaking the unvarnished truth; he did not deserve it, for he was a worthless money-seeker, a careless ne'er-do-well. "I will try to be worthy of you, dear. But," he hesitated, "I ought not to take you from here, I fear! I am poor; I have nothing to offer you, for the business which I had is about to be broken up." His better nature was prevailing and he was making a confession. "And you are rich! What will your—Sir Charles say?"

He had been on the point of saying "your father," but he had checked himself; it seemed incongruous to call him that when his very daughter always spoke of him as "Sir Charles!"

Dane was looking far away as he spoke, for he was thinking with regret of his own careless life, his neglect of his business, and of his despicable plan in obtaining the invitation to Rixdale Hall. He was recalled to himself by Bessie's next remark.

"You are mistaken, Dane—I am not rich, and Sir Charles will regret my leaving here only because I have been useful to him and have thus repaid him for the money he spent on my education and upbringing after my mother, his sister, died.

"I am poor, too, Dane, but if we have one another to work for, we shall be happy and we shall succeed. I know that there are great and good qualities in you, and you will climb the ladder. But I do not mind if you do not realise your ambitions and mine, for we shall be happy together and we shall know that we have tried, that we have done our best. Oh, Dane, I am so happy!"

Dane Provyn heard all this like one in a trance. What did it mean? She was not Sir Charles Royston's daughter and heiress, but a penniless and dependent niece! What egregious blunder had he made? What an ass he had been. By some strange prank of Fate, he had allied himself to one as poor as himself, instead of to an heiress. He was stunned for the moment, and again it was Bessie's voice that recalled his wandering mind—Bessie's voice with a trace of anxiety in it that made him feel despicable.

"What is it, Dane? Are you ill? You have grown quite pale!"

He kissed her. "It is nothing; I shall be all right in a moment," he replied, assuming a cheerful, loving tone. "Let us sit down a while, and you can tell me about yourself, about Sir Charles and his daughter."

Bessie was radiantly happy in her new-found love. She explained the relationship again, and showed Dane a miniature photo of her cousin, the heiress.

Dane looked at it curiously; it was the insipid face of a vain girl, it was the countenance of a girl at whom he would scarcely have condescended to glance for her own sake alone. He contrasted this giddy girl with the sweet, helpful, hopeful woman by his side, and his heart gave a great bound.

Bessie loved him; he would marry her and together they would work and he would strive to repair the faults he had committed. He surprised Bessie in the midst of some remarks, to which he was paying no heed, by kissing her passionately.

"I will do my best to make you happy, dear, and you will encourage me to work. Let us go and tell Sir Charles."

Sir Charles Royston was not displeased; in fact, he was rather glad that his niece would soon be leaving him. He had an uneasy suspicion that Bessie monopolised the attention of certain guests in the season, and he wanted his daughter to do that. He gave them a kind of frigid paternal blessing, coupled with a hint that they had nothing to expect from him, and then dismissed the subject.

Dane left the following day by a train that started fifteen minutes before the arrival of that which was conveying Sir Charles' daughter to her father's country seat. He presented himself to his brother two days later.

"Well, Dane, how are things progressing?" asked Mark gloomily. "And the heiress? When is the wedding to take place?"

"The wedding will take place within three months, Mark," replied Dane quietly. "But the future Mrs. Dane Provyn is not an heiress; she is as poor as I am, and I am glad of it now. She will be more to me than a fortune would have been as you shall see, Mark. I am going to work hard at the firm, and I think that in three months I shall have altered the condition of things to such an extent that the creditors will consent to withdraw the receiver and I shall go on straight. You don't believe it, of course?"

Mark scanned the younger man's countenance narrowly; there was quite a new light in it.

"Yes, I do believe it," he said earnestly. "That girl, whoever she is, has done much for you already; with a fortune you would have done worse than you did at first, but with her you will make your mark."

Mark was right. Sir Charles did exceedingly little for them, but Dane is at the head of a firm which is making rapid headway, and is attracting general attention. He says it is all due to his partner, and most people are at a loss to understand this allusion.

F. Brewster.

Digitized by Google

The Reformation of Dick Carstairs.

"WHAT is the matter with Frances?" I asked, looking across the room to where my little friend sat, pale and dejected, holding languid converse with one of her mother's guests.

"Frances is a headstrong, undutiful child," replied Mrs. Lacy with sudden energy. "She looks the picture of misery, doesn't she? It's all because I won't sanction her marriage with Dick Carstairs."

"They are very fond of each other, I know; but, of course, Dick is—well, rather fast. Yet the influence of a good, sweet girl might reform him."

"Well, I'm not going to sacrifice my only daughter on the offchance of being able to reform Dick Carstairs," remarked Mrs. Lacy with just indignation. "Frances has no father or brother to defend her, and as I am responsible for her, I don't intend her to marry a fast man. Surely, Lady Mary, you don't think a girl ought to marry with the object of reforming her husband."

"My reason is entirely with you, dear Mrs. Lacy," I hastened to assure her, "but I am very much afraid—you know how fond I am of girls and lovers—that my sympathies are with the young couple."

I think Frances had a good idea which way my sympathies were likely to run, for next day she came to lunch, and very soon started the subject of her woes. Dick adored her, she informed me, and he had said that when once she was his wife he would break off with all his wild companions, never touch cards, and never go near a racecourse.

"Mother is so hard," she complained, with tears in her eyes. "She won't believe in Dick. She doesn't believe he'd reform if he were married. She says a girl ought to marry a man who doesn't need reforming. Dearest Lady Mary, I know you feel for me. Isn't it the holiest mission a girl can undertake?"

"To reform Dick Carstairs? Well, I don't quite know, but talk of angels and you hear the rustling of their wings. What sends you here, Mr. Carstairs? From your guilty looks at each other, young people, I am of the opinion that there has been collusion here. Now this won't do. I can't allow you to meet at my house in defiance of Mrs. Lacy's wishes. Frances, I'm ashamed of you."

Dick Carstairs was by no means without good qualities, but he had been his own master from a very early age, and his easy good nature had brought him under the influence of some very fast men, whose example had led poor Dick into a most undesirable way of life.

He was devotedly in love with Frances, and protested that she would be his salvation. He pointed out that she was of age, and therefore need not pay any attention to her mother's prohibition, but I was glad to hear little Frances declare that she would never marry without her mother's consent.

"And she will never give it," added Dick gloomily.

"I do not know that," I put in. "After all, Dick, you must admit that there are reasons why an affectionate mother should hesitate about intrusting her one pretty little daughter to your care."

"But with Frances as my wife I would become as steady a fellow as could be wished for."

"Why not become steady before marriage? I never could advise a girl to marry in the hope of reforming her husband; but if you will pledge your honour to try to throw off every bad habit and every undesirable associate, I will exert all my influence with Mrs. Lacy, to get her to consent to your engagement."

Frances looked radiant, and Dick brightened up. He was ready to promise anything if only the hope of gaining his little sweetheart were not taken from him.

I had a hard task to win over Mrs. Lacy.

"All very well," she said, "and I daresay Mr. Carstairs has all the good qualities you say he has, but I know what kind of life he leads, and never will I allow my darling little girl to marry a man in hopes of reforming him."

"I quite agree with you; but suppose he reforms before marriage. Forgive my persistency, but I am so truly interested in Frances, and I know to part her from Dick will break her heart."

"And to be the wife of a gambler, and an idle, aimless, wild fellow, would break her heart also. He will promise anything now, but when he has attained his end, he will be just as wild and reckless as ever."

"But if you were to put him on a year's probation," I urged, "you would see how far he may be trusted. If you refuse all hope, he will go utterly to the dogs, and poor little Frances will break her heart. Let them become engaged on the understanding that if Dick reforms, breaks off all his bad habits, and becomes steady, the marriage shall take place just as soon as you are convinced you can safely sanction it."

Mrs. Lacy sat for some moments deep in thought.

"My one idea is to do what is best for my child," she began at last, "and, candidly, I do not think Dick Carstairs will make her a good husband. Yet, on the other hand, a longer acquaintance with him may open her eyes as to his true character, also he may tire of being always on his good behaviour, and may withdraw from the affair.

"On the whole I think I can't do better than yield to your suggestion. We will see how things are in a year."

The immediate results of Mrs. Lacy's consent to the engagement were most encouraging. Frances beamed with joy, and her sweet little face grew rosy and plump again. Dick grew steady, and became as manly and straightforward a young fellow as the most rigid of mothers-in-law could desire.

At the end of a year Mrs. Lacy was obliged to own that the reformation of Dick Carstairs was complete, and that she no longer feared to intrust her treasure—her treasured daughter—to him.

The other day, five years after the marriage of Frances and Dick, Mrs. Lacy said to me:

"I owe my happiness and that of my dear children to you. Had I not taken your advice, my daughter would have been a soured, disappointed old maid, and Dick would have gone entirely to the bad, instead of being, as they are now, the happiest couple and the best children that ever lived.

"It is safer to get a man to reform before marriage than to marry him first and try reforming him afterwards."

S. V.

Digitized by Google

He Bored Her.

He: "Oh, I have a splendid story to tell you. I don't think I ever told it to you before." She: "Is it really a good story?" He: "Indeed it is." She (wearily): "Then you haven't told it to me before."

No Competitors.

Johnnie Masher (to the young brother of his best girl): "So Miss Ella is your eldest sister. Who comes after her?" Little Tommy: "Nobody comes after her; but pa says the first one that does can have her."

Suspicious.

Mr. Jones: "Oh, yes, I met Dick Bachellor, and told him all about the baby." Mrs. Jones: "Did he listen patiently?" Mr. Jones: "Very; he listened so patiently that I was afraid at first he wanted to borrow some money."

A Matter of Economy.

"I woo thee in the moonlight," sang the lover to his girl, who was gazing fondly on him from the basement. "It's much cheaper than the gaslight," sang her father, the old churl, who was taking observations from the basement.

His Hope.

"My dear," said Mrs. Henpeck, "I'm positive that our George is thinking seriously of matrimony." "Well, I only hope so," returned Henpeck with unusual spirit; "I wouldn't want any boy of mine to be so unfortunate as to regard it as a joke."

Complimentary.

Romeo: "But how did you induce your father to give his consent? You know you told me he was deeply opposed to actors?" Juliet: "I know; but when I told him it was you, he said perhaps it might not be so bad—that you weren't much of an actor."

Wouldn't Suit Him.

"She said her heart wasn't hers to give me." "What did you do?" "I took my hat and went." "You are an idiot. She meant that you already had her heart." "Do you think it? Well, it's all right, anyway. I never could get along with a girl who can't talk common sense."

A Pretty Riddle.

"Did you ever hear the alphabetical conundrum, Angelina?" "No, Augustus, what is it?" "It is: When will there be only twenty-five letters in the alphabet?" "Oh, I never could guess that!" "It's when U and I are made one, my darling." "What a nice conundrum it is, Augustus!"

Another Romance Spoilt.

Miss Oldgirl (coyly): "I had a strange dream the other night, Mr. Junior. I dreamt—only think!—that you and I were married, and on our honeymoon. You don't know how real it seemed. Did you ever dream such a thing?" Mr. Junior (firmly): "No, Miss Oldgirl, I did not. In fact, I haven't had the nightmare for a good many years."

Candid.

"How many fellows have called on your sister this week?" "Five." "That doesn't include me, does it?" "Oh, no. Sister says you don't count."

To Try His Capabilities,

The poet and the editor were playing tennis, and the latter was beaten. "You serve well, but you cannot return," said the poet. "Can't I?" asked the editor. "Send me a poem and see."

No Cause for Complaint.

Father: "He'd make a model husband. I don't see what fault you can find with him." Daughter: "That's just the trouble. Think of the disadvantage I should have in case we quarrelled."

They Were Unnatural.

Artist: "Oh! you think the background's 'beastly,' do you? Perhaps the cattle are 'beastly' too, though I flatter myself——" Friendly Artist: "Oh, no, my dear fellow! That's just what they are not."

She Had Stopped it.

Father (upstairs): "What time is it down there?" Fannie (down in the sitting-room): "Just ten by the clock, papa." Father: "All right. Don't forget to start the clock again when the young man leaves."

He was a Sour old Bachelor.

"I found a four-leaved clover this morning. There is an old saying that the finder will be married within a year." "Indeed! I was under the impression that the finding of a four-leaved clover was an omen of good luck."

An Improvement.

"Father," confessed the callow youth, "I have married her. We are two souls with but a single thought." "Well, you've gained something. A single thought isn't so many, but it is one more than I ever knew you to have before."

The Honeymoon is Over.

"No one comes to see me," said she wearily, "like they did before I was married." "Speaking of that fact," said he, "I used to call on you seven evenings in the week at that time. But I am as badly off as you. I now have nowhere to go."

A Good Reason.

Lover: "And so your mother does not believe in long engagements? I am delighted." Miss De Broker: "Yes, mamma says ever so many girls' fathers have failed during long engagements, and the poor things never got married at all."

She Never Tried.

He: "Miss Kitty, I've heard it said that a kiss without a moustache is like an egg without salt. Is that so?" She: "Well, really, I don't know—I can't tell—for in all my life I never——" He: "Now, now, Miss Kitty!" She: "Never ate an egg without salt."

No Alternative.

First Guest: "Awful bore, isn't it?" Second Guest: "Dull as a funeral. I knew it would be." First Guest: "You knew it? Then why did you come?" Second Guest: "Had to. My wife heard that the formula for writing regrets had changed and she couldn't find out what the new style was. So she sent an acceptance."

Then He Proposed.

They had looked soulfully into each other's eyes for some time, but somehow he didn't seem to come to the point. Then suddenly he made a discovery. "You have your mother's beautiful eyes," he said. She felt that the time had come to play her trump card. "I have also," she said, "my father's lovely cheque book." Inside of thirty minutes their engagement was announced.

Digitized by Google

A Story of Love and Crime.

By ARNOLD BENNETT.

TWENTY-SIXTH CHAPTER.

The Night Chase and the Mudlark.

"CAN'T find anything," Hazell said, as he jumped into the boat, and then privately to Racksole: "There's a woman on board. Looks as if she might coincide with your description of Miss Spencer. Steam's up, but there's no engineer. I asked where the engineer was, and she inquired what business that was of mine, and requested me to get through with my own business and clear off. Seems rather a smart sort. I poked my nose into everything, but I saw no sign of anyone else. Perhaps we'd better pull away and lie near for a bit, just to see if anything queer occurs."

"You're quite sure he isn't on board?" Racksole asked.

"Quite," said Hazell positively; "I know how to search a vessel. See this," and he handed to Racksole a sort of steel skewer, about two feet long, with a wooden handle. "That," he said, "is one of the Customs' aids to searching."

"I suppose it wouldn't do to go on board and carry off the lady?" Racksole suggested doubtfully.

"Well," Hazell began, with equal doubtfulness, "as for that——"

"Where's 'e orf?" It was the man in the bows who interrupted Hazell. Following the direction of the man's finger, both Hazell and Racksole saw with more or less distinctness a dinghy slip away from the forefoot of the Norwegian vessel and disappear down-stream into the mist.

"It's Jules, I'll swear," cried Racksole. "After him, men. Ten pounds a-piece if we overtake him!"

"Lay down to it now, boys!" said Hazell, and the heavy Customs boat shot out in pursuit.

"This is going to be a lark," Racksole remarked.

"Depends on what you call a lark," said Hazell; "it's not much of a lark tearing down midstream like this in a fog. You never know when you mayn't be in kingdom come with all these barges knocking around. I expect that chap hid in the dinghy when he first caught sight of us, and then slipped his painter as soon as I'd gone.

The boat was moving at a rapid pace with the tide. Steering was a matter of luck and instinct more than anything else. Every now and then Hazell, who held the lines, was obliged to jerk the boat's head sharply round to avoid a barge or an anchored vessel. It seemed to Racksole that vessels were anchored all over the stream. He looked about him anxiously, but for a long time he could see nothing but mist and vague nautical forms. Then suddenly he said, quietly enough, "We're on the right road; I can see him ahead. We're gaining on him." In another minute the dinghy was plainly visible, not twenty yards away, and the sculler—sculling frantically now—was unmistakably Jules—Jules in a light tweed suit and a bowler hat.

"You were right," Hazell said; "this is a lark. I believe I'm getting quite excited. It's more exciting than playing the trombone in an orchestra. I'll run him down, eh?—and then we can drag the chap in from the water."

Racksole nodded, but at that moment a barge, with her red sails set, stood out of the fog clean across the bows of the Customs boat, which narrowly escaped instant destruction. When they got clear, and the usual interchange of calm, nonchalant swearing was over, the dinghy was barely to be discerned in the mist, and the fat man was breathing in such a manner that his sighs might almost have been heard on the banks. Racksole wanted violently to do something, but there was nothing to do; he could only sit supine by Hazell's side in the stern-sheets. Gradually they began again to overtake the dinghy, whose one-man crew was evidently tiring. As they came up, hand over fist, the dinghy's nose swerved aside, and the tiny craft passed down a water-lane between two anchored mineral barges, which lay black and deserted about fifty yards from the Surrey shore. "To starboard," said Racksole. "No, man!" Hazell replied; "we can't get through there. He's bound to come out below; it's only a feint. I'll keep our nose straight ahead."

And they went on, the fat man pounding away, with a face which glistened even in the thick gloom. It was an empty dinghy which emerged from between the two barges and went drifting and revolving down towards Greenwich.

The fat man gasped a word to his comrade, and the Customs boat stopped dead.

"'E's all right," said the man in the bows. "If it's 'im you want, 'e's on one o' them barges, so you've only got to step on and take 'im orf."

"That's all," said a voice out of the depth of the nearest barge, and it was the voice of Jules, otherwise known as Mr. Tom Jackson.

"'Ear 'im?" said the fat man, smiling. "'E's a good

Digitized by Google

un, 'e is. But if I was you, Mr. Hazell, or you, sir, I shouldn't step on to that barge so quick as all that."

They backed the boat under the stern of the nearest barge and gazed upwards.

"It's all right," said Racksole to Hazell; "I've got a revolver. How can I clamber up there?"

"Yes, I dare say you've got a revolver all right," Hazell replied sharply. "But you mustn't use it. There mustn't be any noise. We should have the river police down on us in a twinkling if there were a revolver shot, and it would be the ruin of me. If an inquiry were held the Commissioners wouldn't take any official notice of the fact that my superior officer had put me on to this job, and I should be requested to leave the service."

"Have no fear on that score," said Racksole. "I shall, of course, take all responsibility."

"It wouldn't matter how much responsibility you took," Hazell retorted; "you couldn't put me back into the service, and my career would be at an end."

"But there are other careers," said Racksole, who was really anxious to lame his ex-waiter by means of a judiciously-aimed bullet. "There are other careers."

"The Customs is my career," said Hazell, "so let's have no shooting. We'll wait about a bit; he can't escape. You can have my skewer if you like"—and he gave Racksole his searching instrument. "And you can do what you please, provided you do it neatly and don't make a row over it."

For a few moments the four men were passive in the boat, surrounded by swirling mist, with black water beneath them, and towering above them a half-loaded barge with a desperate and resourceful man on board. Suddenly the mist parted and shrivelled away in patches, as though before the breath of some monster. The sky was visible; it was a clear sky, and the moon was shining. The transformation was just one of those meteorological quick-changes which happen most frequently on a great river.

"That's a sight better," said the fat man. At the same moment a head appeared over the edge of the barge. It was Jules' face—dark, sinister, and leering.

"Is it Mr. Racksole in that boat?" he inquired calmly; "because, if so, let Mr. Racksole step up. Mr. Racksole has caught me, and he can have me for the asking. Here I am." He stood up to his full height on the barge, tall against the night sky, and all the occupants of the boat could see that he held firmly clasped in his right hand a short dagger. "Now, Mr. Racksole, you've been after me for a long time," he continued; "here I am. Why don't you step up? If you haven't got the pluck yourself, persuade someone else to step up in your place—the same fair treatment will be accorded to all." And Jules laughed a low, penetrating laugh.

He was in the midst of this laugh when he lurched suddenly forward.

"What'r' you doing of aboard my barge?" Off you goes!" It was a boy's small, shrill voice that sounded in the night. A ragged boy's small form had appeared silently behind Jules, and two small arms with a vicious shove precipitated him into the water. He fell with a fine gurgling splash. It was at once obvious that swimming was not among Jules' accomplishments. He floundered wildly and sank. When he reappeared he was dragged into the Customs boat. Rope was produced, and in a minute or two the man lay ignominiously bound in the bottom of the boat. With the aid of a mud-lark—a mere barge boy, who probably had no more right on the barge than Jules himself—Racksole had won his game. For the first time for several weeks the millionaire experienced a sensation of equanimity and satisfaction. He leant over the prostrate form of Jules, Hazell's professional skewer in his hand.

"What are you going to do with him now?" asked Hazell.

"We'll row up to the landing steps in front of the Grand Babylon. He shall be well lodged at my hotel, I promise him."

Jules spoke no word.

Before Racksole parted company with the Customs man that night Jules had been safely transported into the Grand Babylon Hotel and the two watermen had received their £10 apiece.

"You will sleep here?" said the millionaire to Mr. George Hazell. "It is late."

"With pleasure," said Hazell. The next morning he found a sumptuous breakfast awaiting him, and in his table-napkin was a Bank of England note for a hundred pounds. But, though he did not hear of them till much later, many things had happened before Hazell consumed that sumptuous breakfast.

Jules was pushed violently off the barge into the river.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CHAPTER.

The Confession of Mr. Tom Jackson.

It happened that the small bedroom occupied by Jules during the years when he was head-waiter at the Grand Babylon had remained empty since his sudden dismissal by Theodore Racksole. No other head-waiter had been formally appointed in his place; and, indeed, the absence of one man—even the unique Jules—could scarcely have been noticed in the enormous staff of a place like the Grand Babylon. The functions of a head-waiter are generally more ornamental, spectacular, and morally impressive than useful, and it was so at the great hotel on the Embankment. Racksole accordingly had the excellent idea of transporting his prisoner, with as much secrecy as possible, to this empty bedroom. There proved to be no difficulty in doing so; Jules showed himself perfectly amenable to a show of superior force. Racksole took upstairs with him an old commissionaire who had been attached to the outdoor service of the hotel for many years—a grey-haired man, wiry as a terrier and strong as a mastiff. Entering the bedroom with Jules, whose hands were bound, he told the commissionaire to remain outside the door. Jules' bedroom was quite an ordinary apartment, though perhaps slightly superior to the usual accommodation provided for servants in the caravanserais of the West End. It was about fourteen feet by twelve.

Digitized by Google

It was furnished with a bedstead, a small wardrobe, a small washstand and dressing-table, and two chairs. There were two hooks behind the door, a strip of carpet by the bed, and some cheap ornaments on the iron mantelpiece. There was also one electric light. The window was a little square one, high up from the floor, and it looked on the inner quadrangle. The room was on the top storey—the eighth—and from it you had a view sheer to the ground. Twenty feet below ran a narrow cornice about a foot wide; three feet or so above the window another and wider cornice jutted out, and above that was the high, steep roof of the hotel, though you could not see it from the window. As Racksole examined the window and the outlook, he said to himself that Jules could not escape by that exit, at any rate. He gave a glance up the chimney, and saw that the flue was far too small to admit a man's body.

Then he called in the commissionaire, and together they bound Jules firmly to the bedstead, allowing him, however, to lie down. All the while the captive never opened his mouth—merely smiled a smile of disdain. Finally Racksole removed the ornaments, the carpet, the chairs, and the hooks, and wrenched away the switch of the electric light. Then he and the commissionaire left the room, and Racksole locked the door on the outside and put the key in his pocket.

"You will keep watch here," he said to the commissionaire, "through the night. You can sit on this chair. Don't go to sleep. If you hear the slightest noise in the room blow your cab-whistle; I will arrange to answer the signal. If there is no noise do nothing whatever. I don't want this talked about, you understand. I shall trust you; you can trust me."

"But the servants will see me here when they get up to-morrow," said the commissionaire, with a faint smile, "and they will be pretty certain to ask what I'm doing of up here. What shall I say to 'em?"

"You've been a soldier, haven't you?" asked Racksole.

"I've seen three campaigns, sir," was the reply, and, with a gesture of pardonable pride, the grey-haired fellow pointed to the medals on his breast.

"Well, supposing you were on sentry duty and some meddlesome person in camp asked you what you were doing—what should you say?"

"I should tell him to clear off or take the consequences, and pretty quick, too."

"Do that to-morrow morning, then, if necessary," said Racksole, and departed.

It was then about one o'clock a.m. The millionaire retired to bed—not his own bed, but a bed on the seventh storey. He did not, however, sleep very long. Shortly after dawn he was wideawake, and thinking busily about Jules. He was, indeed, very curious to know Jules' story, and he determined, if the thing could be done at all, by persuasion or otherwise, to extract it from him. With a man of Theodore Racksole's temperament there is no time like the present, and at six o'clock, as the bright morning sun brought gaiety into the window, he dressed and went upstairs again to the eighth storey. The commissionaire sat stolid but alert on his chair, and, at the sight of his master, rose and saluted.

"Anything happened?" Racksole asked.

"Nothing, sir."

"Servants say anything?"

"Only a dozen or so of 'em are up yet, sir. One of 'em asked what I was playing at, and so I told her I was looking after a bull bitch and a litter of pups that you was very particular about, sir."

"Good," said Racksole, as he unlocked the door and entered the room. All was exactly as he had left it, except that Jules, who had been lying on his back, had somehow turned over and was now lying on his face. He gazed silently, scowling at the millionaire. Racksole greeted him and ostentatiously took a revolver from his hip-pocket and laid it on the dressing-table. Then he seated himself on the dressing-table by the side of the revolver, his legs dangling an inch or two above the floor.

"I want to have a talk to you, Jackson," he began.

IF YOU ARE ILL

you should at once make up your mind to be well again. To do this you should determine whether your ailment springs and whether among the pains and distress that afflicts you, any of the following symptoms appear:

FROM INDIGESTION

Dull Headache—Low Fever—
Yellowish Eyes and Skin—
Slimy Mouth and Tongue—
Loss of Appetite—
Hunger, with Fear of Food—
Languid Feeling by Day and Sleeplessness at Night—
General Bodily Weakness—
Heavy Feeling in the Limbs—
Little Interest in Life
And its Affairs.

MOTHER SEIGEL'S SYRUP.

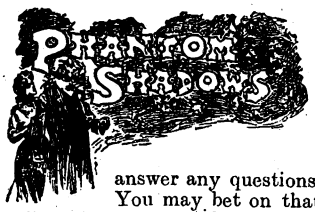
"For three years I suffered all the pains and distress resulting from indigestion, and often wished, in my misery, that I was dead: Eight years have passed since Mother Seigel's Syrup put new life into me and restored me to health, and I have had no return of the complaint." Mrs. E. Elwen, 3 Russel Street, Bishop Auckland, Feb. 19th, 1904.

"It may interest you to know that since sending you my testimony in 1897, to the value of Mother Seigel's Syrup, I have continued to enjoy good health. When I think how I suffered for many years I am sorry I did not know of that great remedy sooner. Nothing did me any good but Mother Seigel's Syrup—that cured me, and I shall always feel grateful." Thomas Anderton, 50 Mill Lane, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Feb. 15th, 1904. If it has done so much for thousands like these, it

WILL CURE YOU.

Price 1/1½ and 2/6 per Bottle.

Digitized by Google



"You can talk to me as much as you like," said Jules. "I sha'n't interfere, you may bet on that."

"I should like you to answer some questions."

"That's different," said Jules. "I'm not going to answer any questions while I'm tied up like this. You may bet on that, too."

"It will pay you to be reasonable," said Racksole.

"I'm not going to answer any questions while I'm tied up."

"I'll unfasten your legs, if you like," Racksole suggested politely; "then you can sit up. It's no use you pretending you've been uncomfortable, because I know you haven't. I calculate you've been treated very handsomely, my son. There you are!" and he loosened the lower extremities of the prisoner from their bonds. "Now, I repeat, you may as well be reasonable. You may as well admit that you've been fairly beaten in the game and act accordingly. I was determined to beat you, by myself, without the police, and I've done it."

"You've done yourself," retorted Jules. "You've gone against the law. If you'd had any sense you wouldn't have meddled; you'd have left everything to the police. They'd have muddled about for a year or two, and then done nothing. Who's going to tell the police now? Are you? Are you going to give me up to 'em, and say, 'Here, I've caught him for you'? If you do they'll ask you to explain several things, and then you'll look foolish. One crime doesn't excuse another, and you'll find that out."

With unerring insight, Jules had perceived exactly the difficulty of Racksole's position, and it was certainly a difficulty which Racksole did not attempt to minimise to himself. He knew well that it would have to be faced. He did not, however, allow Jules to guess his thoughts.

"Meanwhile," he said calmly to the other, "you're here and my prisoner. You've committed a variegated assortment of crimes, and among them is murder. You are due to be hanged. You know that. There is no reason why I should call in the police at all. It will be perfectly easy for me to finish you off, as you deserve, myself. I shall only be carrying out justice, and robbing the hangman of his fee. Precisely as I brought you into the hotel, I can take you out again. A few days ago you borrowed or stole a steam yacht at Ostend. What you have done with it I don't know, nor do I care. But I strongly suspect that my daughter had a narrow escape from being murdered on your steam yacht. Now I have a steam yacht of my own. Suppose I use it as you used yours! Suppose I smuggle you on to it, steam out to sea, and then ask you to step off it into the ocean one night. Such things have been done. Such things will be done again. If I acted so, I should, at least, have the satisfaction of knowing that I had relieved society of the incubus of a scoundrel."

"But you won't," Jules murmured.

"No," said Racksole steadily, "I won't—if you behave yourself this morning. But I swear to you that if you don't I will never rest till you are dead, police or no police. You don't know Theodore Racksole."

"I believe you mean it," Jules exclaimed, with an air of surprised interest, as though he had discovered something of importance.

"I believe I do," Racksole resumed. "Now listen. At the best, you will be given up to the police. At the worst, I shall deal with you myself. With the police you may have a chance—you may get off with twenty years' penal servitude, because, though it is absolutely certain that you murdered Reginald Dimmock, it would be a little difficult to prove the case against you. But with me you would have no chance whatever. I have a few questions to put to you, and it will depend on how you answer them whether I give you up to the police or take the law into my own hands. And let me tell you that the latter course would be much simpler for me. And I would take it, too, did I not feel that you were a very clever and exceptional man, did I not have a sort of sneaking admiration for your detestable skill and ingenuity."

"You think, then, that I am clever?" said Jules. "You are right. I am. I should have been much too clever for you if luck had not been against me. You owe your victory, not to skill, but to luck."

"That is what the vanquished always say. Waterloo was a bit of pure luck for the English, no doubt, but it was Waterloo all the same."

Jules yawned elaborately. "What do you want to know?" he inquired, with politeness.

"First and foremost, I want to know the names of your accomplices inside this hotel."

"I have no more," said Jules. "Rocco was the last."

"Don't begin by lying to me. If you had no accomplice, how did you contrive that one particular bottle of Romanée-Conti should be served to his Highness Prince Eugen?"

"Then you discovered that in time, did you?" said Jules. "I was afraid so. Let me explain that that needed no accomplice. The bottle was topmost in the bin, and naturally it would be taken. Moreover, I left it sticking out a little further than the rest."

"You did not arrange that Hubbard should be taken ill?"

"I had no idea," said Jules, "that the excellent Hubbard was not enjoying his accustomed health."

"Tell me," said Racksole, "who or what is the origin of your vendetta against the life of Prince Eugen?"

"I had no vendetta against the life of Prince Eugen," said Jules, "at least, not to begin with. I merely undertook, for a consideration, to see that Prince Eugen did not have an interview with a certain Mr. Sampson Levi in London before a certain date, that was all. It seemed simple enough. I had been engaged in far more complicated transactions before. I was convinced that I could manage it, with the help of Rocco and Em—and Miss Spencer."

"Is that woman your wife?"

"She would like to be," he sneered. "Please don't interrupt. I had completed my arrangements, when you so inconsiderately bought the hotel. I don't mind admitting now that from the very moment when you came across me that night in the corridor I was secretly afraid of you, though I scarcely admitted the fact even to myself then. I thought it safer to shift the scene of our operations to Ostend. I had meant to deal with Prince Eugen in this hotel, but I decided, then, to intercept him on the Continent, and I dispatched Miss Spencer with some instructions. Troubles never come singly, and it happened just then that fool Dimmock, who had been in the swim with us, chose to prove refractory. The slightest hitch would have upset everything, and I was obliged to—to clear him off the scene. He wanted to back out—he had a bad attack of conscience, and violent measures were essential. I regret his untimely decease, but he brought it on himself. Well, everything was going serenely when you and your brilliant daughter, apparently determined to meddle, turned up again among us at Ostend. Only twenty-four hours, however, had to elapse before the date which had been mentioned to me by my employers. I kept poor little Eugen for the allotted time, and then you managed to get hold of him. I do not deny that you scored there, though, according to my original instructions, you scored too late. The time had passed, and, so far as I knew, it didn't matter a pin whether Prince Eugen saw Mr. Sampson Levi or not. But my employers were still uneasy. They were uneasy even after little Eugen had lain ill in Ostend for several weeks. It appears that they feared that even at that date an interview between Prince Eugen and Mr. Sampson Levi might work harm to them. So they applied to me again. This time they wanted Prince Eugen to be—er—finished off entirely. They offered high terms."

"What terms?"

"I had received fifty thousand pounds for the first job, of which Rocco had half. Rocco was also to be made a member of a certain famous European Order, if things went straight. That was what he coveted far more than the money—the vain fellow! For the second job I was offered a hundred thousand. A tolerably large sum. I regret that I have not been able to earn it."

(Another long instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

MISCELLANEOUS ADVERTISEMENTS

Will be inserted in this column at the rate of 6d. per line of 8 words or part thereof. All advertisements should be addressed to Advertisement Manager, "Short Stories," 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., 11 days prior to date of appearance.

Pawnbroker's Clearance Sale.
10/6. Lady's 18-Carat Gold-Cased Keyless Watch, Jewelled movement, exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also long Watch-guard, 18-Carat Gold (stamped) filled; two together only 10/6; approval.
10/6. Gent's 18-Carat Gold-Cased Chronograph Stop Watch, Jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper; 10 years' warranty; also 18-Carat Gold (stamped) filled Double Curb Albert, Seal attached; three together, 10/6; approval before payment.
19/6. Lady's Six-Guinea Solid Gold Keyless Watch, richly engraved; splendid timekeeper; 10 years' warranty; week's trial; sacrifice 19/6.
10/6. Lady's Solid Gold (hall-marked) Five-Guinea Diamond and Emerald Doublet Half-hoop Ring; large lustrous stones, 10/6; approval.
8/6. Handsome Long Watch-guard.—Real 18-carat gold (stamped) filled; ditto, heavier (extra long), exceptionally choice design, 10/6; approval.
10/6. Field Glass, Four-Guinea Military Binocular: 50 miles' range; 10 Achromatic Crystal Lenses, Wide Field; saddler-made sling case; sacrifice, 10/6; approval.
B. C. DAVIS, 26 Denmark Hill, London.

Teeth Bought, Gold and Platinum. Banker's reference.—Apply, Teeth by Instalments Institute, 48 Edgware Road, W.

Art.—Work at home, tinting prints, post-cards, etc.; easily acquired; good prices. Addressed envelope, Art Company, 6 Gt. James Street, London, W.C.

Baldness Cured. Free Trial.—A French Specialist who has devoted his life to the study of Hair Diseases, having cured thousands of almost hopeless cases, will send a genuine inexpensive treatment to all who write enclosing 2 stamps. New Hair grows in 4 to 10 days.—K. Henri-Francis Brixton Road London

Gem Phonograph, 1 doz. Records, £2. A bargain. Dept. P., 258 Oldham Road, Waterloo, Ashton.

Old Artificial Teeth Bought.—Call or forward by post; full value per return, or offer made.—Messrs. O. Browning, Manufacturing Dentists, 133 Oxford Street, London. (Established 100 years.)

"Walking," by C. Lang Neil, is a thoroughly practical guide to pedestrianism, contains information as to how to train in order to become an expert walker, &c. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (W. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Small Gardens, and How to Make the Most of Them," by Violet Biddle, is just the book for those desirous of procuring the best possible results from their gardens. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (S. G. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Cricket," Edited by G. L. Jessop, contains practical instructions as to how to play the game by K. S. Ranjitsinhji, C. B. Fry, G. L. Jessop, and others. Price 1/2, post free, from the Publisher (C. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Photography.—"How to Take and Fake Photographs," by Clive Holland, contains all information required by the beginner. Price 1/2, post free, from the Publisher (P. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Eczema and all Skin Eruptions.—A victim who was cured after 5 years' suffering will gladly send full particulars of an inexpensive guaranteed Cure on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Address: F. M. Pacidarma, 5 Swallow Street, Piccadilly, London.

Rabbits.—For Sale, Four Pure-bred Himalayans, of the Duchess of Sutherland's strain, only 3/6 per pair.—Address, J. H. Carr, 127 Queen's Road, Wimbledon.

2/6 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD.

Our warranted Timekeeper, with guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent, post free, to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/6 and four stamps extra for postage. During this month we give absolutely free a Mexican Silver Watch Chain. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.

GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS,
89 Pimlico Road, London, S.W.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM
(CLOTTED).

Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil, invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1/4; 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mrs. CONYERS, Chagford, R.S.O., Devon.

GIVEN AWAY
with this week's
HOME NOTES
(No. 542)

A Paper Pattern of this CHEMISE

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

Price 1d.

REDUCE YOUR BOOT BILLS ONE HALF BY USING BLAKEY'S BOOT PROTECTORS

INSIST UPON "BLAKEY'S"

PEARSON'S HOME MANAGEMENT

Is just the thing for those Commencing Housekeeping.

IT CONTAINS

Hundreds of Cookery Recipes

and all details regarding the Management of the Home.

FULLY ILLUSTRATED WITH COLOURED AND OTHER PLATES.

NOW APPEARING in FORTNIGHTLY PARTS

PRICE 7d. NET.

If you have not seen it send 7 stamps for a specimen part to

THE PUBLISHER,
17 HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

SAPON

It REALLY does!
Does what?
"It does itself!"

that is to say, if you follow the directions.

SOAK,
SQUEEZE,
RINSE,
WRING.

SAPON does the washing while you take your ease.

A FREE SAMPLE will be sent for Post-card to SAPON Limited (Dept. 68), St. Swithin's Chambers, London.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Conversation for Lovers.

"HAROLD" is rather a talkative young man, but when in the presence of his beloved finds it very difficult to speak at all for long periods. Whether it is that he has nothing to say, he doesn't know. What is he to do to remove this defect?

* * * * * * *

Well, "HAROLD," I think you very likely make the common mistake amongst sweethearting couples in assuming that you must only talk about yourselves and your feelings when together, while when in other people's presence you would converse on general subjects. Perhaps the topic is easily exhausted so far as you both are concerned, hence your long silences.

* * * * * * *

As a matter of fact, your sweetheart should be one who opens your mind more than anyone else, and these silences rather suggest that you have not very much in common, or you would not find conversation so difficult. When next with her, try talking just as though she were an ordinary girl, and not your beloved, though there is no reason why you should not accompany your remarks with a squeeze, to show that you have not suddenly grown cold. I rather suspect that these silent love attachments have not very much solid basis, for those who are about to unite their lives should certainly have some interests in common beside themselves. Try talking on every subject you know anything about, and she must surely find something in which she is interested.

Paint and Powder.

"MADGE" tells me she is desperately in love with a very well-known actor. This infatuation has been discovered by some of her friends, who tell her that it is immodest and unwomanly for a girl to fall in love with those far beyond her station.

* * * * * * *

Certainly, "MADGE," you do not deserve such cruel names. It is not unnatural that a powerful actor like the one you mention should have made you spell-bound. But do not delude yourself with any hope that such an affair can lead to anything. Why not be content, like many others, to worship him as a hero? After all, it is probably only his stage-self you are in love with. As a man, quite possibly he would cease to exercise any such a spell.

* * * * * * *

You will soon grow out of this infatuation, as you are only eighteen, and in a year or two will no doubt meet the right man in real life. Meanwhile, why not cure your present distraction by going and seeing as many other actors as possible? You will, by this means, see that there are many other men on the stage equally splendid, and realise that falling in love with them, "in the paint and powder," is just as foolish as losing your heart to a hero in a novel, or, for that matter, a statue.

Lottie's Friendship.

"LOTTIE" is a candid girl. She admits that her temperament is really hateful. While one day she is on the best of terms with Dolly, her particular friend, the next she becomes simply horrid. Now, Dolly has begun to get a little tired of this, and has told "LOTTIE" sorrowfully that she fears their friendship cannot continue unless "LOTTIE" tries to be nicer to her.

* * * * * * *

I think "LOTTIE" had better, in her own interest, take Dolly's suggestion seriously—at any rate, for the time being. I know quite what kind of girl she is, and think the best cure would be for her to learn to value a friend by experiencing what alienation really means. Let "LOTTIE" and Dolly not meet each other for a month, and if, at the end of that time, they find they miss each other, they will come together as a matter of course, and perhaps "LOTTIE" will have then learnt to be more careful of the little restraints necessary in preserving one's attachments.

A Sudden Change.

"H. B." has been keeping company with a girl for four years, their ages being respectively twenty-one and nineteen. All of a sudden she asked him to cease writing to her, and after that said she wished him to give her up, not, however, assigning any reason. He has since seen a good deal of her, but thinks her views have changed as regards his suit.

* * * * * * *

Well, "H. B.," a girl's ideas often undergo a great change in four years, and you should not be very much surprised if there has been some modification in her early liking for you. I don't wish to discourage you, but her attitude may be explained by the fact that, while she is still fond of your friendship, she no longer thinks of you as a sweetheart. Ask her definitely to tell you the truth, and, if it is as I surmise, face it like a man.

* * * * * * *

I am always ready to sympathise with real disappointments and troubles in love. But for a young man of twenty-one, with his future to carve out for himself, to allow his thoughts to be distracted and his whole life confused out of a speculative wonder as to whether this or that girl loves, or merely likes him, or a dozen other small questions, is not to be encouraged. If she does not love you any longer, cease worrying about it, and spend your time trying to get on in the world.

Love or Money.

"FIDO" was once a groom, but is now a publican with means. When a groom a young lady with whom he walked out disdained his suit because of his poverty. Now that he is better off she has discovered she loves him. But meanwhile he has taken up with another damsel, who it appears always loved him.

* * * * * * *

I think you should obey your own feelings in this matter. Whom do you love the better—the girl who thought you were not good enough for her until you got your present position, or the girl who loved you all along? You should certainly marry the one you really love, and agree to let bygones be bygones. At the same time, the young lady who only began to think of you as a husband when you improved your finances would seem to be rather a worldly individual, and if I had the settlement of the matter, I should be strongly inclined to seal the union between you and the other one, whose love for you would appear to be the more enduring. But if it is the first one you love, don't hesitate to take her back to your bosom, if you can do it without breaking anyone's heart.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"The Most Perfect Form of Cocoa."

—Guy's Hospital Gazette.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED

300
Gold Medals, &c.

Cocoa

TRY ALSO FRY'S COCOA AND MILK.

A Combination of FRY'S PURE COCOA with the Best English Milk.

MADE INSTANTLY WITH BOILING WATER.
NO MILK OR SUGAR REQUIRED.

"Refreshing and Nutritive."—Lancet.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

YOU

never know your luck. Doubtless this is well. The glorious uncertainty of fortune is a fine stimulant, and hope can never die. How many despondent men and women have been encouraged by the reminder—"Cheer up, try again, you never know your luck!" To the countless martyrs to biliousness, sick-headache, nervous prostration, constipation, indigestion, and other painful forms of stomachic trouble, who really taste the simple pleasure of living, words like these should appeal with peculiar force. Such unfortunate sufferers need only try their luck with BEECHAM'S PILLS to be speedily convinced that the tide has turned in their favour and good health may easily be won. No other medicine exercises a more marked control over the diseases mentioned, nor exhibits curative effects so invariably to be relied upon. Thousands of people by old experience that these deservedly famous pills are a blessing in the household and in every country of the world. They are good alike for man, woman, and child, if taken according to directions. They are pre-eminently a family medicine—a remedy to have by one in readiness for every occasion where need arises; and there is yet another point in this connection that you should mark on the tablets of memory. BEECHAM'S PILLS, in addition to their acknowledged value in Liver, Kidney, and Stomach disorders, have a specially beneficial effect in such ailments as are peculiar to women, many of whom endure needless pain and ill-health through ignorance of this important fact. All things considered, then, it may be asserted that for either sex Good Health is more a question of BEECHAM'S PILLS than of mere LUCK.

NEVER

KNOW

YOUR

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

No. 806. Week ending June 11, 1904.] [PRICE ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

. . THE . .

KODAK

AT THE SEASIDE.

NO Holiday can be complete without a Kodak. It does away with the tedium of holiday-making by providing a wholly fascinating and profitable recreation.

For £1 you can buy a serviceable little Kodak with all the appliances of picture-making, including the Daylight Developing Machine, and by its use you can secure valuable records of the charming places you visit and the friends you meet. You can make pictures of your children in their happiest surroundings, and your records will enable you to live the holiday over again.

The new Kodak photography needs no dark-room and no previous experience. It is free from all mess and staining, adding very little to the cost of a holiday, but everything to its enjoyment. We will forward an illustrated booklet which will tell you all about it if you will send a post-card to

KODAK Ltd., 41-43 Clerkenwell Rd., LONDON, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; and 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow.
Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, W.; 171-173 Regent Street, W.; and 40 Strand, London, W.C.

J. G. GRAVES' CYCLES

J. G. Graves' 1904 Price List contains Illustrations and Particulars of carefully selected High-Grade Machines, suitable for every class of rider.

Accounts may be paid by Easy Monthly Instalments, or Discount Advantages offered to Cash Purchasers.

Ladies' Cycles a Speciality. Illustrated Catalogues Free.

AGENTS WANTED. GOOD PAY. NO RESPONSIBILITY. WRITE FOR TERMS.

J. G. GRAVES, 169 Division Street, SHEFFIELD.

GIVEN AWAY

with next week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 544)

A PAPER PATTERN of this

COAT.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

A course of this famous remedy will, as certainly as water quenches thirst, impart new vigour to the Stomach and Digestive Organs. The Liver and Kidneys will be cleansed and regulated, the Blood purified, and the general health soundly re-established.

BEECHAM'S PILLS have done this for many thousands of suffering and distressed people; why should they not do as much for you?

BEECHAM'S PILLS are specially suitable for the ailments peculiar to Females of all ages.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

ONE DOSE of

Kaputine cures in Ten minutes the most violent Headache or Neuralgic Pain no matter what the cause of the attack.

KAPUTINE is not an aperient, but is for one purpose only—to cure Headache and Neuralgia.

KAPUTINE

Cures in Ten Minutes.

Kaputine goes right to the seat of the trouble—the Nerves—it puts the Nerves right, that is why it cures almost instantly

Headache or Neuralgia.

Refuse dangerous white Headache Powders, such as have been condemned by the press. Demand Kaputine, the remedy that is backed up by medical testimony—the Safe Remedy.

Packets of 18 doses 1s.; Samples 1d. each. Of all Medicine Dealers.

Samples Free from Proprietors:
C. G. Kaputine, Huddersfield.

BODLEIAN LIBRARY 28 6 1904

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 806.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending June 11th, 1904.

A SUMMER HOLIDAY.

Relating the Events That Happened Therein.

GRACE and I were inseparable friends. We were "two daughters of one race"—that is to say, cousins in the third degree; but there the likeness ended, for, as Tennyson puts it, "she was the fairer in the face," and rich, while I was only a poor little insignificant nursery-governess. It was a wonder to me how a creature so divinely made could so love plain little me; but, as I said before, we were inseparable.

We were both orphans; her father died, leaving all his large fortune to his only child. My parents died, leaving me an empty pocket, but too proud a heart to live—as she implored me to—on her ample means.

A great and unexpected pleasure had come to me that summer of which I write. Grace's aunt on her father's side had written her to come and spend a summer in her country home, and had told her to take me also.

I, whom the very sight of a mound of sweet-scented hay almost sent crazy, and to whom the dream of strolling through country lanes, filling my hands full of flowers, and my heart full of love to the Giver of so much beauty, was as a dream of Paradise—I was invited to spend a summer in the country.

We started, Grace and I. I noticed how everyone turned and looked at the stately figure in its dainty dress; and in my love I said:

"Queen Grace, how beautiful you are!"

Softly laughing, she touched my cheek with her finger.

"Wait till three months from now, when this pale, thin cheek has rounded out, and see who will be beautiful then."

Mrs. Rogers' carriage, an old-fashioned country vehicle, awaited us at the station, and there, holding the door open was the most handsome young man I have ever seen.

He helped us in, and then clambered to his seat.

As soon as the wheels were in motion, and we could talk without being heard, I asked Grace if she had noticed what a handsome face our driver had. Grace looked at me a little surprised for a moment and then, with a comical expression in her dark eyes, lectured me thus:

"Dot, you romantic, foolish child! You are so infatuated with the country that the glamour extends over everything you see, I verily believe. Why, Phil is only a fair specimen of a country youth; you'll see plenty of them before you go home."

When we reached the house I almost screamed with delight. It was a low, long building, built of stone and covered with ivy, which grew and twined around every quaint, lattice-framed window. At the door stood Mrs. Rogers' housekeeper; but no hospitable lady was there, ready to greet her guests with cordial welcome.

"Why, Betsy, where's auntie?" asked Grace as we alighted.

Then Betsy informed us that Mrs. Rogers had been called suddenly away to nurse a friend through a severe illness, who, living all alone, had no one to care for her.

All rights reserved.]

"She told me to tell you, Miss Grace, to make yourselves at home, and do and have everything you wish, and in a week she hopes to be back."

And so we found ourselves, two young girls, mistresses of a great place, with permission to do just what we chose for a week.

The next morning we set out after breakfast to take a long ramble—a "tour of discovery," Grace called it. We walked soberly along for a time, but the exhilarating country air fired my blood, and I proposed a race.

Grace, that tree—who'll reach it first?" And off we started.

We must have looked very odd, running at the top of our speed, and Grace particularly so; for her luxuriant hair came loose and fell in a heavy, gleaming shower all over her radiant face.

Just then a pony trap rolled along, and leaning back in it as if weary, while the coachman drove, was a gentleman.

He turned as he passed, and favoured us with a glance from the blackest eyes set in the whitest face I ever saw.

"Oh, Dot! this is dreadful! Look at my hair!" said Grace.

With my aid she soon fastened it up, and we resumed our walk, and continued it more quietly.

When we reached home we described the pony trap to Betsy.

"Oh, yes, that's Mr. Ralph Ogden. Your aunt knows him, Miss Grace. He bought the Waverley place last spring, and has been there ever since. He is a great invalid, and leads a lonely life, I should think."

"Poor young man! How sad it must be to have ill-health," said Grace; while I thought how lovely she looked with compassion in her sweet eyes.

In the afternoon we were all ready for anything that might turn up, and who should come to the sitting-room door but Phil, to know if we would like a ride. So we started. We chatted along together for a while, and then a deep voice chimed in the conversation.

The haughty little head beside me erected itself a trifle more haughtily. But I replied, for I liked the handsome, manly young fellow from the very first, and why was I to feel above him simply because he wore rough clothes and worked on a farm? Of course, it was different with Grace. We soon were engaged in an animated conversation. I felt no small degree of amazement at his versatile power of expression on any of the topics, some of which I acknowledged I mischievously touched upon to try him.

Before a great while Grace's hauteur vanished, and then it would have been hard to find three gayer, more joyous young people.

That night in our room Grace made the discovery that she had lost her comb, a pretty thing of pearl and tortoise-shell.

Digitized by Google

We saw a good deal of Philip after that first day, and Betsy looked on with a pleased though rather odd smile, I thought, as we came in time after time from frolics in the barn or fields, and she saw Phil leave us at the door.

It was three days after the race in which Grace lost her comb, when we were surprised to see that same pony trap roll through the farm-gate up to the door. Betsy brought a little package to our room, and it was explained.

It was the lost comb, and with it a note which ran thus :

"LADIES,—Excuse the liberty I take in addressing you. The inclosed comb was found by my man on Tuesday afternoon. As I met two young ladies this morning very near the place where it was found, I presumed it must belong to one of them. In conclusion, let me say that if at any time you would like to ramble through my grounds, you may do so with no fear of intrusion.—Yours respectfully,

"RALPH OGDEN."

We had often looked with longing eyes into the exquisitely laid out grounds, and so we made up our minds to avail ourselves of the permission just received.

"Ah!" thought I, "here is the romance I always expected would come to Grace. This young man will meet her, fall in love, get well, and so forth, and so forth."

And already I beheld my queen, robed in white, standing before the altar. I stopped there with a little internal laugh at my own folishness.

To return to my story. We started the next day, and, after a time, found ourselves walking through fairy-land. What a bewilderment of beauty each step revealed! Circles of many-hued flowers, with fountains playing in their fragrant midst. Here and there a laughing Flora or a gay Terpsichore, peeped in snowy marble from the background of vivid green. Finally, quite tired out with admiring, we seated ourselves on a tempting rustic seat.

"What a pity such a charming place hasn't more people to enjoy it? Mr. Ogden should have a wife. Don't you think so, Dot?"

I did not answer, but motioned Grace to be still, for, looking round, I had seen a pitiful sight. Behind the clump of trees near which we sat was swung a hammock very near the ground. In it lay Mr. Ogden. His right leg seemed to be in some kind of bandage, to which was attached a weight. I was again struck by his extreme pallor, and, even with his eyes closed—for he was asleep—by the expression of pain and suffering on his face.

By this time Grace had seen the reason of my motion, and we stood for a moment in silence, then turned and retraced our steps. It seemed very sad to us, buoyant with life and health, to see one with so much to enjoy marking the moments only by the pain they brought.

So the week passed, and Monday brought Mrs. Rogers back again.

I loved her at once as I saw how she took my darling in her arms, first held her off to admire her, and then kissed her again and again.

"And this is the Dot I have heard so much of? My dear, I feel as if I knew you already."

I noticed what a bright, merry twinkle the kind eyes had in them, and knew our good times had only begun. Of course, it soon was told how we had spent our time and all about everything. When I told her how very kind Phil had been, and how many pleasures we had enjoyed through him, Mrs. Rogers' face fairly beamed.

"There! I knew when I told Phil to see to you how well he would do it!"

It was not often I had seen Queen Grace blush, but as I glanced at her then, for some unaccountable reason, her face was rosy red to the little ear tips.

Then we told the incident of the comb. We found Mrs. Rogers was well acquainted with Mr. Ogden, and we learnt the cause of his isolation and delicate health.

He and his mother had been living in London the previous winter. They were all in all to each other, her husband being dead and he the only child. There broke out an awful fire in their house one cold, windy night, and all that human aid could do failed to check the fell destroyer. Wakened out of a deep sleep by the terrible cry of "Fire!" the son's first thought was of his mother. Springing from his bed, he rushed into the hall, only to be driven back by the mingled smoke and flame. Again he attempted to gain his mother's room, and succeeded. By that time a ladder was up to the window, and voices below clamoured for him to hasten, for his life was in danger.

With his now unconscious burden in his arms, he began to descend, when, with a great crash, and amid cries of horror, the ladder broke, and precipitated them to the ground below. Mrs. Ogden never wakened from her merciful unconsciousness, and for weeks her son lay between life and death.

"He will never have the use of his right leg," said Mrs. Rogers, as we sat listening with suspended breath, "although the doctors think after a time he will be able to walk without pain, with the aid of a crutch."

Now our hostess had returned, the time flew more rapidly than ever. She introduced us to the girls of the neighbourhood; sweet, modest country girls, with that innate refinement that stamps the lady in town or country.

We finally became acquainted with Mr. Ogden. Some time after we first met him Grace's aunt gave a garden-party. Mr. Ogden was invited, but of course we never thought for a moment he would come. There could not be much pleasure in such an affair to one in his delicate health.

So we thought, but he did come.

Grace looked more like a queen than ever; and as we sat together I noticed Mr. Ogden's eyes seemed to have a persistent habit of wandering our way.

I never did see so much enjoyment in anyone's face as shone in Mr. Ogden's as he watched the merry games in which Philip—not in his working suit to-day—and Grace were always leaders. I sat by him for a long while, doing my little best to entertain him, and being most splendidly entertained instead. He told me of his travels in sunny Italy and vine-clad France, and then of the stern beauties of the snow-capped peaks of Switzerland; and I, who had never been out of England, listened, if not "open-mouthed," very near it.

Never had I seen my calm Grace so wildly, fitfully gay as she was all that day; and I was startled that night to awake and hear her sobbing violently. Alarmed, I asked what was the matter. Then lying cheek to cheek in the darkness, Grace confessed to me that she had lost her heart.

"And, oh, Dot," she whispered, "I have something to tell you—no one knows it but auntie—I am betrothed, and not to the one I love. He was a cousin of my father's, and, of course, the same relation to auntie. When papa died, he made me promise solemnly that I would keep true to the agreement he made with the young man's father, that when their children grew up they should marry. He said he would die happier, knowing my future was secure, and I wouldn't be married for my fortune."

"Where is he, Grace?" I asked.

"He is abroad. I never saw him, Dot, for when he visited my father and stated his willingness to carry out his parent's wishes, I was at school."

"But, darling, if you don't love him, will you marry him?"

She turned wearily and kissed me.

"Dot, I never broke my word, and I never will."

It did not occur to me to ask Grace who it was she loved, for of course I knew. There was only one, in my eyes, who was noble enough in rank, wealth, and qualities of mind and heart to mate with my darling. Long after she had fallen asleep, I was conscious of a dull pain at my own heart. We had both of us seen a great deal of Mr. Ogden, and I had grown to find his friendship very sweet.

"Does being married change one's feelings for one's friends I wonder?" was my last thought as I, too, fell asleep.

Then came the climax to all the wonderful days of that wonderful summer. The following afternoon Mrs. Rogers came and told me that Mr. Ogden wanted to see me in the library.

Digitized by Google

"To see me? Are you sure it isn't Grace?" I asked.

"Quite sure," she answered; and I went down, speculating much in my mind what he could want of me. Before I quite got to the door I thought I knew.

He, too, wanted to make a confidante of me, and to tell me of his love for my friend.

Smiling to myself at the idea, I went in.

He stood awaiting me, leaning on his crutches.

"Oh, Mr. Ogden, don't stand!" I cried, and hastened to wheel an easy chair towards him.

A slight frown passed over his face.

"Miss Dot, indeed it causes me scarcely any pain to use my limb now; it is growing rapidly better."

But he sat down, and I took a seat near him. It was nearer than I should have supposed, for before I knew what was happening, I found myself drawn close to his side, and completely incircled by his arms. And these were the words I heard:

"Oh, my little darling! My precious little one! Don't you know how madly I love you?"

Aghast, I drew myself away, although it was bliss to stay there, for, oh, what I then felt never comes twice in a lifetime; and I knew it was love. Still, I drew myself away.

His beautiful, pale face flushed as he let me go, and said in an infinitely sad tone:

"Can it be possible that it wasn't love I have seen looking at me from those bonny brown eyes?"

Then I faltered out that I thought it was Grace he loved; and, as I spoke, an overwhelming sense of pain at the thought of what my darling had told me, and of the grief she must suffer, caused me to break down, and, hiding my face, burst into a passion of tears.

How he comforted me I cannot tell, but I was comforted; and whether it was disloyal or not, I couldn't help it. When he asked me again, I told him all he wanted to know—how I loved him, and him only, passionately, entirely.

I must have looked like a guilty thing when, after he had gone, I went into the room where Grace and her aunt were. Mrs. Rogers said, as I came in:

"Well, dear, are we to congratulate you or not?"

I stole a shamefaced look at Grace, and there she stood, dimpling and smiling at my confusion. With a sudden rush I sprang to her arms, and was clasped to her heart. I saw I had made a mistake, and it wasn't my Ralph whom she loved.

Afterwards I would have been as happy as a mortal could be if it hadn't been for Grace, who, after the first joy for me was over, became very quiet again.

Ralph took us all over my future home. (It didn't seem possible to imagine little me amid such magnificence.) In his room he showed me a sketch of a lovely face, and I knew directly who it was, for it was a copy of his own.

Mrs. Rogers had persisted in my being married from her house, and as Ralph wished it to be so soon, it was arranged that I was not to return to town until I was a bride. The day was drawing very near, and as I sat singing lightly over my sewing, Grace suddenly rushed into the room, and, handing me a letter, sank on the floor by my side all in a heap. It was from Mr. Leith (her betrothed), and he was coming to claim his promised bride that evening.

"Dot," she said, with her face hidden on my lap, "do you know who it is that I love?"

Now, since I knew it wasn't Ralph, I had often wondered who had won Grace's heart, and had made up my mind it must be someone in her fashionable town circle whom I had never met. My surprise may be imagined when, on replying that I didn't know, she said it was Philip.

"Queen Grace, you in love with a farmer boy!"

I did not intend to wound, but Grace sprang to her feet with flashing eyes.

"Dot, I am disappointed in you. Cannot a man be a farmer and a gentleman?"

Then the fury died out of her eyes, and she sank down again to her old position.

"Yes, it is Philip—noble Philip," with a loving intonation of the name, "and he loves me; but I am bound by my promise."

In the room in which we were was a deep recess, curtained away from the rest of the apartment by heavy damask draperies. Just then the curtains parted, and Philip sprang out. He darted to my side and raised my darling up in his strong arms.

"Ah, Grace, my own, I can carry on this cruel farce no longer. I, whom you have called Philip Port, am Philip Leith, and you are my promised bride."

My darling's dark eyes dilated as they looked up into his face for a moment, and the white lids closed.

It was the best thing that could have happened. I called Mrs. Rogers, and she comprehended things at a glance, and in our anxious ministrations to Grace we all became our natural selves again.

When Grace came to, everything was explained.

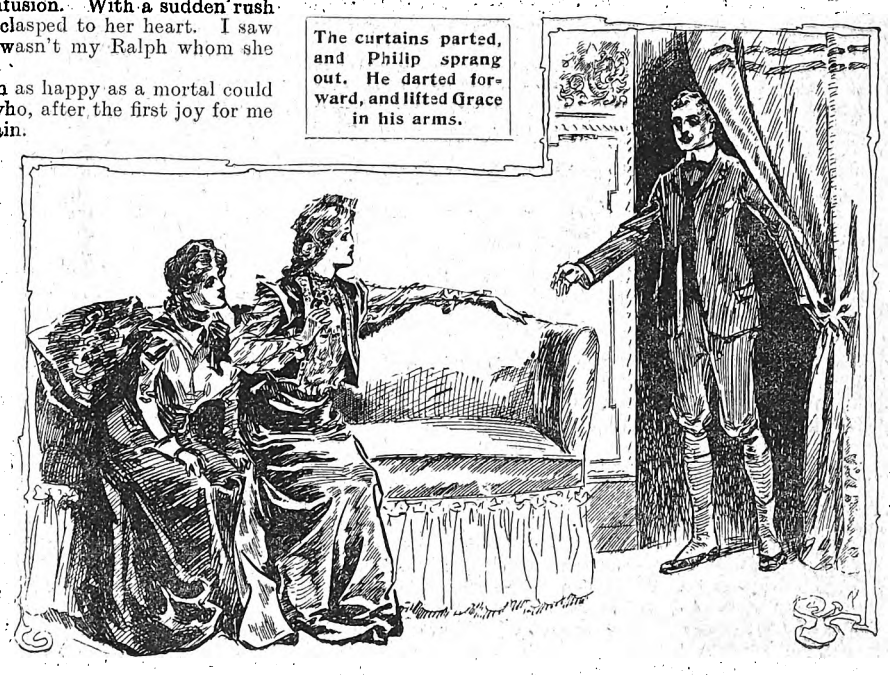
It was a plot arranged between Philip and Mrs. Rogers.

He did not wish to marry without love, and her invitation to us and the sudden call away were all a deep-laid conspiracy to bring the two together more effectually.

How it succeeded has been seen, and all I have to tell is that that wonderful summer in the country ended in two weddings, and four young people emerged from the rose-spectacled land of courtship into the broad sunshine of wedded bliss.

Philip and Grace built a beautiful home near us, and we are as inseparable as ever.

Lucy Jennings.



The curtains parted, and Philip sprang out. He darted forward, and lifted Grace in his arms.

Digitized by Google

A Game of Cross . . . . Purposes.

Telling of a Man's First and Only Love.

It is the old story I am about to tell; that story to which, thank Heaven! people never tire of listening, any more than we do of seeing the buds swell, and the leaves unfolding, and the world made young again by the coming of Spring—the story, to which as we listen our youth comes back, and once more the flowers bloom, and the skies are blue, and our hearts are beating joyously, and it is May.

I am not young now; nor is the day on which I am soberly writing this little record of a long past period, a balmy one of Spring, or anything like it. And yet May comes freshly back to me as I recall that day of which I am going to speak.

A lark was singing far up in the blue sky, a few sheep were pasturing in the green distance, and a tall figure, dressed in grey, with a gun on its arm, and one or two dogs frisking round it, was coming leisurely along the sea-wall. I had been fully intent, but the minute before, upon the sketch of the old boat I was making; but now I felt nothing but the beating of my heart, and saw nothing but Mark Sutherland coming, with his dogs playing round him.

The little picture was never finished, for at the instant that I became conscious of the advancing figure, I dropped my brush, and hopelessly ruined my canvas by a great smear of Vandyke-brown. It was never finished, no—but I have it still.

He was a long way off when I first saw him, and yet it seemed almost the next instant that he was standing beside me, speaking. My heart had not left off beating, and I could feel the colour hot in my face as I looked up, but my fiery little terrier took exception to his dogs, and flew at them with tumultuous disapproval, taking his attention off me for the moment.

When this little fracas was quieted, he put down his gun on the bank, made his retrievers lie beside it, and sat down himself by me.

"Have you had good sport?" I asked, by way of saying something—anything.

"No," he answered; "but I can't complain; I didn't expect any. I came out here because I thought I should see you, and I wanted to tell you a piece of news, and ask you a question."

"News is a precious commodity, indeed, in these wilds; but please remember my Scottish blood, in expecting an answer to the question."

He did not seem to be attending to what I said; he had taken up one of my brushes and was absently playing with it, but he threw it down the next minute, and said softly:

"Hester, I have got an appointment that I have been trying for, and I shall leave for Australia next month—there's my news."

My heart that had been beating so wildly seemed to stand suddenly still, and drop down—down. The water and the green marsh rocked, blended hazily into each other and the sky; and then a voice that sounded dim and far off, but was my own, too, said: "It is good news, I suppose."

"Good news! Well, yes, I hope so."

He stopped a minute here. His voice was a very deep one, for he was a big, full-chested man; but when he spoke again it had a soft undertone in it, that used to ring in my ears afterwards—it does now.

"I thought it good news this morning, for without it I could not think of a wife. That troubled me little enough till lately—till, ah! till I knew you, Hester. My dear, I think you have guessed my question."

Guessed it! Ah! yes. But my face was down upon my hands; he could not hear the cry that was stifling in my heart, and he went on gently, pitilessly:

"But I shall not get an answer to it. Well, then, Hester, will you marry me? Will you go with me to Australia?"

I did not answer—I could not. Ah! those who have had deliberately to kill their own happiness, to raise up themselves the barrier that shuts them out from hope, and love, and life, will know how hard it is—will pity me.

"Will you be my wife, and go with me to Australia?"

"I cannot." And no wonder he made a sudden movement of surprise, for I, myself, wondered to hear the hoarse passion of my own voice.

"You cannot! What a fool I have been, then. I thought—I hoped—Hester, is it possible that you have not known what I have been thinking of all this time?"

Known what he had been thinking about? Ah! the life, and light, and joy of those moments when I had dared to hope that I did. Ah! the anguish of feeling now that they had all been in vain!

"Look at me, Hester. I don't think I understand you, my dear," he said patiently and gently. "You say you cannot be my wife, and yet—tell me you cannot love me, and I am answered at once."

He put his arm over my shoulder as I leant forward, with my face buried in my lap, and whispered:

"I think you love me, Hester."

"Oh, I do, Mark, I do!" I cried, lifting my head; "but I cannot marry you—I shall have to give you up."

"Give me up, my dear love!" and he held me closer.

"I cannot go to Australia."

"Why not?" And he looked half-amazed, half-amused.

I could not bear the glance of his kind, dark eyes. I shrank away from his arm, and said:

"I canno' leave Milly."

Digitized by Google

To my own thinking, I had pronounced our doom now; but Mark Sutherland only laughed, and said:

"Well, then, you shall not; Miss Milly shall go, too."

"Ah! if that could only be; but Milly would die in Australia. We came back to England from Australia because the climate was killing her."

"And you will not leave her?"

"I promised mamma, before she died, that I never would; that if I married it should not separate us; that my home should be Milly's till she did not need it," I answered, faltering under something in the look of his face that was new to me. Up to this time I had been thinking of myself; now I was reminded that I was giving pain to him.

He was silent two or three minutes, looking away into the distance. He had taken his hand from my shoulder.

"Well, Hester," said he presently, gravely, not unkindly—but, ah! as it seemed to me, very coldly, "you have simply to choose between your sister and myself. You are the best judge of your sister's claims upon you; of my own, I will only say that I love you. I never thought nor cared much about women till I saw you, so I am not likely to change my liking or to forget it, and if you had married me—but I will not try and plead my cause against your sister's. It is for you to decide, and for me to abide by your decision."

I looked desperately up to the smiling, blue heavens, at the calm stream flowing on its tranquil path to the sea, and prayed, with a prayer so passionate that it seemed like a loud demand, that I might not be forced into slaying with my own hands the young happiness of my life.

"I cannot and will not do it," I said in my heart; yet, knowing the while that I could, and must Then Mark spoke again.

"Would you like a little time to consider the matter? I need not leave the Hollies till to-morrow evening, or, perhaps, the next day."

"No," I answered—with or without my own will, I never knew. "I know what I must do. I cannot leave Milly."

"And Milly cannot go. That decides it, then. Well, I have nothing to say; I am the last man in the world to try to persuade anyone against his judgment." He rose deliberately, but did not go, for I sat still. "Are you going home?" he asked, after a minute. "Hester, don't look so sad; you are feeling for me—don't do that. I should like to think of you when I am over the seas, as happy as I would have tried to have made you. Think of me sometimes as a friend. I don't expect to forget you, Hester. Good-bye."

His hand, as he held it out, shook over so slightly, but it held mine in a firm pressure for an instant. Then he let it drop, stooped and picked up his gun, whistled his dogs round him, and strode away again without once turning to look back.

Milly and I were orphans. Our father and mother had both died in Australia, and we were sent home to the care of our sole relation, my father's only sister, an elderly maiden lady, living in a kind of lady-like poverty at a dull little village in Hampshire. Aunt Maggie died when I was seventeen and Milly twelve, leaving to us the little cottage that had been her home and ours, with everything it contained; no very valuable bequest, but all the poor soul had to leave; and here Milly and I—not heiresses, no, but not destitute either—continued to live with the dear old servant, who had been our aunt's faithful friend and companion, and our own kind and affectionate nurse ever since, fatherless and motherless, we had returned from Australia.

There were not many people to visit at Wincham; the rector, the doctor, and the Sutherland family comprised them. I think we were most intimate at the Hollies; for the children there were Milly's contemporaries, and her sworn admirers and friends. I first saw Mark Sutherland at the Hollies; he was Mr. Sutherland's cousin, and I had heard of him often before I saw him. He had led a wild, adventurous kind of life, wandering all over the world for his simple pleasure, I suppose, since I never heard that he had any other object in doing so. I had formed my idea of him, to be sure; the reality was not in the least like it. No, quite otherwise; and yet, after the first five minutes, I would not have changed the real man for the ideal, for worlds.

Do not suppose that I speculated much upon Mark's character in these days; such as he was I loved him, dearly loved him; ah, he would never know how dearly, for had I not given him up?

As one in a dream I went home; as in a dream I crawled slowly up the steep, winding lawn to our cottage; saw Milly hanging on the garden-gate watching for me, come flying out on to the lawn to meet me, all her golden hair streaming straight out behind her, heard her call me, scold me for being late; my own voice answering her; saw and heard all the familiar sights and sounds of every-day life, as we do sometimes in dreams, all made strange and perplexing by some dreadful sense of pain and trouble.

"Hetty," said Milly, as we sat at tea, "you're not eating anything; you look pale and glum; you've sat out in the sun till it has made you ill. I shall not allow it to occur again, mind that."

It pleased Milly to play the elder sister, and I was always content that the little one should do what pleased her. She was my darling, the one thing that my solitary life gave me to love till I saw Mark; I had set up my idol long ago, but it was going to cost me dear.

I remember that the child was in more than usually high spirits on that evening, that she teased me to talk to her, sing to her, and finally flew up to bed in a childish fit of anger because I could do neither one nor the other.

At any other time I should have gone after her, coaxed and caressed her into good temper; but now, with a feeling of relief that she was gone, I sat at the window, staring out into the dark, scented night, and counted the cost of my sacrifice.

Long, long, I sat there; long after the moon had risen, had set, and the stars began to grow pale before that streak of grey light in the east.

I thought of Mark, of what I had done, of what I had given up, till I was nearly mad. I hope that I was mad, for when I stood up and closed the window before going up to my room, I had said to myself that I would write to Mark Sutherland when morning came, and tell him that I had chosen once more between the two I loved, and chosen differently. Therefore I hope that I was mad, but I went upstairs quite resolved and quiet; I undressed without even once glancing towards the bed where my little sister lay; I meant to lie down on my pillow without doing so; but oh! I could not say my prayers and yet leave Milly without the kiss I always gave her before I slept.

So I went up to the bed and looked down upon what had for years been my sole earthly treasure. The child looked pale in the cold, grey dawn; her golden hair was tossed wildly back from her face, and covered the pillow; and while I stood still and gazed, my madness dying away, my old self coming back, she stirred in her sleep; two great tears welled out from the closed eyes, and with a sob she murmured: "Hetty."

Digitized by Google

Then I knelt down in the grey dawning, and thanked God that my madness has passed, and prayed that as He had given me strength to make the sacrifice, so He would help me never to repent it.

I did not see Mark Sutherland again; but the next time Milly went up to the Hollies, she told me, on her return, "that he had left the Hollies, gone away to Australia, and was never coming back again." My heart echoed the words, but I drew Milly to me and kissed her, and tried to be patient and to forget.

I could not forget; my nature was tenacious of what it had once taken hold upon, and the course of our lives was too uniform and monotonous to permit change and variety to have their usual influence. I scarcely knew, after Mark went away, how the days and years glided by, their course was so unmarked, and everything seemed so unchanged. At first I used to shrink and shiver at the chance mention of Mark Sutherland's name at the Hollies; that passed, and I pined to hear of him with a weary, anxious longing seldom satisfied.

They ceased to speak of him after a while, as people do of a long absent friend, and by degrees it seemed as if he were only remembered in one poor woman's heart, who almost came to think of him, too, as if he had been removed by death. So that, when one day Milly came back from the Hollies, and said, as she untied her hat and threw it down: "Hester, guess; who in the world do you think came to the Hollies last night?" not even my thoughts suggested the right person.

"No, no," said Milly, as I named one or two; "no; who but that cousin Mark who went away to Australia years ago! I was a mere child at the time, but I remembered him instantly—a compliment he did not return, by-the-way; though when he heard who I was, he asked after you."

Years ago, was it, since Mark went away? No! as Milly spoke, it seemed only yesterday; the joy, the sorrow, the old pain, so freshly new, were throbbing so wildly once more at my heart. He had not quite forgotten me then; but did he remember me as I remembered him?

"I do believe you have forgotten all about him," Milly went on; "and, let me tell you, I wonder at that, for I remember he used to seem fond of talking to you, Hetty. and he is a kind of man that women may be proud of attracting, none the less because he cares very little, I should say, for women in general."

"Really, Milly, dear, you seem to have studied Mr. Sutherland very closely, considering this may be called your first acquaintance with him."

She laughed, blushed, and threw back her beautiful golden hair.

"No, I don't know that I have; he devoted himself to me a good deal this evening, and I couldn't help forming my opinion, you know. There is to be a croquet-party to-morrow at the Hollies, and Mr. Sutherland made me promise to come up, and to bring you, if you would come; but I told him beforehand that I knew you would not, knowing your dislike to that delectable means for the promotion of flirting."

And after this it happened that Milly went nearly every day up to the Hollies; while I, who had long ago ceased to care for any companionship beside my sister's, sat at home longing with a feverish longing to see Mark Sutherland once more, and yet dreading, with a sickening dread, to meet the careless, estranged glance of the dark eyes that had looked into mine once, full of love.

It seemed that Mark not infrequently accompanied Milly part of the way home, but he never came near enough to our cottage for me to catch even the most distant glimpse of him, and my little sister had somehow ceased to talk of him after the first. So, though I still knew he stayed at the Hollies, he might almost have been across the wide ocean, as far as I was concerned. And yet—oh, no!—the sense of his presence seemed borne to me upon every breath of the sweet summer air that floated into my room. I could not sleep at night, nor rest calmly by day; and often, while Milly was with her friends, I used to wander out, scarce heeding where I went, impatient only of rest.

One day, when this terrible yearning was strong upon me, I took my sketching materials from force of habit, and set out to walk to a pretty wood some distance away.

The cool, green fragrance of the leafy shadows was grateful after the glaring sunshine, and I sat down to rest where it felt coolest. But a sudden sound of laughter and merry voices close at hand startled me, and not waiting to see who the speakers were, I got up and fled swiftly down the darkest and most tangled of the paths that branched away into the heart of the wood.

I soon left the merry voices far behind me, and, slackening my walk, I wandered on, dreamy and absorbed as ever till, suddenly turning into another path, I saw what caused me to stand still and forget everything but what my eyes looked upon. Mark Sutherland! Yes, Mark, older, darker, thinner, but Mark himself. Ah, how the picture of a day that had passed, all floated before me as I saw the downward bend of his stately head to look into the face beside him—the face that looked up again into his with those candid eyes, and a smile on the soft, parted lips.

The smile seemed to reflect itself upon Mark's grave face for an instant, and then he took up a little hand lying on his arm, and kissed it tenderly.

I looked no longer. I crept away; stricken with a dumb anguish, a dreadful, sullen despair, I crept away and went home. For I knew the candid blue eyes, and the sweet smile, and the floating golden hair; and they were my sister Milly's.

Oh! Had I not done enough? Had I not sacrificed enough? Was my cup not yet so full but that this bitter drop must be added to its overflow?

So I cried in my anguish, and it was long before better thoughts came to me, or that, coming, I could hold them firmly and take comfort. But by-and-bye I rose up from where I had flung myself down, and sat by the window to watch for Milly. She came along presently in the quiet evening light, and I looked at her with eyes freshly opened. I had never yet ceased to think of her as a child; I realised in one minute now that the child was a woman. I looked at the beautiful, fresh, young face, and involuntarily glanced at the reflection of my own in the mirror opposite. I never could have been in my best days what Milly was; and now—I turned away with a sigh from the image of that faded woman, with pale lips and weary, dark eyes.

Milly came in the next instant, threw off her hat, and, coming up beside me, took my face between her two soft hands, looked into it tenderly for a minute, then kissed me, and sat down with her arms round me.

"Hetty, my dear, I have something to tell you," she began, with a strange tremble in her voice, though she was smiling, too; "a wonderful thing. I don't think you would ever guess it, or I should say 'Guess'!"

"And what if I am cleverer than you give me credit for, and do guess it, Milly, dear?" I asked, pressing the little one close to my throbbing heart.

Digitized by Google

"You never could; and yet—how your heart is beating!" she said, looking up at me timidly—"I believe you really know." Then, sinking her face down to my shoulder once more, she added, almost in a whisper: "Hester, he told me to ask you whether you would see him to-morrow?"

"'He' means Mr. Sutherland, of course!"

"Of course, Hester; do you mean to say yes?" asked Milly, stealing another of those timid glances at me.

"My 'yes' will go with yours, Milly, dear."

"God bless you, Hester!—my darling, my dear, dear sister," cried Milly fervently; and for a long while we were both silent. Nor, indeed, did she mention Mr. Sutherland's name again, nor return in any way to the subject, till about the middle of the next day, when she suddenly sprang up from her place by the window, and, glancing at me with a vivid blush and smile, ran out of the room, and I heard her fly upstairs.

Then I knew who was coming, and I sat still, because to move would have been out of my power. So, when he entered the room, I sat, and though I held out my hand and tried to utter a greeting, I knew that my lips only murmured inarticulately. He looked at me as he held my hand in a momentary grasp, and I thought there were both pain and a shocked surprise in his face—then he began:

"I have not come unexpectedly, I hope? Milly promised to ask you—to tell you——"

"She did tell me; I expected you," I strove to say, and, I hope, said it quietly.

"Did you guess why I wanted to see you?" he asked, with that directness of speech I remembered so well.

"Yes, I even went so far as that," I answered, and smiled. Oh! what a wintry smile, if it did not belie my heart.

"Of course, I could only have one purpose in asking to see you again," he went on quickly—"but, ah! Hester, what will you say to me this time?"

"What does Milly say?"

"Milly, always Milly still! But, Hester, it is for you to answer me first," he said; and abruptly walking from his position on the hearth, he came and sat down by me.

"Hester—I must call you so—did your sister tell you what I said to her yesterday?"

"She let me infer it."

"Infer—how absurd. Nothing like plain speaking to express a plain meaning," he broke out, rather impetuously. "But you are so cold and unlike your old self, Hester, that I could almost take it for an answer to what I came to ask. Did Milly tell you that yesterday—for I have grown to love the little girl dearly—Hester! Hester! What have I said? What is the matter?"

I hated, despised myself for the weakness, but the mortal struggle of yesterday was not done yet. I could not hear this man, whom I had loved so long, so deeply, avow to my face his transferred affection to my sister, and be unmoved. Involuntarily I grasped the arm of my chair for support, for my very life seemed fading from me in the struggle. He bent over me, he lifted my faint head on to his broad breast, but I shrank from him feebly.

"It is nothing. I am often faint. I am quite well again. You were saying—yes, go on, Mr. Sutherland."

"I was saying—ah! Hester—I think I need not go on—you are so changed, my dear," he said, looking down at me with sorrowful perplexity. "Well, well, Milly led me on to hope; but I ought to have known better. You never cared for me in the beginning, as I did for you."

"Surely, surely, that bygone ought to be a bygone now!" I cried out bitterly.

"If you say that, it ought indeed," he answered, turning from me; "but I told you then, Hester, that I should never forget you; and from something Milly said, and your remaining unmarried, I was wild enough to dream—to hope——".

Something—a light that dazzled my poor eyes—was breaking in upon me as he spoke.

"Mark!" said I, "what did you come here to-day to ask me?"

"The same question that I asked eight years ago, Hester. I have done with Australia; I am no longer a poor man, and I want the woman I always loved. Hester, is this really true? Is she to be mine at last?"

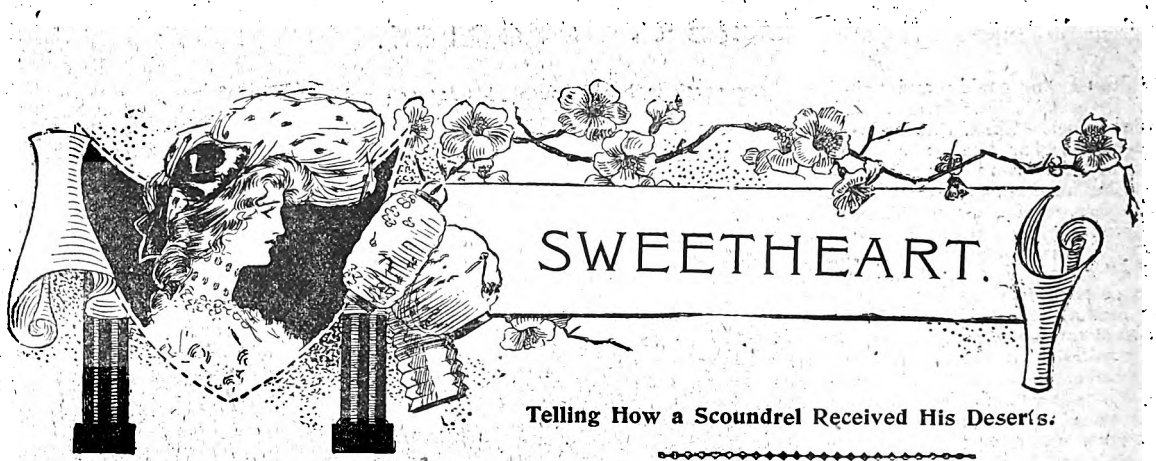
For a long, long time, I think, after this, we forgot the existence of anyone else beside ourselves. Then I told Mark the little game of cross-purposes we had been playing. His incredulous wonder that I could imagine he had ever thought of anyone but me, touched me to the heart.

"Poor Milly," he said; "so you would have put her off with the reversion of a heart. No, when she marries, may she be what you are, Hester—her husband's 'first love and his last.'"

Hilda Campbell.

A STATEMENT OF GREAT IMPORTANCE TO YOU IS MADE ON PAGE 751.

Digitized by Google



SWEETHEART.

Telling How a Scoundrel Received His Deserts.

"SWEETHEART!"

There was no reply. Burly, broad-shouldered John Percival turned to his newly-wedded second wife with a smile.

"We are a little early," he said, "and she is probably smartening herself up for your benefit, dear."

Mrs. Percival smiled in return. She was a pretty, bright-faced girl of little more than twenty with whom John Percival had fallen in love, and whom he had, in his sturdy, impressive fashion, wooed, proposed to, married, and all in six weeks. The deed was characteristic of the man. Yorkshire to the backbone, though a Londoner by choice of residence, he did not hold with hesitation. So when he met Helen Meredith he said to himself: "That is my future wife," and perhaps his bluff and yet courtly persistence somewhat precipitated matters. He would not take "No" for an answer, and Helen, perforce, dominated by his stronger will, said "Yes" almost before she had made up her mind. So they were married.

"Sweetheart!" cried John Percival again.

"Coming, daddy dear!" was the reply, and down the stairs of The Grange came a girl who to Helen Percival seemed a vision of beauty. She felt she had never seen so lovely a child. And yet "Sweetheart" was eighteen. A slim, slender form, a perfect face, set in a cloud of golden hair, two pretty hands held out in welcome to the newcomer, and yet withal a queenly dignity of carriage that added a charm to the picture.

Helen Percival ran to the foot of the staircase and clasped the hands held out to her.

"You lovely child!" she exclaimed. John Percival gave a big sigh of relief. He had been wondering how "Sweetheart" would accept her new mother. One glance at her face dispelled all his doubts and fears in an instant. Helen Percival was pressing her lips to the rosy cheek, flushed with happiness and anticipation.

"You pretty child!" she murmured. "I had been afraid of meeting you, dear. How foolish of me! Why, we are more like sisters. And yet you are so little and dainty. You are like a bit of Dresden china."

Sweetheart laughed—such a musical ripple of merriment.

"Oh, mother!" was all she said. But the words and the tone brought the tears to Helen Percival's eyes.

"Daddy! She is so pretty, she made me nearly forget you!" And in another moment Sweetheart was clasped in John Percival's arms, clinging to him, kissing his cheeks, his brown beard, his resolute mouth in an ecstasy of gladness.

"Oh, Daddy, how could I?" she said, with a half-tearful smile at her new mother. It was a happier homecoming than any one of the three had dreamt of.

* * * * * * *

Sweetheart's mother had died when she was a year old, and her father had remained a widower for seventeen years. To tell the truth, he had never once met with anyone to put in his dead wife's place until Fate brought him Helen Meredith. Without even consulting the daughter, who was the light of his life, he married Helen Meredith. And his heart beat with an unspeakable joy when he found that his daughter and his newly-wedded wife were attractive to each other. He had, of course, written to Sweetheart to tell her of his marriage, but circumstances had prevented any previous introduction. John Percival met Helen Meredith abroad, his business would not allow of his return home even for a couple of days until its conclusion. Hence the strange meeting.

But John Percival was content. His beloved daughter and his beautiful second wife, the two dearest in the world to him, were friends.

During the next month even more could be said. Sweetheart and her new mother were almost inseparable. The former honestly loved Helen, and the latter both loved and admired her new daughter.

"I can't understand you not ever having had a lover," said Sweetheart's mother one day.

"But ——," began Sweetheart, and then she paused with a blush that made her look prettier than ever. The touch of colour did not go unobserved by Helen. She had been desirous, eager even, of winning her daughter's confidence as she had won her love—that was assured, and this was an opening.

"Ah!" said Helen Percival, gently, "then there is someone?"

"Mother, I dare not tell you," cried Sweetheart. "Oh, it is all so like a dream!"

The girl, though but a few years younger than the woman to whom she spoke, dropped on her knees beside her, and hid her cheeks in the shelter of the ready arms that crept about her slight form.

"Sweetheart, dear, tell me when you will. I shall not play the part of stepmother-dragoness, I promise you faithfully, if he is worthy of you."

Sweetheart clung to her even yet more closely and tenderly.

"I think," she said, with tears in her voice, "you must be my own mother come back to earth, only much younger!"

Helen Percival's heart beat with affection for the girl who spoke to her so lovingly. To be loved was to her a new, strange thing. Her own childhood had been spent among strangers, and had been loveless, almost comfortless. And now she had dropped from those clouds—the dingy surroundings of a cheerless garrison town in Kent—into this dear sunshine—a husband's devotion and a daughter's love, and the confidence she knew would come.

She laid her arms yet more closely round Sweetheart, and kissed her upturned mouth.

"Tell me when you like, dearie," she said softly. "I only want you to feel you can trust me."

Sweetheart's only reply was a long sigh of content.

* * * * * * *

The new Mrs. Percival soon became very popular in Westhampton circles. And this was all the more strange, because Westhampton was rather apt to look askance upon a newcomer into their midst to whom they had not been properly introduced, and who had not entered their "social pale" without first having given evidence of the very highest credentials. This is the way of some small country towns; but in the case of Westhampton Helen Percival carried all before her. Before they met her, Westhampton "society" thought "Who is she?" After it was "How charming she is," and John Percival noted with deep pride the success his pretty wife was making, and his heart filled with honest devotion to her. But the sweetest thing in his life was the thought that his daughter and his wife were so closely linked.

Digitized by Google

"I have two sweethearts now," he went on to say, with a big, cheery laugh.

"Wait until Captain Dale comes back!" one day said a mutual friend at whose house John Percival had called in order to accompany his wife and daughter home.

"What do you mean, Mrs. Drew?" questioned Helen Percival. But a glance was sufficient to show her a certain tell-tale colour on Sweetheart's face, and she said no more.

"Wait and see, Mrs. Percival," said her hostess, with a smile at Sweetheart.

"Captain Dale is a very good fellow," exclaimed John Percival stoutly. Sweetheart glanced shyly at her father, and Helen, watching her, guessed. This Captain Dale was the "someone."

"He is coming back next week," pursued Mrs. Drew; "and without doubt will call on you, dear Mrs. Percival."

There was a hidden meaning in this remark which Helen Percival was ready to notice.

"If he is a friend of my husband's, he will be most welcome," she said. And Mrs. Drew felt somehow that she had been snubbed, though how she could not have said for the life of her. But Helen Percival was, to use rather a common phrase, "taken aback"; she had spoken in haste, with a strange whirl of memories throbbing in her brain. The name Dale was so familiar. And Captain Dale, too! She was not sorry when it was time to go home. Could there be two of them?

"Who is this Captain Dale?" she asked her husband later on. John Percival laughed.

"Oh, a good sort!" he said; "has been a bit rackety, like most soldiers, but will settle down when he's once married and done for. He's very much in love with Sweetheart, and——"

"And you like him?" questioned Helen.

"Yes, I do," answered bluff John; "though he's not the sort of man I should have thought our Sweetheart would have been attracted by. All heart and no——"

But he broke off short here. Helen Percival had sunk into a chair, half fainting. Captain Dale was forgotten in a moment. John rang the bell for Helen's maid, fussed over Helen, until he made her worse, and finally left her lying down in her own room, with Sweetheart in attendance, and went into his own den to smoke.

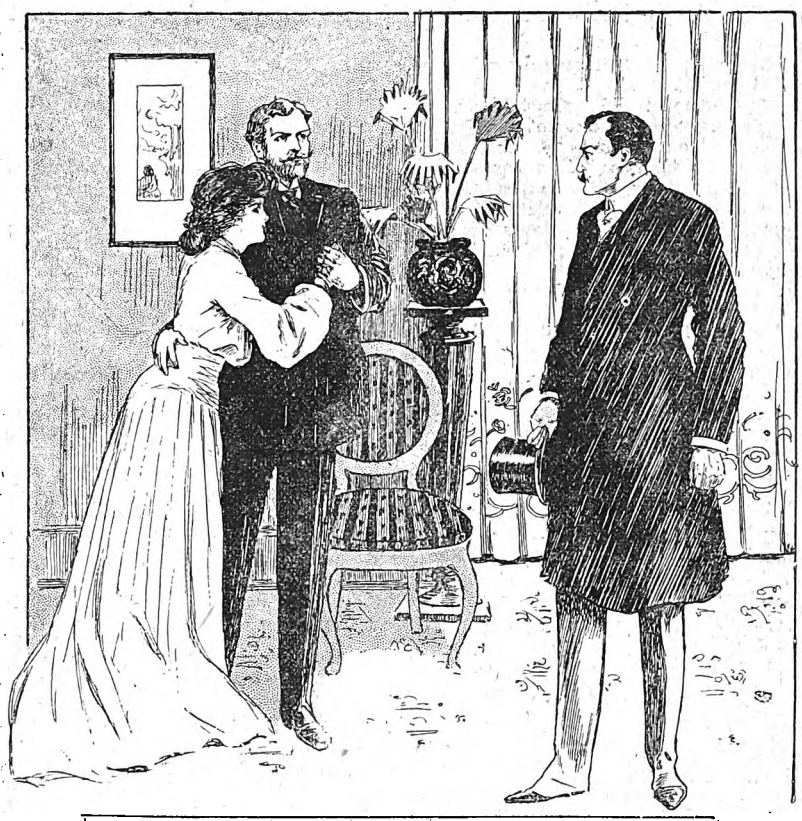
"It is the same man—it is the same man!"

So ran Helen Percival's thoughts, and when she questioned Sweetheart a little she knew she was right. There was but one Captain Dale.

"And you care for him?"

"Indeed I do, mother," was Sweetheart's reply. But she could not understand why Helen sighed.

"I shall be so glad to see him," she murmured. "Now go, Sweetheart. I am better now and I am going to lie down for an hour and sleep."



Helen Percival turned to her husband, whose arms were about her waist in a moment.

Sweetheart kissed her stepmother tenderly and went. But sleep would not be wooed. That same strange phrase kept Helen Percival awake.

"It is the same man—the same man!"

* * * * * * *

It was then that Helen Percival made her great mistake. If she had only told her husband all, it would have saved the three people much pain and heartache. But after long deliberation she resolved to wait, and trust to chance. And when, some ten days later, she came face to face with Captain Dale, she knew she had done wrong. But then it was too late.

She took his hand in hers without the least sign of recognition of him, and, in the usual polite phrases, made him welcome. It would be very hard to say which was the greater, her perplexity or his astonishment. But he took the cue from her, and was quick enough to assume an imperturbability which he was very far from feeling. Sweetheart noticed nothing. It was her mother's "at home" day and there were many other visitors to be talked to.

"I must see you alone," said Horace Dale, in a whisper, looking round him cautiously.

"There is not the least necessity."

Helen Percival drew herself up proudly.

"But——"

"Excuse me, but I see my husband beckoning me!" And Helen moved away with a bow.

Captain Dale looked after her with an unpleasant expression on his usually handsome face.

"I wonder if she has told. If she has, it will spoil everything. She will set the girl against me, and I shall lose old Percival's money."

Digitized by Google

And Captain Horace Dale muttered a not very polite expletive between his teeth.

"What's wrong?" inquired a voice by his side.

"Hullo, Vernon."

"Just come in. I hear Mrs. Percival is——"

"Yes, very pretty, but not my style," said Captain Dale; and turned on his heel. Frank Vernon stared at him for a moment, and then broke into a quiet laugh.

"I always knew you were a cad, Dale," he said to himself, "and not fit to black Miss Percival's shoes; and now I think so more than ever, and she loves him; won't throw a word at me, and I worship the very ground she walks on. This is a miserable world!"

Poor Frank Vernon! Until Captain Dale had come along, Sweetheart Percival had smiled on him, accepted his roses and violets, and had lifted him into the seventh heaven of delight by preferring him to all her other admirers, and Frank had simply fallen headlong in love with her fresh, sweet beauty, and had flattered himself that one day he might—— Then came Horace Dale, and all in a moment every castle Frank had built was shattered. Poor Frank!

"Confound him!" he muttered; "he's so good-looking—no wonder she prefers him to a plain, ordinary outsider like me!"

* * * * *

That afternoon was a sort of dream to Helen Percival. She scarcely knew how she got through it. To meet Horace Dale again, like this; the man she had once been engaged to. How bitterly she regretted not having told her husband! And now the man she had been affianced to was in love with her own step-daughter!

Captain Horace Dale was scarcely more happy.

"Will she tell?" he kept thinking. But it was not of the engagement he was thinking, but of the reason why Helen Meredith had broken it off. And when he thought of this, Horace Dale felt like going into a rage of fury and desperation.

"I must see her, and find out what she means to do. If she tells all, it means ruin for me, and—Sweetheart will——"

In vain he stamped up and down his room, trying to think what to do. He did not know what Helen meant to do or say! And to add to his misery, which, let me say, he fully deserved, he went down to his club one night, and, in a reckless mood, lost considerably more than he was able to pay at baccarat. The money he contrived to raise the next day, somehow, but it did not increase his good temper to have to pay it. He reviled his ill-luck, and tried to forget. But he could not.

And Sweetheart? She, too, was unhappy. Helen did not like her lover, and would not talk to her about his perfections, his charming manner and his handsome face. There had come a cloud between Sweetheart and her "mother," and Horace Dale had brought it. And the cloud grew and grew until even John Percival noticed it. He, little dreaming of the cause, bantered both in his bluff way, until one day Sweetheart ran off to her own room in tears, and so astonished him, that he felt almost angry with Helen. And thence grew a certain restraint between husband and wife, which made the former uncomfortable, and the latter very unhappy. And Captain Horace Dale was to blame for it all.

But Nemesis was only waiting. Her opportunity came when Captain Dale's did. He had striven to gain a few minutes alone with Helen Percival in order to find out her intentions. Did she mean to betray him? Fate gave him this opportunity in due course. He called one afternoon, and found Helen alone.

"I have been waiting for this," he said, after the usual formal greeting. "What do you intend to do, Helen?"

"My name is Mrs. Percival, if you please, Captain Dale," replied Helen, with ever so slight an accent upon Horace Dale's title. He winced—because he knew what it meant.

"Is it to be war or peace between us?" he went on. "No, do not speak for a moment. Hear me first!"

Helen sat down with a face as expressionless as that of a statue of stone.

"What do you intend to do? You know how I love Sweetheart; and I think she cares for me. Do you mean to come between us or not? If the former, then I shall know what to do. If the latter, I can return you something you might not care for your husband to see."

Helen Percival half rose from her seat.

"What is that?" she demanded.

"I thought," cried Horace Dale, "that I had something interesting to tell you when we were alone. Don't you remember certain letters written by you to me, long ago?"

"Schoolgirl epistles like those!"

"And," said Horace Dale, "all undated!"

"And I thought you were a man of honour when I wrote them. I thought I loved you."

"Yes, and you threw me over!"

"You know why"—coldly.

"Yes, but your husband won't when he reads them. He will believe that it was because he was a richer man than I was."

Helen Percival drew herself up to her full height.

"Tell him," she exclaimed, "and I will tell him what and who you are, Captain Dale." Again the accent made him wince, but he hid it with a forced laugh.

"Well, is it war or peace? Help me to win Sweetheart, and I return you these." He took a packet of letters from his breast as he spoke. "Set her against me, and I hand these to your husband."

"Who prefers to take them on the spot, please!" said a deep voice.

John Percival stood in the doorway.

"I have only heard the last few words of this most interesting interview. Will you kindly explain matters to me a little more fully?"

Helen Percival turned to her husband, whose arm was about her waist in a moment.

"Now, then, sir; will you speak first, or shall my wife?" Then Horace Dale knew that he had played and lost. He opened his mouth to speak but the words refused to come.

"Let me speak, John," implored Helen Percival; "oh, if only I had told you long ago! When I was a girl of sixteen, this man fascinated me. I thought him a hero, a man of honour. I wrote him foolish letters, the love letters of a silly girl."

"Go on."

"He threatens that unless I aid him in his wooing of Sweetheart, to show the letters to you. I was engaged to him, when quite by chance I found out what he really was, a gambler and a cheat. How could I dare to help his suit with Sweetheart, knowing this?"

"It is not true!" said Dale.

"It is the truth! Look at him. He dare not deny that he was turned out of his regiment for cheating at cards. He was compelled by his colonel to send in his resignation."

"Oh!"

It was a strange cry, the wail of a wounded animal, and it came from the anteroom.

John Percival turned and threw back the curtains. Sweetheart Percival lay, like a stricken thing, upon the floor, with her curly head buried in the cushions of an armchair.

Helen slipped out of her husband's arms, and ran to her, drew her to her arms, and held her like a child to her bosom. With womanly instinct she divined what had happened. Sweetheart had overheard all the truth.

John Percival let the curtain fall to hide the scene. Then he turned to Horace Dale.

"Do you see that, you cur?" he said, in a tense whisper; "that's your handiwork! Are you not proud of it? Now give me those letters and go."

The ex-captain handed him the packet.

"Now go, and never let me set eyes on your face again! Proof!—I want no proof of your villainy. I can see it in your face."

And Horace Dale went—for ever. Strange to say, he met Frank Vernon on the doorstep as he left the house, a circumstance which, when he heard of a certain event long after—which he did by glancing at an English paper in a distant land—seemed almost prophetic

Clifton Bingham

Digitized by Google

GOOD FOR EVIL.

Telling of a Secret Marriage and of the Events That Followed.

"Be my wife, Norma; do not let us wait on and on for ever, with no hope of your aunt's consent. She has no legal right to control you anyway, as you are twenty-one. Let us go over to the next town and be quietly married. I have a special license. For my uncle has sent for me to come to him; and as he is all alone in the world, I cannot refuse to remain with him for the last few months—it may be even less—that he will be spared. But I shrink from going away, Norma, and leaving you al one to the tender mercies of Mrs. Kavanagh. She is your dead father's only sister, but she treats you as she would not dare to treat a servant. Marry me, Norma, and, come what may, at least your bondage will be ended."

Richard Travers stooped and kissed the pale cheek of the fair, blue-eyed girl at his side.

She tried to smile, but the sweet lips would not be forced into such an exhibition, and instead she broke down and sobbed upon his breast.

"Oh, Dick! Dick! How can I let you go?" she cried. "For you are all the sunshine in my life! Aunt Emma is a real tyrant over me, and Lena is worse. And, Dick, I am afraid—I suspect that Lena likes you a little!"

His handsome face flushed, but he laughed lightly. Ah, Richard Travers knew more than he chose to tell! For Lena Kavanagh had acknowledged her affection for him only the night before, and he had told her gently but firmly that he did not care for her; that there was but one woman in this world for whom he cared, and that was her cousin, Norma Andrews.

And Dick had not forgotten the baleful look in Lena's big black eyes as he made this imprudent confession.

Perhaps this was secretly the real reason why he urged Norma to marry him before he went away, though they must keep the marriage a secret until he should return to claim her.

It was not a difficult task to convince Norma, and at last she gave him he promise. The next day he obtained permission to take Norma out for a drive, and they drove to a neighbouring town, where a clergyman Dick knew was awaiting them to perform the ceremony.

And so, when Dick Travers drove back to the old Kavanagh house, it was his wife who sat at his side in the trap—his own little wife!

He kissed the sweet red lips as he lifted her from the vehicle.

"God bless my wife!" he whispered softly.

Nobody suspected what had taken place.

Dick left the following day for a neighbouring city to remain with his dying relative, a rich old bachelor.

Hardly a week had elapsed, when Mrs. Kavanagh pompously announced that old Travers had expressed a desire to see Lena once more before he died. The Kavanaghs and the Travers were remotely connected by marriage.

"I shall send her over at once," said Lena's mother.

So Lena went, and the days drifted by and grew into weeks; still she did not return.

"Old Travers is getting better since Lena's arrival!" Mrs. Kavanagh exclaimed.

But one thing troubled poor Norma sorely. Letters from Dick Travers—her husband—had ceased to arrive, and although she wrote regularly, her letters failed to elicit a response. And none of the correspondence between them had contained the slightest reference to the secret marriage.

Norma would have had trouble in proving the fact, had she wished to do so, for Dick had taken possession of the certificate of marriage, and the clergyman who had performed the ceremony had gone away to parts unknown.

Time passed, and at last the blow fell upon poor Norma. One morning Mrs. Kavanagh received a letter from her daughter which seemed to cause her great satisfaction and delight.

"Well, Lena has done well," she cried, eagerly. "She has married Richard Travers, and, of course, all the Travers fortune will be hers now. It is true I do not fancy her marrying away from home, but under the circumstances I can forgive her anything! Lena is a dear girl, and beautiful, too," added the fond mother complacently, "and she deserves to do well. I shall go to visit her in a short time. She invites me cordially, and says I must forgive her for her hasty marriage. I am only too pleased to hear of her good fortune."

To Mrs. Kavanagh's surprise and disgust, Norma rose and left the room in silence. Mrs. Kavanagh tossed her head.

"Umph! Spiteful thing! She is jealous. But Norma Andrews was never like other girls. I am glad dear Lena is not like her in any way!"

Mrs. Kavanagh was somewhat startled when her niece made her appearance the next day and demanded money with which to take a short journey. Mrs. Kavanagh lifted her hands in horror.

"Where are you going? And what earthly business can you have running about the country all alone? Private business? You? I don't believe that you have any at all!"

"I am going, all the same, Aunt Emma," returned the clear, cold voice, "and you shall defray my travelling expenses. My father left money in your hands for me, and I know it."

Mrs. Kavanagh fell back, pale to the very lips, her eyes full of a wild terror, which convinced Norma that her random shot had told, and that it was as she had long suspected. She had not been left in Mrs. Kavanagh's care destitute.

"I merely ask enough of my own money to pay my own way to Dayton," the girl went on firmly.

"Dayton! In the name of goodness what takes you there?"

Norma's pale face grew a shade paler.

"That is my affair," she answered quietly.

So Norma set out on her dreary journey to Dayton—to her false husband.

"He could not marry Lena Kavanagh while I am his wife," the poor girl murmured as the train sped along.

She reached Dayton at last, and went straight to the handsome home of Dick Travers' uncle. Ringing the bell, she was shown into a drawing-room, into the presence of Lena and old Mr. Travers, who lay upon a sofa, and—yes, Dick Travers himself. He started to his feet with a cry of joy.

"Norma, my darling!" he cried, kissing her before the others. "What has been the matter? I have not heard a word from you for weeks, and I was half mad with anxiety, and was on the point of going back to you, but my uncle had another attack, and——"

"Dick, tell me what it all means?" she whispered. "Aunt Kavanagh says that Lena is married to—to——"

"Uncle Richard Travers. Yes, my darling," he added in an undertone. "She did that so that she might claim the Travers' fortune, and prevent you and me from inheriting it; and she did not know until just now, when Uncle Richard was telling her, that he had already made me his heir, and the fortune is mine and yours, my loved one."

Norma was speedily presented to the old man, and, save for Lena's sulkiness over the downfall of her mad scheme, all were contented and happy.

The old man did not long survive. His property reverted to his nephew, but Dick and Norma generously shared it with the Kavanaghs, although they did not deserve it.

"Evil for evil is beast-like, evil for good is demon-like, but good for evil is Christ-like."

E. Burke Collins.

Digitized by Google

NURSE GRAY'S ORDEAL.

Relating how a Sinner was Saved.

"WHAT do you think of the case, doctor?" asked Roger Cleveland, walking with short, quick strides about the room.

"It is serious—there is no disguising that, but not alarming," returned old Dr. Mallin gravely. "At least not yet," he corrected. "I must confess that this continuation of listlessness and irritability is not a reassuring symptom, but I fancy that we shall get over that. I am, however, of opinion that your wife should have a night nurse as well as a day nurse."

"You mean that she requires constant attention during the night as well as during the day; that it is not sufficient for the day nurse to sleep close at hand during the night?" asked Cleveland, with a swift glance at the medico.

"That is just it!" declared the doctor. "I find that Nurse Downes is being worn out; and, moreover, your wife appears occasionally to be worse in the morning. I attribute this last circumstance to the fact that the nurse is unable to wait on her as much as she ought to. No, I am confident that we must have another nurse, and I think I have exactly the one to suit the position!"

He was a well-meaning old gentleman, was Dr. Mallin; one of those diffident individuals who scarcely ever say a thing confidently, but introduce it by "I think." Yet he was a fairly clever man, and was looked up to in his profession.

Roger Cleveland stopped in his peregrinations across the carpet, and cast a sharp glance at the doctor, who, however, was staring at the carpet in thought. Cleveland swung on his heel and stared out of the window. There was a silence for nearly three minutes, when Dr. Mallin said: "I suppose you have no objection?"

"Objection?" echoed Cleveland with a start. "No, of course, I haven't!" he went on more composedly. "Please do anything and everything to restore dear Adela to health, and you will earn my eternal gratitude, Dr. Mallin! This long-drawn illness is making me a martyr to nerves! And you think that you have found a suitable nurse? Who is she? If I may speak plainly, doctor, I think that the present nurse is not so patient and forbearing as—she might be. And if you have to bring another into the house, it should be some meek creature——"

"I know, I know!" interrupted Dr. Mallin. "I think that the present nurse will do for daylight, and I can bring, I think, one of the sweetest creatures in the world to act as night nurse. I'll see to it at once, and, if possible, have her here to-night. Then we'll hope for better things!"

The medical gentleman took his leave a moment later, and, as soon as he had completed his round of visits, he sent a note to a nursing home; the letter was addressed to the matron, who, after perusing it, sent a message to Nurse Gray.

The nurse in question quickly reported herself in the matron's room. She was a young woman of three-and-twenty, with a slight, graceful figure, and a face that was grave for it's owner's years. It was not sad by any means, although there were traces of suffering; and those who knew Nurse Gray were aware that she could be very animated and mirthful. A superior woman, and one to be trusted, was the verdict of most people who came in contact with her.

"Lucy," said the matron, addressing her familiarly, "I have a note from Dr. Mallin; he wants a night attendant and asks me to send you if it is in any way possible. It is fortunate that I can spare you, for I always like to help old Dr. Mallin. It is to take charge of a sick woman, Mrs. Cleveland, and it may be a matter of some weeks. He wants you to take up the duties this evening; it is out Sydenham way."

"Very well," returned Nurse Gray, with a smile that transformed her grave countenance into a vision of loveliness. "Dr. Mallin is a good old gentleman, and I shall be pleased to go. I am glad that he shows such confidence in me!"

"That's right!" remarked the matron approvingly. "Let me see, you will——" And then they drifted into details which are of no interest to us.

The footman who opened the door to Dr. Mallin and Nurse Gray that evening told his fellow servants that the latter was the very ideal of a woman intended by Nature to help the sick and suffering; at least, that is what he meant, although he used different language. The doctor escorted his companion to the room adjoining that in which his patient lay, where she was introduced to the other attendant, and to Mr. Cleveland's housekeeper.

Dr. Mallin had some final instructions to give, and Lucy Gray had to be shown her room by the housekeeper, but in half-an-hour the two nurses were comparing notes, and Lucy was waiting to be introduced to Mrs. Cleveland before going on duty. The patient was asleep, and it was not wise that a new-comer should meet her gaze without preparation.

"I am afraid you will find her rather tiresome, dear!" observed Nurse Downes commiseratingly. "I have had a rare time of it, and I am thankful to get some relief. No, I can't say she is very ill, but she doesn't mend, and that is what is puzzling Dr. Mallin. I expect that he will want to consult another practitioner shortly. Mr. Cleveland is a nice man, and pays every attention to his wife."

"You look tired!" said Lucy Gray sympathetically. "I wish she would wake up, so that you could introduce me; then you could go to bed."

"Nurse!"

The voice came faintly from the adjoining room, and its tone was peevish. The call was followed by the tinkling of a small bell, which Nurse Gray rightly conjectured to be the signal usually employed by the invalid. The costumed attendants entered the room quietly.

"Oh, there you are!" said the invalid in the same irritable tone. "You sleep so soundly at night; I am sure I might die before you would hear!"

Nurse Downes soothed her skilfully, and then continued: "You will not have to call loudly again, for Dr. Mallin has engaged a night nurse, and she is here, waiting to see you. I am sure you will like her! Everyone does!"

Nurse Gray stepped silently forward, a compassionate smile on her lips

Digitized by Google

"You must let me do that for you, Mrs. Cleveland," she said gently, stepping forward quickly as Downes was about to raise the pillow a little, and performing the task with the utmost gentleness. "That is better, isn't it?"

"I don't know!" was the reply, uttered in that grudging style common to invalids who recognise a fact but do not like to admit its truth. "Give me something to drink, nurse!"

Lucy Gray motioned to the day nurse to retire, which Downes did very willingly, and then she assumed the duties in the most matter-of-fact fashion. Mrs. Cleveland made no demur; she was already beginning to like Nurse Gray. Shortly afterwards, the invalid fell into another uneasy sleep and Lucy prepared to keep vigil through the long night.

Mrs. Cleveland awakened several times during the next two hours, but Nurse Gray soothed her; there was something so refreshing, so tranquillising, in Nurse Gray's presence and touch!

"I think I shall like you," observed Mrs. Cleveland, as she closed her eyes and tried to settle into a good sleep. This was just before midnight. "You are better than Nurse Downes!"

"I am sure I shall like waiting on you!" said Nurse Gray decisively. And indeed it was true, for Lucy had taken quite a fancy to this simple woman, whose nature she quickly judged to be confiding and gentle.

"I am sure that she must be a dear little wife to her husband!" thought Nurse Gray, gazing at her sleeping patient reflectively. "Illness has spoilt her temper temporarily, but I am convinced that she is a good, simple, loving creature. I wonder if Mr. Cleveland is in town? I have an idea that she will sleep well to-night, and that the rest of my watch will be peaceful!"

She seated herself once more and took up a book of poems; but her vigil was to be interrupted by a dramatic incident which she did not in the least suspect.

It was past midnight. Lucy Gray looked up as the door opened and a man stepped into the room.

"I am Mr. Cleveland," he said softly. "How is she? You are the new nurse?"

Lucy Gray had risen to answer the first question, but she let the book of poems fall to the floor as she drew back, half in surprise and half in fear, and uttered one word in a barely audible voice—

"Ray!"

Cleveland started as though he had been stung; he bent forward to scrutinise the nurse in the dim light, and then he cried:

"You! How do you come here?"

"I was engaged by Dr. Mallin. I did not know!" stammered Nurse Gray. "You have changed your name!"

"Yes!" he replied shortly. "It was a condition to the—the inheritance of property belonging to my wife. So we are thrown together again!"

Nurse Gray could not trust herself to speak for a few seconds, and in that brief space there flashed through her mind the main incidents of her life of four years ago. She had loved Ray Chester; he had wooed her, and had vowed that he loved her. She had been so happy! She had sometimes dreaded even the fulness of that happiness, which had seemed too great for her to hope to enjoy, and her forebodings had been realised. Ray had taken offence at—at nothing! She, Lucy Gray, could find no excuse for him, much as she loved him. He had forsaken her, and rumour had said that it was so that he could marry for money! She had been ill, and then she had lost trace of him; he had married and passed out of her ken.

She had tried to forget, and had devoted herself to nursing. And now she was face to face with the man who had forsaken her!

Lucy glanced up at him when her thoughts had brought her back to the present, and she saw a gleam of admiration in his eye. Nerving herself, she spoke calmly.

"Mr. Cleveland, your wife is sleeping quietly. In my professional capacity I must ask you to withdraw. We have buried the past!"

He shrank from her, retreated towards the door, and passed out of the room. Lucy tottered to the chair and sank into it with a choked sob.

The night was long for Nurse Gray, and when she was relieved in the morning, her companion in the task of watching Mrs. Cleveland remarked on her swollen and reddened eyes.

"Whatever is the matter?" asked Nurse Downes in astonishment.

"A frightful headache!" responded Lucy brokenly. "It is most unfortunate! I must lie down!"

She remained in bed till the evening, when she arose and had a short walk before going on duty again. She felt calm now; the effect of the tearing open of the old wound was passing away. She felt that she could meet Ray now without emotion, but she hoped that he would not come!

He did come, however. It was a custom which he intended to maintain while his wife was so ill; he could not rest unless he had just one look at her before retiring.

Lucy Gray recognised that she must suffer this nocturnal visit, but she could avoid him during the day. He came each night, and expressed his gratitude that Mrs. Cleveland had shown a slight improvement since Nurse Gray had assumed her duties. He was affectionate towards his wife on the one occasion, at midnight, when she awoke as he entered, and Lucy tried to explain and reconcile his vows to her of long ago, his glances of admiration for her now, and his conduct towards his wife, which was in every way indicative of affection.

She saw Ray standing at the table, pouring some powder into the contents of the glass!

Digitized by Google

Lucy Gray gradually lost her fear of meeting Cleveland; she felt sure of herself, and she ventured to take walks during the lovely afternoons in the spacious grounds of Palatia Villa, as Mrs. Cleveland had whimsically named her residence. It was nearly a fortnight since she had entered the house as nurse, and it was a gratification to her to know that the invalid was slowly shaking off the illness which had kept her so low for a length of time that puzzled the doctor.

She was humming gaily, looking at the flowers and drinking in the balmy air, when a shadow crossed her path and Ray Cleveland barred her further progress. It was not till that instant that she noticed whither she had strayed; they were in a secluded part of the garden farthest from the house.

"I would that I could be so happy!" he cried, with enforced calmness, that masked almost uncontrollable passion.

"I think that you can afford to be happy now, Mr. Cleveland, for your wife is making excellent progress and is practically out of danger!" replied Nurse Gray, with assumed ease.

"That will not bring me the happiness which I am seeking!" he cried vehemently, coming a step nearer to her. "I am bound to one who is no companion for me, whom I do not love!"

"Ray! Mr. Cleveland! Surely you do not mean that!" she cried, in horror. "Why did you marry her? Why do you show such affection? Is that all false?"

"Yes," he answered recklessly. "She is fond of me; would you have me break her heart? So I make pretence! I do——"

"Oh, stop, stop!" cried Lucy Gray piteously, wringing her hands in despair. "You must not tell me this! You must go to her. You married her and you must do your duty."

"Yes, I will try to do my duty," he answered fiercely. "Have I not shown you that I am doing it, even to the extent of acting a lie? I have never loved but one woman!" he added significantly, as he turned on his heel and left her.

On returning to the house, Nurse Gray learnt that Mrs. Cleveland was not so well; there had apparently been a slight relapse. She went to her own room to prepare for an earlier turn than usual, as it might be necessary to help Nurse Downes before her own turn actually came. This proved to be correct, and she was summoned to the sick room, where she found Dr. Mallin.

"Very strange," muttered the doctor, with a puzzled air. "Something has upset her, Nurse Gray," he continued, in a whisper; "she has been asking for you to come and take Nurse Downes' place, and she says it is not because of any dislike, but because she has something to say to you. I'm half afraid that her head is becoming seriously affected. The brain——"

And, at that point, the good doctor forgot that he was speaking to anyone and moved away, mumbling to himself in deep thought.

Nurse Downes, glad of a rest after a particularly tiring day, but feeling rather hurt at Mrs. Cleveland's leaning towards Nurse Gray, went off duty and Dr. Mallin soon afterwards left, on the understanding that he should be immediately summoned if required. Lucy tried to compose her patient; this agitation was most detrimental, and Dr. Mallin warned the nurs before he left that she must try her utmost to compose the invalid. He was afraid to administer a drug at that juncture.

"Nurse," said the invalid woman feverishly, as soon as they were alone, "do you think that my husband loves me, or does he love someone else? You have been good to me, and I like you. Tell me!"

It was a most unreasonable request, but it was the whim of an invalid. To Lucy it was a terrible inquiry; her blood appeared to run cold in her veins, and she skilfully hid her horror-stricken face by pretending to arrange the pillow.

"You do not answer. Oh, is that because you think it is true?" The words came like a groan from the patient.

"I think you are ill and are worrying yourself with foolish fancies, as all sick people are apt to do!" replied Lucy briskly, and evading the question. "Now, rest easy. Is it that which has upset you? Why do you ask?" she inquired, as a sudden fear seized her.

"My husband has always been kind to me," said Mrs. Cleveland, "but I have at times thought that he—he might have loved another. Yet I tried to think I was foolish, and that he did really marry me for myself and not for my money. He has been good. I have seen him come into this room at night, stepping softly so as not to wake Nurse Downes, and he has with his own hands put some soothing powder into the medicine. He came this morning, while Nurse Downes was away; he thought I was asleep, and he mixed some medicine for me. It must have been that! I liked to watch him from my almost closed eyelids; it is pleasant to me to see how tenderly he cares for me. But while I was watching him this morning, I heard him breathe the name 'Lucy,' and that nearly killed me. It revived some of my old fears. Oh, nurse, I should die if he ceased to love me!"

"Which, of course, he will never do!" cried Nurse Gray, with an attempt at cheerfulness, although she was sick with a horrible suspicion. "Go to sleep now, and forget this nightmare!"

"You think it is not true, then?" pleaded the sick woman, seeking for a crumb of comfort from the woman who knew that it was true, but dared not tell her.

"I say that you are suffering from nightmare!" was the evasive answer.

Mrs. Cleveland was comforted, but from time to time she asked questions which taxed Lucy's ingenuity to the utmost.

"I am telling falsehoods in fact, if not in words!" murmured Nurse Gray, in agonised tones. "But how can I tell her? And, perhaps, what he said to me this afternoon is not true! Married for money! Oh, Heaven, is that the explanation of his conduct towards me four years ago? And these night visits, what do they mean?"

Lucy shivered with terror; she could not bring herself to believe that the man she had loved—ah, the man she still loved—was so base.

It was about eleven o'clock when Mrs. Cleveland sank into a deep slumber, for which Nurse Gray was thankful. It was a sign of amelioration. She retired to a chair at the farther end of the room, and took up her book of poems. She tried to read, but her thoughts would not follow the printed page; her head was throbbing, her eyes were heavy with the emotional strain to which she had been subjected. Gradually they closed. Nurse Gray was sleeping on duty!

She dreamt that she was again passing through that scene in the garden; she felt Ray's presence near her, he came to her and spoke with passion, he seized her in his arms and showered kisses on her. She tried to cry aloud, but her voice was still. This climax awakened her with a start, and she softly breathed a sigh of relief on finding that it was but a dream.

She glanced instinctively towards the bed, and her eyes

Digitized by Google

dilated at what she saw. Ray was standing over the little table by the foot of the bed; he was bending over a glass, a paper of some chemical preparation in his right hand, and he was pouring that powder into the contents of the glass!

In spite of herself, Lucy felt that her terrible suspicions were confirmed. Rising noiselessly, she glided forward, and seized his hand. The guilty man stifled a cry of mingled astonishment and fear.

"What are you doing?" she asked sternly. "Is that the cause of your wife's prolonged illness? Have you done that at night, while Nurse Downes was sleeping in the next room, before I came? Did you do that this morning?"

He remained silent for a time, regarding his stern accuser with glowing eyes.

"Yes," he said defiantly. "And what then? Lucy, you have discovered my secret, and now I will speak plainly. I am tired of this woman; I married her for money, forsaking you for that purpose. But I have always loved you; and during the past few months I have been carrying out a plan that would free me and give me the chance of marrying you! I believed that I could make you forgive my past conduct if I came to you free, and you would have known nothing! And, now?"

"That hope is past! You are a would-be murderer, and the love I once bore you is dead."

He regarded her with a look in which despair, longing, and rage were blended. Suddenly he grasped her wrist with a violence that nearly made her cry out with pain.

"That hope is not past!" he hissed, bending near her so that his words should reach her ears without disturbing the repose of his wife. "I will possess you—I must! And if you do not come to me willingly, I will force you! See! In that glass is a deadly poison that will to-night complete the work that was begun weeks ago—with the object of permitting me to approach you. If you will promise to marry me, all will be well, but if you refuse, I will swear that I caught you in the act of poisoning my wife through jealousy! Do you understand? The world will readily believe my story when our past history is known! What could be more natural, in the eyes of the public, than that you should be consumed with jealousy at my treatment of you and my wife's marriage? Jealousy and revenge! Come, will you swear to be mine?"

Nurse Gray saw the awful dilemma; she realised the truth of his assertion. She felt a sentiment of loathing, yet this was tempered by pity. How low he was falling, her sometime lover! She could not say, even to herself, that he had already fallen low; her charitable, loving nature saw hope of redemption up to the last moment of existence. She mastered her emotion, and spoke gently:

"Ray," she said softly—so softly and tenderly, but like a mother speaking to an erring child. "Ray, you are forgetting. Awake to your better self. Think of the bitter wrong you would do to that loving, confiding creature; think of the wrong you would do to me. If you have a spark of affection left for me, then do as I say. Ray, I am calling you by the old name for the last time, Ray! Think of the old days, before the greed of gold possessed you; think of the prayers your dead mother taught you. Remember, and turn from the path of wickedness before it is too late! Do this for me, and for her!"

His eyes were compelled to seek hers by some invisible force; he could not help himself. And the goodness he read in them shamed him into his better self. It was as if some mysterious kind of electricity or magnetism was crushing down all the evil within him and bringing forth all the good.

"I will!" he said slowly. "You have saved me!"

She held out her hand and he grasped it; it was a compact, so sacred that it bound him for all time. He walked unsteadily from the room, after one glance at the still peacefully sleeping woman whose life had been in such danger.

Nurse Gray threw the glass of medicine away, and destroyed all traces of the attempt on Mrs. Cleveland's life.

And Mrs. Cleveland improved more and more rapidly; she declared that it was due to Nurse Gray's good treatment, but there was more truth in that remark than the sick woman imagined.

Lucy Gray quitted Palatia Villa two weeks later; the invalid was sufficiently well to do without a special night nurse. She desired to retain Nurse Gray, but the latter dreaded a breakdown, and was reluctantly allowed to go.

Nurse Gray occasionally hears from Mrs. Cleveland, who always says that she is very happy and cannot explain why she thought that her husband's affection was waning. "He is more affectionate than ever," she wrote in one letter; "surely no wife was ever more fortunate."

"I am so glad, for his sake," murmured Nurse Gray through her tears, as she folded the letter and locked it in her trunk.

L. Lingen.

YOUR EDITOR CHATS

AN INTERESTING ANNOUNCEMENT.

I HAVE this week an important statement to make. For some time past I have recognised the fact that a large proportion of my readers are anxious to include in this publication, first, a complete novelette, and, secondly, a certain amount of fact. This matter has for a considerable period had my careful consideration, and a change in the contents of the paper has now been decided upon.

With the change of contents will come a change of appearance and general make-up. There will be no outside wrapper with a coloured picture on it, but the whole of the number will be devoted to reading matter. There will be a complete novelette and half-a-dozen short stories, in addition to which there will be a number of excellent articles and two new features.

But those old favourite features, "IN CONFIDENCE," and "YOUR EDITOR CHATS," will be continued.

This change of contents, of course, makes the title a misnomer, and it has therefore been decided to change the name from Short Stories to SMITH'S WEEKLY.

The last number of the paper under the old title and appearance will be the the next one, that dated June 18th. The first number of the paper under the new title and appearance will be that dated June 25th and ready for sale on Tuesday, June 21st.

A large amount of money is being spent on advertising this new issue, and the demand for the first number will be a very large one. You should therefore take the precaution to-day to order a copy to be reserved for you.

Next week I shall give you full particulars of

Digitized by Google

CUPID'S TRIUMPH.

Telling of a Strange Wooing.

It was sunset when Paul de Beauville drew rein in front of the iron gates. He knew that he had reached his journey's end, for, at the foot of the hill, an old woman had informed him that the great house he saw above, through the trees, was Grantham Manor, and that he would find entrance to the grounds at the top of the ascent.

He had been born in France, and had always lived there; but, some twenty years before, an elder sister had married an Englishman. She had often invited him to come and see her, but no opportunity had presented itself until now.

And now, as he rode up the avenue, he remembered how many years it had been since he had seen her. Why, she was sixty, an old woman, and he was himself forty, almost an old man! Then, in addition to her, he would probably meet his cousin Ralph, his sister's son, and a Miss Osborne, of whom recent letters had spoken, his sister's ward, a relative of her husband's. What were they all like?

Suddenly he heard a step, and looking up from his reverie, saw a young lady, so lovely, that he had a hasty thought, imaginative as he was, that he had met a Dryad, or some sort of beautiful woodland spirit. He stopped his horse, lifted his hat, sprang to the ground, and stood there in a maze. But the lady, who was much the less embarrassed of the two, moved forward a step, and said, in excellent French:

"It is Monsieur de Beauville, I am sure. Madame Grantham will be charmed. It is such a pity Ralph is away. But you will be very welcome."

The sound of his own language, so prettily spoken, added to Paul's bewilderment. He was too thoroughbred to attempt any personal compliment; but he thanked the speaker for her welcome; and every word and glance was full of an exquisite courtesy, which very few women could have resisted.

Then he began to ask news of his sister; to profess regret at his nephew's absence; and to utter some skilfully-roundabout remark, which might cause his hearer to vouchsafe the information that he sought. She took the hint.

"I am your sister's ward, Miss Constance Osborne," she said, smiling, "and will walk back to the house with you. My cousin is not very well; and if the servants should tell her too abruptly of your arrival, she might get one of her nervous headaches."

"Thank you very much," he replied, thinking how this thoughtfulness for an aged woman added to the speaker's other charms.

It was still quite a distance to the house, and by the time they came to the broad lawn, which swept away in front of the mansion, they had talked of Paul's voyage, of his sister, of Ralph, and the beauty of the scenery; and Constance had discovered that the newcomer spoke English, and spoke so perfectly, that she felt ashamed of having addressed him in French. So she persisted in talking in her own language, rather to his disappointment, for the accents of his native tongue sounded singularly sweet to his ear, when uttered by her lips.

Miss Osborne called a servant to take his horse, and De Beauville walked slowly up and down the verandah, while she herself went to prepare Madame Grantham for his arrival. It was not very long before she returned, saying, eagerly "Come, please come! Madame was not startled—she guessed almost at once that it was you."

In her pleasant excitement, she seemed to grow each instant more beautiful. She passed swiftly up the broad staircase, and Paul followed. They reached a door, at the furthest end of the long corridor. Constance opened it, motioned him to enter, and disappeared.

Looking down the soft dimness of the chamber, Paul saw a stately, white-haired lady rising to meet him, and heard her voice call, gladly:

"Brother, oh, brother!"

Then they were in one another's arms, and, for a season, Paul forgot everything else in the joy of their re-union. After awhile, Madame, herself, noticed Constance's absence.

"Always the dearest, most thoughtful girl in the world," she said. "She is like a daughter to me, Paul."

Just then Miss Osborne appeared.

"Cousin," she said, to Madame Grantham, "I have told them to hurry supper. I hoped monsieur would be hungry, after his ride; and I thought perhaps you would like to have the supper served here, as you cannot go downstairs this evening."

For a couple of days Madame Grantham was still obliged to keep her chamber; after that she was quite herself again. Paul found her charming; but he perceived plainly, in spite of her gentleness and sweetness—her even caressing manners—that she had a strong will, and had evidently always ruled supreme over every person who came within her orbit.

The days floated by to Paul like an enchanted dream. Constance Osborne was a new revelation to him. He had never met anyone so bright, so witty, and yet so womanly before. More than four weeks went by, and now the time for Ralph Grantham's return was at hand.

I have no space to speak of Ralph. But Paul heard his name incessantly, from morning till night. The young man's mother, the servants, the visitors, even Miss Osborne herself, all seemed to consider Ralph the pivot upon which the world turned. Ralph and Ralph's future, Ralph's likes and dislikes, appeared to be of more importance than the rise and fall of empires and dynasties.

A portrait of him, taken a few months before, showed Paul that he was a very handsome young fellow; but even at twenty-two the face exhibited much of the decision and will which were his mother's chief characteristics, and he reflected that if ever the wishes of the pair should clash, the result might be sad to both.

Paul said something of the kind one day to Constance, and discovered that the same idea had often alarmed her. She spoke of her absent cousin with a freedom which prevented any fancy rising in her listener's mind that she cared for him, except in a sisterly way. So De Beauville drifted on in his beautiful dream; for of course you perceive that he had fallen in love with the girl on the instant that she appeared before him, in the depths of the wood, like some creature of a higher order than a mere mortal.

One of Paul's countrymen often came to the Manor. Léon Duval was a fine young fellow, clever and handsome; but old Madame did not like his frequent rides out to Grantham, and when he had gone, one day, she spoke to her brother.

"You see, Paul," she said, "Constance is a beauty and an heiress—one can't tell what folly the young man might get into his head."

Digitized by Google

"Why, it would be sheer impertinence on his part!" cried Paul, alarmed at once.

"And if he gets in earnest, he might suffer," rejoined she. "That is why I mention it; there is no fear for Constance——"

"Oh!" ejaculated Paul, for his sister had paused abruptly, as if leaving her sentence unfinished; and he wondered what she meant.

"I have said nothing to you about my hopes and plans," she continued, laughing pleasantly. "Men are so clumsy—excuse me—they always let out things; and I was afraid you might startle my darling little girl by betraying that you knew——"

"Startle Con—startle Miss Osborne! What do you mean?" he asked, as she broke off to finish her laugh, while she tapped his arm affectionately with her pretty white hand.

"Yes! Well, I'll tell you my secret," she continued. "Ralph may be here any day now, and I want you to know about everything."

"Yes," Paul echoed, confused by an odd ringing in his ears. Luckily he had seated himself with his back to the window; it was already deep twilight, so his face remained lost in the shadows.

"Constance is to marry Ralph," old Madame went on, with a determined ring in her voice, as if Destiny were speaking through her lips.

"Are they engaged?" De Beauvillo asked.

"She is just a year younger than he," pursued old Madame. "By her father's will she does not attain her majority until twenty-five. If she married without my consent, she could not touch her money—oh, my cousin was a very sensible man! But there was no need to restrain Constance—the dearest girl—why, Paul, she never opposed me in her life! Ralph is a little headstrong sometimes—but she—oh, never!"

"And—and it is quite settled?" De Beauville heard himself ask, in a slow, calm voice.

"Settled? Why, I just told you—I meant it when they were children!" Again Fate seemed to speak. "She has loved him all her life—how could she help it, indeed?" And now a thrill of arrogant motherly pride quickened old Madame's determined utterance.

De Beauville grasped the arm of his chair firmly with one hand, but sat still, though the ringing in his ears was as loud as the swell of a tornado now, and he grew icy cold from head to foot.

"I'll tell you everything," pursued Madame, with a laughing amiability, which gave her listener a passing spasm of cold anger. "As I said, Ralph has one fault—he is headstrong! You may imagine I kept my plans to myself; but not long before you came I spoke to Ralph—do you know, just because I did, the absurd boy began to talk about regarding Constance as a sister——"

"Ah!" Paul broke in. But she did not hear.

"Of course, I did not argue. I knew he loved her without knowing it—why, I intended them to love each other! So I showed him that I was displeased; there was that business to attend to in London—I sent him off at once."

"And—and—now he——"

But Paul was not required to finish the question he found so difficult.

"Oh, he writes vaguely, but I can see that absence has taught him," cried Madame. "He has learnt that, as usual, the old mother had seen clearly what was for his happiness. Yes, yes—his last letter shows me that he intends to propose to Constance as soon as he gets back; I shall have the wedding this autumn."

"And you are sure that Miss Osborne——"

"Bless me, Paul, do you suppose I am blind?" Madame broke in, a little irritably. "She has loved him all her life."

There was a pause, then Monsieur de Beauville said:

"In that case I congratulate you—and the young people, too."

"You good brother! I knew you would be pleased!" At this moment the butler announced supper. Paul de Beauville showed a power of self-control that would have been natural enough in a woman, however young, but which was surprising in a man, especially one whose heart had just received a wound so terrible.

He went to the table; he talked; he was composed as usual. Somehow, old Madame got thinking of the tone in which Paul had said the words, "young people." Was there a little feeling of regret that such happiness as theirs could never come near him? Why should it not? was Madame's reflection, and presently a new plan suggested itself to her. Why should not Paul marry? Good gracious, she knew the exact person for him! That bewitching little widow friend of hers. The very match for Paul! She would invite Angela Carroll to pay her a visit. She won-

She tore open the letter, read the first page, and gave a little cry.

Digitized by Google

dered she had not thought of it before. But that vexatious, darling Ralph had kept her mind so busy. Why, Paul had been greatly struck with Angela's picture; he was just in the mood to listen to her project, and the alliance would be so suitable.

According to her habit, Constance went with Madame to her room when bed-time came. The old lady burst out at once.

"Paul ought to marry," said she.

Miss Osborne dropped into the nearest chair and sat staring at her relative in silence.

"Yes; I have an idea. I shall invite Angela Carroll here next month. Paul quite raved over her picture. I do believe he has got the fancy in his head; in fact——"

In came the waiting-maid, and the conversation ended.

Constance Osborne scarcely passed a more tranquil night than Paul de Beauville himself, and he did not even attempt the pretence of going to bed until daylight. But old Madame slept the sleep of the just, after unintentionally hurting the pair she loved, as cruelly as people usually do their friends, when they consider themselves elected to act the part of Destiny.

Three days elapsed. Three wretched days to Paul de Beauville; restless and dreary to Constance; at first, full of pleasant excitement to old Madame, then she began to have her troubles, for Ralph neither came nor wrote.

On the third afternoon, Paul told Miss Osborne that if his nephew did not arrive that evening, he would himself start for London the next morning. He and Constance had kept aloof from one another during these days; he saw how pale and heavy-eyed she looked; he understood how hard her part was, not only to be obliged to conceal her anxiety and suffering, but to encourage and guard the poor mother.

Old Madame had gone to lie down. She was sure Ralph would come that night, she said. She had suddenly passed from a despondent mood to a hopeful one, and when she said "sure," she assumed a voice that was as the voice of Fate.

Constance and Paul had chanced to encounter each other on the verandah. While he was telling her what he proposed to do, a horseman appeared in the avenue.

"Is it Ralph?" cried Paul, straining his eyes to get a better view.

"No," said Constance. "Oh! can something have happened?"

She hurried down the steps. Paul followed. The man rode up, and, touching his hat, said:

"I have a letter for Miss Osborne."

"From whom?" she asked.

"Mr. Grantham, ma'am."

Constance took the missive. Paul saw her turn so deathly white that he stepped forward and put her hand in his arm. She thanked him by a slight movement of the head, turned to the man, and said quietly:

"Take your horse to the stables; then go to the servants' hall, and get something to eat."

The messenger departed. Paul led Constance up to the steps, and put her in a chair.

"Something terrible has happened!" she whispered. "I have had a presentiment——"

She paused, tore open the letter, read the first page, gave a little cry, and fell back in her chair.

"In Heaven's name, what is it?" exclaimed Paul. "Is he hurt—ill?"

"Hush!" she broke in. "Oh, he is married!"

Paul did not speak; he could not. She must be left alone a little: yet she must not think he suspected what this news was to her. He said something about getting her a glass of water, and hurried away, and stayed as long as he dared.

When he returned, he found that she had gone indoors. She was seated in one of the drawing-rooms; she called him as he passed. He entered and stood beside her. She was very white, and her eyes had a strange, dilated look, like fright. He made her drink some water; then she gasped:

"How shall we tell his mother? She will never forgive this—never!"

Here was safety for Paul. Old Madame's share in the trouble was easy to talk about.

"No wonder you are overcome, thinking of her," he replied. "But what does the wretched boy say?"

She put the letter in his hands.

"This was inside," she said, holding up a second epistle. "It is for her. But I am to tell her what he has done, before I give it to her to read."

Paul's first reflection was an oath against the fiendish cruelty of the man who, knowing this girl loved him, should choose her as the recipient of his confidence; nay, even add to his heartlessness by making her the medium of communicating his treachery to his mother. For the instant, Paul hoped the man might live and die with that mother's malediction on his head.

Then he read the letter, which was clearly, frankly written, though evidently by a person in a state of intense excitement. But, from first to last, it ignored the fact that Constance could have any personal concern in the matter.

This was the story. Early in the spring, while in town, Ralph had made the acquaintance of Evelyn Thorne, the sister and ward of a man whose family had, almost for generations, been the enemies of all the Granthams.

And the two young people had fallen in love, and had managed to meet often, until Evelyn was obliged to accompany her brother to Scotland. When Ralph reached there, in September, he contrived to see her again. At last a servant betrayed them to the brother. Evelyn was shut up a prisoner in their house near the town.

At length she succeeded in sending a letter to Ralph, telling him that, on the next evening, she was to be forced to marry one of her brother's friends—a man noted for his vices and evil life.

Ralph at this went to work, and succeeded in carrying her off only a few hours before the time set for the wedding ceremony.

He married her at once, and on the next morning dispatched his messenger with the letters for Constance Osborne.

Paul finished the perusal of the letter, and then glanced down at Constance, who sat pale and tearless before him.

"Help me—advise me!" she exclaimed. "Oh, how am I to tell his mother?"

Before Paul could speak, there was the rustle of a woman's garments just behind them. Both turned, and saw old Madame tottering backwards and forwards, one hand pressed hard against her heart, her face seamed and convulsed with agony.

"My boy is dead!" she groaned, in an awful voice. "My boy is dead!"

"No, no!" they called at once.

"You are lying to me!" she shrieked. "Oh——"

"Sister, sister, listen!" Paul broke in. He must tell her, no matter how, else she would go mad. "He is alive—he is well—but married!"

His hearer staggered back. Constance and De Beauville started towards her. She pushed them away, sat down in a chair, turned towards them a face as rigid as if she had been suddenly changed to stone, and muttered:

"I am an old woman, but I did not know I had grown childish. Speak, one of you, for I did not understand!"

"Sister, it is true—here is his letter."

Old Madame shivered. The spasm passed in an instant; then she sat more erect than before.

"Read the letter," was all she said.

Paul read it, as well as his choked voice would permit. His sister listened, mute, motionless to the close. Then she looked up, and a dreadful ghost of a smile crossed her lips, as she said:

"You see I was right—my son is dead!"

The first thought in the minds of both her listeners was that the shock had turned her brain; but her next words showed their error.

"Ralph Grantham is Evelyn Thorne's husband now—I have no child left in the world!"

"Don't say it—don't!" cried Constance, with a sudden burst of tears. "Monsieur, speak—implore her! Don't say a word yet, cousin—wait—reflect—see, here is Ralph's letter to you! Oh, read it—do read it, cousin—cousin!"

Digitized by Google

She fell at old Madame's feet, embracing her knees, pleading; and Paul added his intreaties. For a time Madame did not even seem to hear their voices. Her glazed eyes were fixed on vacancy.

"Get up, Constance," she said, at length. "Paul, give me your arm—I will go to my room."

They accompanied her in silence. When they had reached her door, Paul said:

"You must lie down——"

"I must do my duty," she interrupted. "I have done it all my life—I shall not falter now."

She sent the pair away. They did not dare to expostulate further.

In the evening Madame sent for her brother, and showed him a letter, which she had written. It gave Ralph the control of a large income, but forbade him her house.

"The fortune is mine while I live," she said; "but I never did a mean thing yet—I am too old to begin. He has wealth, a wife—let him be happy, if he can—but I have no longer a son."

She requested Paul to have the letter sent. But, after holding a consultation with Constance, he decided to keep it back for the present. Paul wrote to his nephew, in the meantime, that his mother was very angry, but had no intention of injuring him pecuniarily. Constance wrote, too, but what she wrote De Beauville did not know. For two days old Madame bore up, and would not allow Ralph's name to be mentioned; but on the third she was seized with a chill, such as sometimes precedes paralysis. They put her to bed, and sent for the doctor immediately, but for nearly a fortnight she was dangerously ill. One night, when the chill and sinking fit came on, she believed herself dying. The mother's heart, in this crisis, asserted its supremacy; arrogance and pride and hate were forgotten; she permitted Ralph to be sent for; but she did not, even then, consent to receive his wife.

From that hour she began to mend. Constance and Paul feared she might retract her permission; but she did not; she did not even mention her son's name again.

Several days passed before Ralph could reach the Manor. On the afternoon when he might be expected, Madame had herself dressed, and assisted down the stairs into the great drawing-room. She took her seat in the arm-chair which she usually occupied, near one of the windows; opened a book on the table beside her; and there she waited. Constance and Paul went in and out. She answered if they spoke, not otherwise; sometimes she affected to read; but they saw that she never turned the page. Once she dropped into a doze—called, suddenly, "Ralph, my Ralph!" Then she awakened, glanced angrily at the pair, who were watching her, and said, "I fell asleep—I don't remember what I was dreaming. Go, both of you, and walk on the terrace. I have kept you indoors too much."

When the two were beyond her hearing, Constance said, in a rather frightened tone:

"I laid Ralph's letter on the table by her—I am sure she will read it now."

They left her alone for nearly an hour. When they went back they could see that she had been weeping, and the letter had disappeared; but she did not speak of it. She was more calm than her two companions. She talked of the weather, the autumn work to be done upon the farms, any trifle which made conversation.

Presently the tramp of horses' hoofs became audible. Constance darted to the window. Paul followed. Old Madame did not stir.

"His wife is with him," whispered Constance. "Oh, what will she say?"

Her aunt's voice startled them.

"Did you say Evelyn Thorne was with him?" she called. "Then go, one of you, and say——"

"No, no!" moaned Constance.

"Listen," Paul said, more sternly than she had ever heard him speak; "remember what your heart craved, when you believed death was near. Be true to yourself, not to pride."

His sister did not reply. For a moment she covered her face with one hand, then let it drop to her side, only signing to Constance, who had made a movement as if to go, to remain.

Paul stood behind his sister's chair, leaning his arm on the back. Constance was stooping over old Madame, her face full of intreaties she dared not utter. Suddenly the door from the entrance-hall opened, and Ralph Grantham appeared, leading by the hand a girl so exquisitely lovely, so delicate, so shrinking, so timid, with such a necessity for protection, such powers of gratitude therefore expressed in face and attitude, looking, too, so young and child-like, that Nemesis herself must have softened towards the frightened creature.

The pair came slowly up the great room. Still Madame did not stir, but sat stony and inexorable. Constance leant over her, in pleading silence. Paul de Beauville looked at his nephew, and again a fiery wrath rose in his soul, as he felt Constance's arm, which unconsciously touched his, tremble convulsively, and reflected that Ralph had won happiness by breaking her heart.

There was something terrible in the silence. The poor little bride looked as if she would drop, in spite of her husband's presence and sympathy. Half way up the room Ralph stopped.

"Mother," he called, in a voice through which, eager and pleading as it was, rang the pride and will old Madame had bequeathed to him, "I have brought your daughter, to ask pardon for your son—you will not refuse her!"

"Mother!" he called again.

This time old Madame's proud head sank; her right hand stretched itself slowly out in the welcome she had no voice to speak; and in another second Ralph's arms were about her neck, and Evelyn was folded to her heart.

* * * * *

When sunset came, Paul de Beauville wandered away through the depths of the great garden, which stretched to the left of the house. He came to a rustic arbour, and, feeling tired, after the varied emotions of the day, paused there to rest. As he entered he found himself face to face with Constance Osborne, weeping bitterly.

He hurried towards her, crying:

"Constance, Constance, I think I shall go back to France."

She answered, but with hastily averted head:

"You told me so yesterday! Aunt will be sorry."

"But I did not tell you why—I must now! I love you—I love you! Oh, Constance, wouldn't it be easier to go with me than to live here to suffer at the sight of their happiness? I would be so good to you, so tender to you—Constance! Dearest, will you be my wife?"

She smiled at him through her tears, and answered:

"I will be your wife—because I love you and I never dreamt of caring for any other man."

So, when Paul got sane enough for explanations to be made, it came out that Constance had long known of old Madame's intentions to marry her to Ralph, and had dreaded that, sooner or later, the refusal, which she must give, would alienate the old lady from her for ever.

The next day Madame Grantham could distract her thoughts long enough from Ralph and his wife, whom the mother already adored, to listen to Paul's story, but not understanding that he had already told his secret to Constance, she said:

"The poor girl will not listen to you; her hurt is too keen. Oh, what a selfish old woman I am. I have been so happy with my bad boy and his pretty bird, that I forgot!"

Then Paul succeeded in making her comprehend that Constance had only cared for Ralph as a brother; that she loved him—Paul.

"How do you know?" demanded old Madame.

"She told me so."

"Like your impudence to speak to her before you had my permission!" said Madame, smiling.

Philip Marchant.

Digitized by Google

BETWEEN TWO FIRES.

The Story of a Mixed Engagement.

"I BELIEVE I've made about the worst muddle that any fellow could be guilty of!" groaned Cecil Raynes disconsolately, as the train pulled up at the Victoria terminus and he prepared to alight. "I really don't see how I am to face them all. When a man is practically engaged to two girls at once, what is he to do?"

That was certainly a poser, and Cecil did not attempt to answer it. He alighted from the compartment with his rug, which he handed to the servant who was awaiting his arrival.

"Look here, Greaves, you can see after my luggage and take it home on a cab!" he said to the man. "I'll walk. I feel a bit stiff after that journey."

The well-trained man-servant had some difficulty in repressing a look of astonishment on hearing that not over-energetic young man complain of stiffness after a journey of eighty minutes' duration. However, he looked after the luggage, and, when he had got it under his eye, his master left him and strode away.

It was one of those few occasions when Cecil Raynes indulged in a quick walk; he had something on his mind—two fiancées, as he told himself with a grim smile—and he wanted to walk it off!

"Of course, everybody regards it as a settled thing between Joan and I," he muttered as he hurried along. "She and her father are in town on purpose to meet me, and I have left Croxham in order to meet them. Why? Because my mother, her father, Joan herself, and everybody else, expect that a proposal and an acceptance will be announced almost at once! And, on the top of all that I've fallen head-over-ears in love with another girl!"

The hard expression faded from his handsome countenance and was replaced by a smile of infinite love and tenderness, and his thoughts turned to Croxham and Madge Culford. The slender form, the pretty head, with its lovely brown hair, the beautiful face lit up by a sweet smile, and the soft glow of those trustful eyes!

It was true that he was not actually engaged to either Joan or Madge, but he was correct in saying that he was practically bound to both. He felt bound to Joan because it was a society matter, everyone expected it, and would say hard things about him and her if it did not become an accomplished fact.

He was bound to Madge by that indefinable something that needs no formal ratification in words. He knew that she loved him, although he had not asked her; he loved her, and she could not fail to perceive that. In fact, it was clear that she had unconsciously and tacitly accepted his love, or she would never have flushed so when—— Oh, it needed no explanation, no investigation, it was certain!

Now, if he proposed to Joan, it would break Madge's heart, and he himself could not be happy, although he liked Joan very, very much. And if he married Madge, what of Joan? He would bring ignominy upon her and would cause her much pain, for he thought she was fond of him, and he had really believed that he was in love with her. That meeting with Madge had awakened him to a knowledge of the truth.

"Cecil," said his mother severely, "how much longer are you going to dilly-dally about in this fashion? For the last week you and Joan have been thrown in one another's society; you know the object—you both understand quite well what all the world is waiting for, you are not children!—yet there is not the least sign! What are you thinking about?"

"Are you sure that Joan desires it, mother?" he asked evasively.

"What nonsense!" cried Mrs. Raynes angrily. "There has never been any question about it! Lord Miston regards it as an act of poetic justice. His side of the family owes a good deal to ours; Joan and you are the last in each line; they have money, and we have scarcely anything; and, to crown all, you saved his life when he was seized with the cramp while bathing! What more is there to say?"

"It seems to me," remarked Cecil slowly, "that there is no question of love in all this. You don't study whether we love each other or not!"

"Fiddlesticks!" declared Mrs. Raynes impatiently. "Love is all very well for poets to rave about, and it makes a good plot for a novelist, but in practice you do not take it into account."

"Nevertheless," said Cecil quietly, "I should like to take it into account! It seems to me that married life would be all the happier if it were tinged with love!"

"And who says that Joan does not love you?" queried Mrs. Raynes artfully. She saw the drift of his remarks and she was skilful enough to checkmate him. "I am sure that Joan is very much in love with you, and I say most distinctly that your conduct is unworthy of you and absolutely unfair to her. Now, my dear boy," she added persuasively, seeing that the shot had gone home, "promise me that you will propose to Joan without delay."

Cecil was stung to the quick by his mother's words, as she knew he would be. He was the soul of honour, and the idea that he was acting unfairly to Joan was bitter to him. Madge and he had fallen in love; it was mutual, and they must both suffer. Alas!

"I promise you that I will propose to her if she gives me the chance, mother!" he said, with a set expression on his face. "Of course, I can't force myself upon her at any moment, but I will do it as soon as ever I get the chance! I promise that, and the marriage shall take place as soon as Joan wishes!"

"Thank you, Cecil! I was sure that you would listen to reason," murmured Mrs. Raynes, rising from her seat and going towards him. "I am so happy!"

He stooped and kissed her cheek, and she walked majestically from the drawing-room leaving Cecil to his own reflections.

Digitized by Google

"If the mater and Joan are happy, I suppose it doesn't matter about me. Poor Madge! I wonder if Lord Miston would use his influence, after marriage, to get me attached to some dangerous mission in the interior of Africa or elsewhere? Somewhere where the yellow fever takes you off quick. Yet—that wouldn't be fair to my cousin. Here, I had better go to her and get it over!"

Joan was not exactly Cecil's cousin; they were related, but more distantly than cousinship, although they always spoke of one another as "cousin."

While Cecil was riding towards the town residence of Lord Miston, that worthy gentleman was catechising his daughter on the same subject as that on which the young fellow had been heckled by his mother.

"I won't have it!" Lord Miston was saying almost at the very moment that Cecil hailed the cab. "You are evading the proposal for some reason or another, Joan. I'm sure that Cecil Raynes would have proposed before this. Mind, I won't have any more of this young Westcott! He hasn't a penny to bless himself with, and you are to marry Raynes. He saved my life, and it's quite the proper thing, for family reasons, that you should marry him. And as to Westcott, I'll get the Foreign Secretary to have him sent out to some dangerous——"

"No, no, father!" burst forth Joan hastily. Something like a sob came from her throat. "You won't do that. Promise me that you won't do that, father!"

"Then promise me that you will not evade Cecil that you will accept him when he proposes, and——"

"I will accept him if he asks me!" said Joan submissively. "I will go now and make ready to receive him!"

Cecil Raynes entered the room in which he had been informed he would find Joan; he entered it with the air of determination one may see on the countenance of a man who has resolved to carry out a disagreeable piece of work. He found Joan reading; she appeared perfectly self-possessed, and there was no trace of a tremor in her dainty hand as she held it out in greeting. He was conscious that his own was not so steady.

"Joan," he said, after the usual common-places had been exchanged—they always called each other by their Christian names—"I have come here on purpose to tell you——"

"I thought you had," she interrupted quickly, yet without any unseemly haste, and her look was quite demure.

He was staggered. He understood that Joan had been waiting for the proposal, and perhaps he was foolish to expect that it would be such a momentous matter to her as it would have been to Madge, but this nonchalance disconcerted him. He had thought that his cousin was really very attractive when he entered; he had a great liking for her in a way; but this airiness of manner was not agreeable. It was too much like buying and selling!

Like a flash all these things passed through his mind; then he pictured the scene if Madge had been the woman!

Oh, Madge, Madge! His soul cried out in silent agony. How different it would have been! How the lovely face would have flushed, the trustful, liquid eyes would have first glanced lovingly at him, and then drooped before his ardent gaze. How she would have placed her hand in his, and——

"You are a long time telling it, Cecil, although you did come on purpose." Joan's voice broke his reverie, and brought him to his surroundings with a confused start.

"Cecil," continued the girl, a twinkle appearing in the hazel eyes, although she showed, for the first time, some trace of uneasiness, "you have come to propose to me, haven't you? Well, don't!" she added, as the young fellow nodded in mute surprise at the way in which she asked the question. "I don't wish you to!"

"But everybody expects me to!" he cried. "They will say all kinds of unkind things, and——"

"And what will you say?" inquired the girl, looking at him now with more freedom. "You didn't say anything about yourself! Confess, Cecil, that you will not be much upset! Who is the lady who has filled your mind for the whole week that you have been in London, and, I suppose, for at least a part of the time you were away at Croxham?"

They gazed straight into one another's eyes for a second, then a smile appeared on Joan's face—a smile that broadened into a merry laugh. It forced a smile from Cecil, despite his perplexity.

"Who told you, Joan?" he demanded at length.

"You did, Cecil! Oh, no, not with words, but by your demeanour! My dear cousin, surely you do a woman's wit small credit if you think that I could not perceive that you had lost your heart somewhere else!"

"It doesn't matter!" he remarked doggedly, evading her question. "We are supposed to get married, you and I, and there's no help for it. I won't treat you shabbily, and nothing formal has taken place between Madge Culford and me—how could there? I am not certain that she thinks anything of me."

"You are not to ask me to marry you, remember that!" she cried, as he was about to continue.

"I promised the mater that I would if I got the chance, so——"

"You haven't had the chance!" she retorted quickly. "I won't give you the chance, for after what has transpired, no gentleman would force his proposal on a lady. So you are cleared in your mother's eyes!"

"And you?" he asked.

"I? Oh, I promised that I would accept you if you asked me to marry you, but you haven't asked me, have you? Of course, our people will be dreadfully upset, but we cannot help that! Now you are free to go to Miss Madge Culford,

"Father," said Joan, "there is some mistake, we are not engaged."

Digitized by Google

whose acquaintance I shall be happy to make, and I——" She stopped abruptly. She had risen and he rose also, taking her hand.

"Yes, Joan, and you?" he inquired tenderly. He thought that she was giving him his freedom at a great cost to herself now; he had just awakened to the notion that she had been acting a wrong part during this interview. "What of you, Joan?"

"It doesn't hurt a mite!" she said frankly, and he knew by the steady gaze of the hazel eyes that she was not deceiving him. "I am glad of it!"

"That's all right!" he said with a sigh of relief. "I began to feel afraid!"

"You needn't!" she observed drily. "I like you ever so much as a relative, but as a husband you do not especially attract me! There! I hope you won't think me too bold."

"How are we to tell our respective and respected parents?" he queried jestingly. He felt so much easier now.

"I will tell dad, and you must arrange with Mrs. Raynes, naturally!" explained Joan.

"No, that is not fair to you, Joan!" he replied firmly. "You have done all the plucky work till now; you took it upon yourself to—to prevent our mutual unhappiness, so I must beard your father. I say, Joan, I wish there were a fourth party; there are three of us—you, Madge and I—but you deserve the love of a good man, and I heartily wish that the fourth party were in existence, for your sake!"

"He is, Cecil!" she responded quietly, and for the first time her eyes dropped before her cousin's gaze.

"Hurrah, I'm so glad!" cried Cecil in altogether boyish exuberance. It was the finishing stroke to all his fears. In his excitement he caught her by the waist and kissed her cheek as though she were his sister.

And at that psychological moment the door opened and Lord Miston looked in. "Good!" he ejaculated, his face radiant with smiles. "I am pleased!" He closed the door precipitately, fearing to further disturb the lovers.

"Oh, I say, this is awkward!" cried Cecil blankly. "He thinks we are engaged, Joan! I must go and straighten the whole thing out! You stay here, but tell me the name of the fortunate man, Joan! I've told my secret."

"John Westcott!" she answered, her face flushing. She looked shyly at her cousin, and Cecil observed the contrast and recognised its cause.

"It makes all the difference when a girl is in love or not!" he thought. "I can imagine that she would act just like Madge in similar circumstances."

"What name did you say?" he enquired suddenly. He had lost the full sound through his preoccupation at the change in Joan't bearing.

"John Wetscott!" she replied again, just as shyly. "He is rather differently circumstanced than we, and father will not hear of him. He insisted on my marrying you, and said that if I didn't mind he would see if John could not be forced to go on some dangerous diplomatic mission! Oh, I hope he will not carry out that dreadful threat!"

Dangerous mission! How the coincidence smote Cecil's heart! And how distressed she was!

"See here, Joan!" he said with determination. "You have helped me, and I'll see if I cannot help you. Somehow there are persons who fail to see that marriage with love is so much better than marriage without it, and just for the sake of family convenience. We do not think so, and we must try to make others see our cases in the same light as we do. They must not try to force us to see things as they do; they will not have to bear the pain of the unhappiness into which they would thrust us!"

He was about to leave her in order to beard the lion, but she would accompany him. As they entered Lord Miston's study, he came forward to greet them with, "May you be happy, my children!"

"Father, there is some mistake," said Joan tremulously, before Cecil could speak. "We are not engaged."

"It is quite correct, sir, I assure you," said Cecil blandly. "I admit that you have cause to think that—that I had proposed to your daughter, but I hadn't. I was treating her as if she were my sister, you see. I was so pleased with the information she had just given me. It fitted in so nicely with what I had told her."

"Perhaps you will be good enough to explain!" gasped Lord Miston sinking into a chair. "Explain, if you are sane enough, you two."

This was not encouraging, but Cecil was not abashed. In a few cool, collected sentences, he explained.

"I know that you wished us to make a match of it, sir, chiefly because I was fortunate enough to save your life. You considered that you owed me something?"

"Yes!" gurgled Lord Miston, red with anger and disappointment.

"Well, sir, you wished me to make your daughter happy, didn't you? I am sorry to say that events have proved that I couldn't! So I propose, with your consent, to transfer the debt which you consider you owe me, to my friend, Mr. John Westcott, with whom I went to school some years ago. I ask that as a favour, sir!"

Lord Miston stared at one, then at the other; Cecil's demeanour was bold, Joan's was pleading. Something in her face reminded the old peer of her mother's at a time when he was courting her, before he achieved such success and gained a life peerage. The red colour died away gradually, and at length he spoke.

"Very good! I am disappointed, but if you are all happy I suppose I must consent! Joan, come here, my dear! Perhaps I have been a little thoughtless for your future, instead of taking, as I imagined, the right course! Bring Westcott here, and——"

The remainder of the sentence was lost, for Joan threw herself upon him with a glad cry and kissed him passionately.

Cecil slipped away, leaving father and daughter to enjoy their new-found felicity. He had to face his own respected parent, and the task was not nearly so pleasant. Mrs. Raynes was too majestic to give way to hysterics, but she came very near that condition. She upbraided Cecil for losing a fortune through a silly whim about being in love, and finally swept from the room, trembling with vexation.

On the following morning, however, she changed her mood; she received a letter from Lord Miston, offering Cecil a partnership in his large business.

"I intend to share my fortune between your son and my daughter," so ran a sentence in the old man's letter. "I wished, like you, that they would make it possible to keep that fortune intact in the family, but as they do not care to carry out our wishes, they must be content to lose half, each of them, eh?"

"He's a brick!" cried Cecil. "But I don't want to take the money from Joan!"

"Here is a note from Joan inclosed in her father's letter," said Mrs. Raynes. "After saying a lot of nice things about me and you and a Miss Culford, she says that she knows what her father is doing, and, if you don't accept, she will make her own share over to Miss Culford, of Croxham, as soon as she is Mrs. Cecil Raynes.

"It seems to me, Cecil, that you had better make your arrangements at Croxham, and then bring Miss Culford to town in order to introduce me to my future daughter!"

Geo. Day.

A Knowledge of One's Character is of great importance nowadays. It enables one to know so many things of which one would otherwise be ignorant. For instance, all unmarried persons like to know whether they are suited to marry, and married persons wish to know other things which they could never know unless they had their characters told. Everyone desirous of obtaining this valuable knowledge should send a specimen of his or her handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope, to RANBE, 23 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

. . THE . .
UNCOMMITTED CRIME.

Telling of the Temptation that Came to Dr. Nevil Holland.

"I FEEL as nervous as a kitten! But I should not like any of my patients to overhear that remark, or they might doubt my skill."

The young surgeon laughed at these words, uttered half-audibly in the privacy of his own room. He was giving the finishing touch to his attire, prior to making his way to the residence of his old college chum, whither he was bound in order to stake his future happiness on a woman's word!

Dr. Nevil Holland, although a young man, had gained a reputation as a surgeon which entitled him to take a high place in the profession, and honours were coming to him with a rapidity that made many of his less clever brethren envy him.

Most people agreed that, although Dr. Holland showed outward geniality and sympathy with suffering, he was in reality a man without the least trace of sentimental weakness, a man with nerves of iron. He was looked upon as a man whose only love was for his profession, a man who would not be touched by any woman's tenderness.

Yet this was the man who stood surveying himself nervously in the mirror. Some of the opinions concerning himself had filtered through to Dr. Holland, and he had smiled grimly and had felt pleased; but all the old scorn for the ways of women had been banished by the appearance of Winifred Marston!

Miss Marston was in the service of his chum's wife, as companion and secretary. Mr. Scarr was often away, and, as he had no children, his wife felt lonely; she had engaged Miss Marston as companion, and the two ladies agreed very well. Holland, visiting his friend during a somewhat lengthy sojourn at home, had seen Winnie Marston and had met his fate.

The love that sprang into being at the first meeting deepened with every passing day, till Nevil Holland told himself that he could not live without Winnie Marston; he must place his life's happiness at her disposal. What was reputation, honour in his profession, or wealth, if she were not with him to share it?

For a whole week he had watched for an opportunity to obtain an interview with her alone, and this evening the opportunity was offered to him. Scarr and his wife were going out; Miss Marston would be at home alone. Nevil Holland resolved that he would ask her to be his wife that evening, and when Mr. and Mrs. Scarr returned, he would, so he hoped, be able to announce that Miss Marston had agreed to become Mrs. Nevil Holland. He felt full of elation as he drove to Scarr's house in a hansom, but there was an occasional strange misgiving in his heart that worried him.

As he had anticipated, Miss Marston was alone. She welcomed him with that sweet smile that had something of sadness in it, and he told himself that he would soon be able to drive away that trace of sorrow, and make that lovely face look radiant always and for ever.

"I have come for a little music, Miss Marston," he said, with courtly politeness. "It is always so soothing, and you play so exquisitely. Ah!" he added, as she looked quickly up at him, "you entertain the popular notion that I have no heart!"

A slight flush tinged her cheeks, and she was conscious of appearing confused.

"I do not think that I have held the popular delusion exactly," Dr. Holland, she answered hesitatingly. "I should say that you have sufficient strength of character to make you forget everything, everything but your duty, when you are engaged in a difficult case, but at other times you are like other men."

She went towards the piano in order to comply with his request, but he stopped her.

"I would rather not have the music now, Miss Marston," he said, fixing his keen, grey eyes upon hers with an intense gaze that stirred her heart to its inmost depths. "You are the only one who has properly understood me, and it will do me more good to talk to you than to listen to the music.

"I wish to talk to you, Miss Marston! I will confess all and say that I have come here with that very purpose. Winnie!" he cried passionately, seizing her hands and holding them in a tight clasp, "I love you, I love you, and I have come to ask you to be my wife!"

He vaguely noticed the shrinking, frightened expression that crossed her features at this passionate appeal, but he attributed it to the suddenness of his outburst. He leant forward eagerly, as if to catch the lowly-uttered response which he wished to hear; but she liberated herself from his grasp with a cry of surprise and fear that struck him like a death-knell, and moved away from him.

Digitized by Google

"No, no! Oh, Dr. Holland, don't ask me! I cannot! It is impossible!"

Her breath was coming in quick gasps, her bosom was heaving, a strange light shone in her eyes. He passed his hand over his forehead and stared dumbly at her.

"Let me tell you," she cried quickly. "I owe it to you to tell you that which I have kept a secret from all. Oh, I did not think that you—you were in love with me! It never occurred to me, because——"

She stopped abruptly.

"Don't tell me that it is impossible!" he pleaded, as if dreading to hear her explanation. "Give me some hope. How can I be happy without you? One day, even if it be years hence, I may hope to possess you? That hope, slight as it may be, will give me something to work for."

The terrible earnestness of the man's love was apparent in every line of his face, in his attitude of supplication, in the tone of his voice. Winnie Marston shuddered.

"Don't," she pleaded in her turn. "I cannot love you, for I love another. I love—my husband! I am married!"

He stared at her in wonderment. She continued hastily, in a hard, dry tone, that betokened the intensity of her emotion:

"I was married about four-and-a-half years ago to Charles Procter; I loved him with all my soul, and I love him still. We had a brief period of happiness, and then a terrible calamity fell upon us. My husband was charged with fraud; he was prosecuted, the evidence was black against him, and he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment at the Central Criminal Court. I was the only one who believed in his innocence.

"I was left to earn my own living, while he was working as a common thief in prison. I succeeded in obtaining a situation, but I had to resume my maiden name, for no one would have engaged the wife of Charles Procter, the felon, the man whose crime was, to all appearances, proved beyond a doubt.

"I could write to my husband, I could see him once in three months, and I could receive a letter from him at stated intervals. I had to do that in secret. I arranged to have his letters sent to a small shop where letters are received for a small fee, and I gave them no clue to my whereabouts, lest the worthy shopkeeper should prattle and my secret become known.

"Thus our lives were passed for sixteen months; he had been well-behaved, and hoped to be let out on ticket-of-leave at the expiration of eighteen months. At that time my mistress decided to go abroad for a year, and I had to decide whether I would go with her or give up my situation and wait in England for my husband's release. I decided to go with her. I must live, and he must live when he came out, and it would be better for me to retain the position and so help him with money while he tried to obtain a livelihood and tried also to establish his innocence."

She ceased speaking for a few minutes; the recollection of that terrible time was too painful. Dr. Holland regarded her as one in a dream; he saw his happiness slipping from him, and his soul rebelled against the blackness of the future.

"I left word with the shopkeeper that letters intended for me should be re-addressed to me, in another envelope, to the Poste Restante of the Continental city to which I was going; I gave him a shilling in advance to repay him many-fold for the expense. I determined to write to my husband when the privileged time arrived, at the end of another month. I went abroad, caught a chill, and fell ill. My illness developed and for weeks my life was despaired of. My mistress sent me to a hospital, and I was alone.

"When I recovered, my first thought was for my husband, I applied at the Poste Restante, but there was no letter for me. I had implored the doctors to make inquiries during intervals of consciousness and they had ignored what I said, ascribing it to a disordered mental condition. I returned to England, hoping to trace my husband by the odious ticket-of-leave; but to my mingled joy and sorrow, I found that my husband's innocence had been proved immediately after his release by the confession of the real culprit, who had committed suicide, so my husband had not been compelled to report himself, and that trace was lost.

"Charles had received a recompense from the Government, and with that he had set off in search of me; I learnt so much from the proprietor of the shop to which my letters had been addressed; he was a new owner, the other having sold the business to him. I have not heard of my husband since, but I cannot think that we shall be separated for ever."

Separated for ever! The phrase struck the two in different ways, and to Nevil Holland it suggested that Charles Procter might be dead. If so, then Winnie would gradually be consoled, especially when the consolation was offered by a devoted lover, and—— Why not? Women, like men, can love twice. It was the uncertainty that kept Charles Procter's memory alive in this way.

"I will help you to discover your husband, Miss Marston," he said hoarsely, and he meant it. "Forgive me for having intruded my protestations of love upon you."

She was sorry for him, and she held out her hand in sympathy.

"I am sorry that—that it hurt you so!" she said simply.

He was glad to note the sympathy in her voice and manner—sympathy develops into love when there is no barrier.

"If I could discover where he is!" he muttered as he went home. And he little dreamt that Fate was to throw Charles Procter in his path, and the temptation to which he would soon be subject!

He went to the hospital in the morning, and he was informed that a fresh surgical case was waiting for him. No. 15, in Marcus Ward, was suffering from a complaint that would need an operation, and had been brought to the hospital for the purpose. No. 15 would, according to the usual practice in such cases, have a few days to "get his strength up" before receiving surgical treatment.

Holland went to see the patient, who was seated on the locker by the side of his bed. It took the surgeon a very little while to grasp the facts of the case, with the aid of data already supplied from outside, and he decided that four days would be sufficient preliminary treatment.

"Is it dangerous, doctor?" asked the patient anxiously.

"Well," smiled the doctor, "I suppose there is danger in everything outside the normal course of things, even in a cold, but this operation is one of those which I should call absolutely safe! It requires skill, that is all, and I'll undertake to say that you will be well and strong again in four weeks from now!"

"Thank you, sir!" said the man gratefully. "I am not afraid for myself, but—it would upset something else!"

He seemed as if he would have liked the surgeon to ask him what that something else was, but Holland was the professional surgeon again, and he said nothing. When he had time to think of outside affairs his mind was full of Winnie Marston.

Each visit to the Marcus Ward during the next three days caused Dr. Nevil Holland to take more interest in his new patient. On the third day, as he was leaving, he told the man that when he went to bed that night, he would remain there till noon on the following day, when the operation would be performed. Once more the patient asked his question, with an anxious expression in his eyes:

"Will it be dangerous, doctor?"

"Not at all!" was the prompt reply. "Now," he added in a more kindly tone, "don't upset yourself, or that will retard your convalescence!"

"I'll try to be cheerful, doctor, but it means a lot to me! This illness has already delayed me a long time! I must find her!"

"Whom?" asked Dr. Nevill Holland, turning quickly.

"My wife," said the patient simply. "Ah, doctor, it's a sad story! I don't suppose you want to know anything about it?"

"What's your name?" inquired Dr. Holland.

Digitized by Google

It had never occurred to him to inquire about the man's name. He might have learnt it with the greatest ease, but the patient was simply No. 15 to him.

"Charles Procter!" came the astounding reply, and Dr. Holland started violently.

"You can tell me your story when you are better!" he remarked as calmly as possible. His face was a shade paler than usual. "You mustn't excite yourself by worry. I'll speak to the nurse and tell her to look after you!"

So Fate had given Charles Procter into his hands! If that man were out of the way, Winnie would be his! The thought haunted him all that day, he could not drive it from him! And, as it was so persistent, he harboured it, black as it was!

What a little thing it would be—just a slip of the instrument, and Charles Procter would be a dead man! Nobody would suspect that it was not an ordinary risk of an operation! No one would think of blaming him; he was so clever that the death of a patient while under his care would be regarded as merely one more proof of the real uncertainty of those things which are considered certain!

Then his better self gained possession of him for a brief space, and he thought of going at once to Winnie and making the facts known to her; he even tried to imagine the joy of reunion!

Reunion! That meant misery for him, and he would have to go through life with the bitter knowledge that Charles Procter possessed the one woman whom he had ever loved, whom he could ever love!

He wiped the beads of agony from his brow as he paced his room feverishly. Could he endure it? Then the small voice of the tempter came to him again. Why should he endure it? If Procter died, it would be oblivion and he would not suffer; while Winnie, having had her husband's identity made known to her, would grieve and recover. He, Nevil Holland, would pose as the man who had exerted all possible human skill to save her husband! He could tell her that he had refrained from telling her at once where her husband was, for the reason that it was better to await the result of the operation! He could even try to bring them together for the last few moments of Procter's existence!

Why not? Only a slight slip of the knife, and nobody would know! Why not? Why not? He shuddered, shut his eyes as if to keep the terrible thought from him, and took a small dose of a sedative in order to insure sleep!

* * * * *

So the unexpected had happened and the patient had sunk under the operation! Charles Procter had died before Winnie could get to him, and Nevil Holland had played the part of sympathetic friend and consoler.

"A year ago to-day!" said Nevil Holland to himself, and he started at the sound of the opening of the door. "Winnie has been my wife for a month! It was rather soon, but I pressed her and she yielded!"

Dr. Nevil Holland's marriage had been an event, and everybody imagined that he was supremely happy. Only Nevil Holland himself knew the truth. The figure of Charles Procter was ever before him!

At first he had been happy, for his iron will had crushed down all recollection of that terrible deed; but this will power decreased, and he found it impossible to thrust from him the face of the man who had stood between Winnie and him!

"And he is standing between us now!" cried Nevil, clasping his hands till the nails almost cut the flesh. "Wherever and whenever she is with me, he comes between. Her face and form change; they melt like a dissolving view and his face and form take the place of hers!"

He laughed mirthlessly and went off to a consultation. Luckily for him, his old coolness seemed to return when he was engaged professionally; but it was the only time he had free from the haunting shadow of Charles Procter.

As the days passed, the haunting vision grew more real; not only did Winnie's figure change into that of the man he had killed, but her voice altered and became Procter's. Nevil tried to shake off the horrible nightmare; he knew well enough that the vision was not a reality, he told himself over and over again that it was due to his nerves and that he was growing frightened without cause; but it was of no avail. He could not rid himself of the incubus.

He tried drugs and sought the society of others. He gave large parties—what a charming hostess Winnie made!—and he accepted invitations eagerly. A change of surroundings might do it!

He dreaded to look at his wife, feared to listen to her voice. He knew that in her stead he would see and hear Charles Procter, the man who had suffered imprisonment so unjustly and who had been foully done to death and so robbed of the happiness of reunion.

The haggard appearance of the celebrated surgeon began to attract attention; people said that he was getting run down, and Holland realised that he must go away and discontinue his professional duties for a while or people would not trust him. That meant ruin!

Dr. and Mrs. Holland gave a large party as a kind of farewell, prior to taking a long cruise in the Mediterranean. Many notabilities were there; Nevil felt a great pride in the fact that he was so honoured, but another sentiment surged upwards and drowned the other. If they only knew! How they would shrink from him and call in the police.

He heard Winnie speak; she was addressing him. She laughed, and then the laugh altered in tone, and it was the mocking laugh of Charles Procter! His former patient stood before him; he could see the face and figure plainly, and there was an accusing finger levelled at Dr. Nevil Holland!

With a hoarse cry, the surgeon seized a knife that was lying near and, raising it aloft, dashed at his enemy. He felt his arm gripped, there was a terrible struggle, a din of voices! With a shriek of desperation, Dr. Holland made an effort to release himself from the grasp of iron that held his wrist, and——

* * * * *

Dr. Nevil Holland shivered and looked around in bewilderment. He was standing by his own bedside in his pyjamas. Great beads of perspiration stood on his face; his body was damp with sweat.

What had happened? Had he killed Winnie in his attack on the visionary Procter? Had he been kept in confinement during an attack of brain fever following the assault? His eye fell on a calendar hanging on the wall; the date told him that the whole of that terrible experience had been but the dream of a night!

In four hours he would have to perform the operation, and he vowed that it should be successful!

"I love the woman, and I will prove my love by restoring her husband to her!" he said.

He did so, and thanked Heaven that he had been saved from a terrible crime. And the future does not seem so black as he fancied, for he finds happiness in his profession and in the fact that he was able to bring happiness to the woman he loved so dearly.

Leslie Grant.

HOW TO TAKE AND FAKE PHOTOGRAPHS.

BY CLIVE HOLLAND.

Cloth, Price 1s., or post free 1s. 2d.

Some of the chapters are:

CHAP. I.—THE DARK ROOM.
Its size—Fittings—Stock of Chemicals—Various uses.

CHAP. II.—CAMERAS, PLATES, AND FILMS.
The choice of a camera—Shutters—Plates and their varieties—The various merits of plates and films, etc.

CHAP. IV.—EXPOSURE.
Testing speeds of plates—Tables of exposures—Plate speed table—Exposure hints—Don'ts, etc.

CHAP. V.—DEVELOPMENT OF NEGATIVES.
Developers — Normal development — Development of over-exposed and under-exposed plates—Local development—Intensification and reduction of negatives—Re-touching—Varnishing, etc.

At all Booksellers, or from the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A Cordial Intreaty.

"When I want to borrow a sovereign I never go to a friend," said Jenkins, as though he were throwing out a suggestion. "Ah, well," replied Jones, extending his hand, "let us be friends!"

She Couldn't Understand Why.

"I love the sea," remarked the modern young man to the girl as they sat on the beach gazing out over the restless waves. "I don't see why," she responded earnestly, as she looked squarely at him, "it hasn't got any money."

No Objection.

She: "Albert, I have come to the conclusion that I love George better than I love you, and——" He: "What about the engagement ring I gave you to wear?" She: "Oh, that's all right. George says he won't object to my wearing it."

He Seemed too Faithful.

Miss Uglymug (an heiress): "Mr. Cashunter, you are the first man who ever kissed me in my life. Do you believe me when I tell you this?" Her Affianced: "Believe you! Well, I should say so." And now the engagement is declared off.

Quite a Lot of Money.

Loving Wife: "Now that you are ruined, James, I will disclose my secret. For years I have been saving up, and now" (pouring a shower of sovereigns into his hat) "this may tide you over." Husband: "Oh, my darling, how did you manage to do it?" Wife: "Easily enough. Every time you spoke cruelly to me I put sixpence into a box."

Would Have Her Own Way.

Mrs. Enpeck: "I think, Henry, that our daughter has made a very satisfactory marriage, and that she will succeed very well in the management of her husband." Henry Enpeck: "Why do you think so?" Mrs. Enpeck: "I overheard her talking to him this morning, and she got him to agree to a proposition like this: 'If you will do as I want, I promise to do the same.'"

He Felt Sure.

"Just think of it, Willie! Both your maiden aunts are coming to make us a visit to-morrow, and cook has just left." "Can't you get them to postpone their visit?" "It's too late." "And what do you propose to do?" "Why, I suppose I'll have to put on an apron and do the cooking myself." "Will you? Then you needn't worry any more. They won't stay long."

Diplomatic.

Wife: "You were intoxicated last night, John. What did you mean by taking more wine after I had told you you'd had enough?" Husband: "You know—er—you looked so sweet, dear, that I was so delighted—er—when I saw two of you, that—er—I was tempted to take a little more to see if I might see three of you, don'tcherknow!" Wife: "Well, you foolish boy, don't do it again, that's all!"

No More to be Admired.

Hilda: "I think, Horace, we had better move to another hotel." Horace: "Why, Hilda, we are delightfully situated." Hilda: "I know, but the people here have seen all my dresses!"

Both Had Changed.

Amanda: "Do you remember ten years ago when you confessed your love for me, how cruelly I refused you? I'm older now, and think differently." Algernon: "Well—er—so do I."

She Objected Also.

The One: "I thought you intended to marry Miss Coldcash?" The Other: "I thought so, too; but her family objected." The One: "What did Miss Coldcash say?" The Other: "Oh, she's one of the family, you know."

Self Evident.

"Although I have granted you this interview," said the pompous new office-holder, "I don't want people to think I'm in the habit of talking for publication." "They won't," replied the reporter, "when they see these remarks in print."

Considerate Son.

"Bertie," said his mother threateningly to the incorrigible, "I am going to tell your father to whip you when he comes home to-night." "Please don't, mamma," replied Bertie penitently; "papa is always so tired when he comes home!"

Willing to Inquire.

Master: "What! both want a holiday to-morrow? I can't spare you both at once. Annie, you can have to-morrow and John the next day." John: "Thank you, sir, but we wanted to get married, and I'm afraid, sir, it can't be done that way, but I'll inquire."

An Easy Matter.

"And are you really going up to London to find your daughter, Margaret?" said the minister to an old parishioner. "Why, how will you ever discover her in that big place?" "Oh, that will be quite easy," was the answer; "Jenny always had her head out of the window when she was at home."

Any Little Thing.

"Oh, Ernest, dear, I have a little favour I'd like to ask you before you go to town to-day," said Mrs. Homely the other morning, as her husband was putting on his overcoat. "Well, what is it?" "I wish you would just help Lizzie to move the piano out of the sitting-room and get down those bookcases. And I want the couch carried out of the room into the garden, where it can be thoroughly dusted. And then, if you'll just lend a hand in getting the carpet on the line, and help Susan to beat it, and take down those large pictures on the sitting-room wall, and carry them out, so that all the dust can be brushed off the back, and—well, if he hasn't gone! That's just like a man! Ask him to do any little thing about the house, and he flies off as if a mad bull were after him! I never saw anything like it!"

He Saw the Point.

"I am glad your name is Mary," said Mr. Slowcoach to his sweetheart, whom he had been courting for several years. "Why so?" "Because I was reading to-day, and came across a line which said: 'Mary is the sweetest name that woman ever bore.'" "That is poetically expressed. I've heard my father say it to my mother, whose name is Mary. It is from some poet, isn't it?" "I believe so." "But I've also heard my father say that there was even a sweeter name than Mary." "I think he must have been mistaken," said the lover, as he tenderly pressed his sweetheart's hand. "No, I do not think he was mistaken." "What was the other name?" A beautiful blush suffused the charming maiden's cheek, the silken lashes fell and veiled the lovely eyes, and in a tone as soft as the whisperings of an Æolian harp she murmured: "Wife." The cards are out.

Digitized by Google

A Story of Love and Crime.

By ARNOLD BENNETT.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CHAPTER.

The Examination of Jules by the Millionaire.

"Do you mean to tell me," asked Racksole, horror-struck by this calm confession, in spite of his previous knowledge, "that you were offered a hundred thousand pounds to poison Prince Eugen?"

"You put it rather crudely," said Jules in reply. "I prefer to say that I was offered a hundred thousand pounds if Prince Eugen should die within a reasonable time."

"And who were your vile employers?"

"That, honestly, I do not know."

"You know, I suppose, who paid you the first fifty thousand pounds, and who promised you the hundred thousand?"

"Well," said Jules, "I know vaguely. I know that he came viâ Vienna from—er—Bosnia. My impression was that the affair had some bearing, direct or indirect, on the projected marriage of the King of Bosnia. He is a young monarch, scarcely out of political leading-strings, as it were, and doubtless his Ministers thought that they had better arrange his marriage for him. They tried last year, and failed because the Princess whom they had in mind had cast her sparkling eyes on another prince. That Prince happened to be Prince Eugen of Posen. The Ministers of the King of Bosnia knew exactly the circumstances of Prince Eugen. They knew that he could not marry without liquidating his debts, and they knew that he could only liquidate his debts through this Jew, Sampson Levi. Unfortunately for me, they ultimately wanted to make too sure of Prince Eugen. They were afraid he might after all arrange his marriage without the aid of Mr. Sampson Levi, and so—well, you know the rest. It's a pity that the poor little innocent King of Bosnia can't have the Princess of his Ministers' choice."

"Then you think that the King himself had no part in this abominable crime?"

"I think decidedly not."

"I am glad of that," said Racksole simply. "And now, the name of your immediate employer."

"He was merely an agent. He called himself Sleszak—S-l-e-s-z-a-k. But I imagine that that wasn't his real name. I don't know his real name. An old man, he often used to be found at the Hotel Ritz, Paris.

"Mr. Sleszak and I will meet," said Racksole.

"Not in this world," said Jules quickly. "He is dead. I heard only last night—just before our little tussle."

There was a silence.

"It is well," said Racksole at length. "Prince Eugen lives, despite all plots. After all, justice is done."

"Mr. Racksole is here, but he can see no one, miss." The words came from behind the door, and the voice was the commissionaire's. Racksole started up, and went towards the door.

"Nonsense," was the curt reply, in feminine tones. "Move aside instantly."

The door opened and Nella entered. There were tears in her eyes.

"Oh! dad," she exclaimed, "I've only just heard you were in the hotel. We looked for you everywhere. Come at once, Prince Eugen is dying——" Then she saw the man sitting on the bed, and stopped.

Later, when Jules was alone again, he remarked to himself, "I may get that hundred thousand."

TWENTY-EIGHTH CHAPTER.

The State Bedroom Once More.

WHEN, immediately after the episode of the bottle of Romanée-Conti in the State dining-room, Prince Aribert and old Hans found that Prince Eugen had sunk in an unconscious heap over his chair, both the former thought, at the first instant, that Eugen must have already tasted the poisoned wine. But a moment's reflection showed that this was not possible. If the Hereditary Prince of Posen were dying or dead, his condition was due to some other agency than the Romanée-Conti. Aribert bent over him, and a powerful odour from the man's lips at once disclosed the cause of the disaster; it was the odour of laudanum. Indeed, the smell of that sinister drug seemed now to float heavily over the whole table. Across Aribert's mind there flashed then the true explanation. Prince Eugen, taking advantage of Aribert's attention being momentarily diverted, and yielding to a sudden impulse of despair, had decided to poison himself, and had carried out his intention on the spot. The laudanum must have been already in his pocket, and this fact went to prove that the unfortunate Prince had previously contemplated such a proceeding, even after his definite promise. Aribert remembered now with painful vividness his nephew's words: "I withdraw my promise. Observe that—I withdraw it." It must have been instantly after the utterance of that formal withdrawal that Eugen attempted to destroy himself.

Digitized by Google

"It's laudanum, Hans," Aribert exclaimed, rather helplessly.

"Surely his Highness has not taken poison?" said Hans. "It is impossible!"

"I fear it is only too possible," said the other. "It's laudanum. What are we to do? Quick, man!"

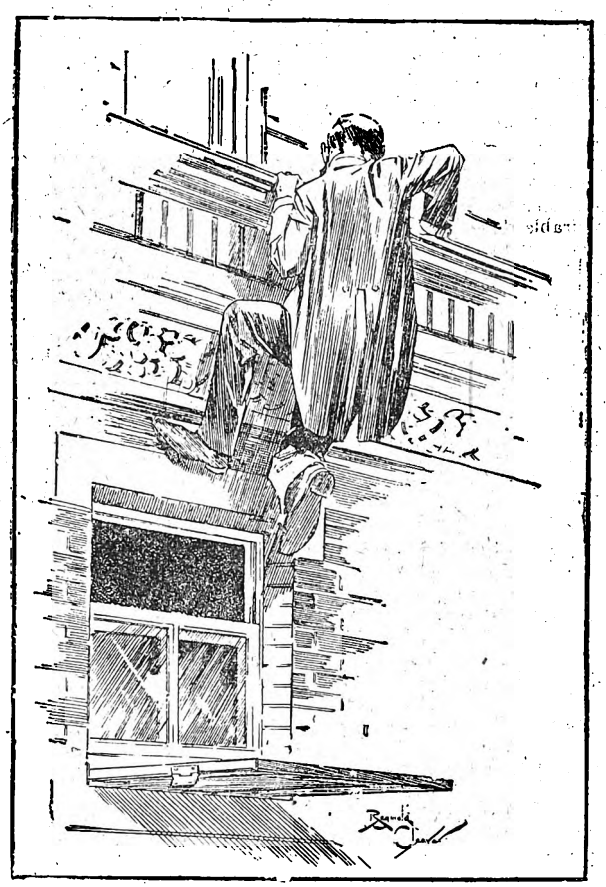
"His Highness must be roused, Prince. He must have an emetic. We had better carry him to the bedroom."

They did, and laid him on the great bed; and then Aribert mixed an emetic of mustard and water, and administered it, but without any effect. The sufferer lay motionless, with every muscle relaxed. His skin was ice-cold to the touch, and the eyelids, half-drawn, showed that the pupils were painfully contracted.

"Go out, and send for a doctor, Hans. Say that Prince Eugen has been suddenly taken ill, but that it isn't serious. The truth must never be known."

"He must be roused, sire," Hans said again, as he hurried from the room.

Aribert lifted his nephew from the bed, shook him, pinched him, flicked him cruelly, shouted at him, dragged him about, but to no avail. At length he desisted, from mere physical fatigue, and laid the Prince back again on the bed. Every minute that elapsed seemed an hour. Alone with the unconscious organism in the silence of the great, stately chamber, under the cold, yellow glare of the electric lights, Aribert became a prey to the most despairing thoughts. The tragedy of his nephew's career forced itself upon him, and it occurred to him that an early and shameful death had all along been inevitable for this good-natured, weak-purposed, unhappy child of a historic throne. A little good fortune, and his character, so evenly balanced between right and wrong, might have followed the proper path, and Eugen might have figured at any rate with dignity on the European stage. But now it appeared that all was over, the last stroke played. And in this disaster Aribert saw the ruin of his own hopes. For Aribert would have to occupy his nephew's throne, and he felt instinctively that Nature had not cut him out for a throne. By a natural impulse he inwardly rebelled against the prospect of monarchy. Monarchy meant so much for which he knew himself to be entirely unfitted. It meant a political marriage, which means a forced marriage, a union against inclination. And then what of Nella—Nella!



How Jules endeavoured to make his escape will be related in our next number.

Hans returned. "I have sent for the nearest doctor, and also for a specialist," he said.

"Good," said Aribert. "I hope they will hurry." Then he sat down and wrote a card. "Take this yourself to Miss Racksole. If she is out of the hotel, ascertain where she is and follow her. Understand, it is of the first importance."

Hans bowed, and departed for the second time, and Aribert was alone again. He gazed at Eugen, and made another frantic attempt to raise him from the deadly stupor, but it was useless. He walked away to the window; through the open casement he could hear the tinkle of passing hansoms on the Embankment below, whistles of door-keepers, and the hoot of the steam-tugs on the river. The world went on as usual, it appeared. It was an absurd world. He desired nothing better than to abandon his princely title, and live as a plain man, the husband of the finest woman on earth. But now! Pah! How selfish he was, to be thinking of himself when Eugen lay dying. Yet—Nella!

The door opened, and a man entered, who was obviously the doctor. A few curt questions, and he had grasped the essentials of the case. "Oblige me by ringing the bell, Prince. I shall want some hot water, and an able-bodied man and a nurse."

"Who wants a nurse?" said a voice, and Nella came quietly in. "I am a nurse," she added to the doctor, "and at your orders."

The next two hours were a struggle between life and death. The first doctor, a specialist who followed him, Nella, Prince Aribert, and old Hans formed, as it were, a league to save the dying man. None else in the hotel knew the real seriousness of the case. When a Prince falls ill, and especially by his own act, the precise truth is not issued broadcast to the universe. According to official intelligence, a Prince is never seriously ill until he is dead. Such is statecraft.

The worst feature of Prince Eugen's case was that emetics proved futile. Neither of the doctors could explain their failure, but it was only too apparent. The league was reduced to helplessness. At last the great specialist from Manchester Square gave it out that there was no chance for Prince Eugen unless the natural vigour of his constitution should prove capable of throwing off the poison unaided by scientific assistance, as a drunkard can sleep off his potion. Everything had been tried, even to artificial respiration and the injection of hot coffee. Having emitted this pronouncement, the great specialist from Manchester Square left. It was one o'clock in the morning. By one of those strange and futile coincidences which sometimes startle us by their subtle significance, the specialist met Theodore Racksole and his captive as they were entering the hotel. Neither had the least suspicion of the other's business.

In the State bedroom the small group of watchers surrounded the bed. The slow minutes filed away in dreary procession. Another hour passed. Then the figure on the bed, hitherto so motionless, twitched and moved; the lips parted.

Digitized by Google

"There is hope," said the doctor, and administered a stimulant which was handed to him by Nella.

In a quarter of an hour the patient had regained consciousness. For the ten thousandth time in the history of medicine a sound constitution had accomplished a miracle impossible to the accumulated medical skill of centuries.

In due course the doctor left, saying that Prince Eugen was "on the high road to recovery," and promising to come again within a few hours. Morning had dawned. Nella drew the great curtains, and let in a flood of sunlight. Old Hans, overcome by fatigue, dozed in a chair in a far corner of the room. The reaction had been too much for him. Nella and Prince Aribert looked at each other. They had not exchanged a word about themselves, yet each knew what the other had been thinking. They clasped hands with a perfect understanding. Their brief love-making had been of the silent kind, and it was silent now. No word was uttered. A shadow had passed from over them, but only their eyes expressed relief and joy.

"Aribert." The faint call came from the bed. Aribert went to the bedside, while Nella remained near the window.

"What is it, Eugen?" he said. "You are better now."

"You think so?" murmured the other. "I want you to forgive me for all this, Aribert. I must have caused you an intolerable trouble. I did it so clumsily; that is what annoys me. Laudanum was a feeble expedient; but I could think of nothing else, and I daren't ask anyone for advice. I was obliged to go out and buy the stuff for myself. It was all very awkward. But, thank goodness, it has not been ineffectual."

"What do you mean, Eugen? You are better. In a day or so you will be perfectly recovered."

"I am dying," said Eugen quietly. "Do not be deceived. I die because I wish to die. It is bound to be so. I know by the feel of my heart. In a few hours it will be over. The throne of Posen will be yours, Aribert. You will fill it more worthily than I have done. Don't let them know over there that I poisoned myself. Swear Hans to secrecy; swear the doctors to secrecy; and breathe no word yourself. I have been a fool, but I do not wish it to be known that I was also a coward. Perhaps it is not cowardice; perhaps it is courage, after all—courage to cut the knot. I could not have survived the disgrace of any revelations, Aribert, and revelations would have been sure to come. I have made a fool of myself, but I am ready to pay for it. We of Posen—we always pay—everything except our debts. Ah! those debts! Had it not been for those I could have faced her who was to have been my wife, to have shared my throne. I could have hidden my past, and begun again. With her help I really could have begun again. But Fate has been against me—always! always! By-the-way, what was that plot against me, Aribert? I forget, I forget."

His eyes closed. There was a sudden noise. Old Hans had slipped from his chair to the floor. He picked himself up, dazed, and crept shamefacedly out of the room.

Aribert took his nephew's hand.

"Nonsense, Eugen! You are dreaming. You will be all right soon. Pull yourself together."

"All because of a million," the sick man moaned. "One miserable million of English pounds. The national debt of Posen is fifty millions, and I, the Prince of Posen, couldn't borrow one. If I could have got it, I might have held my head up again. Good-bye, Aribert. Who is that girl?"

Aribert looked up. Nella was standing silent at the foot of the bed, her eyes moist. She came round to the bedside, and put her hand on the patient's heart. Scarcely could she feel its pulsation, and to Aribert her eyes expressed a sudden despair.

At that moment Hans re-entered the room and beckoned to her.

"I have heard that Herr Racksole has returned to the hotel," he whispered, "and that he has captured that man Jules, whom they say is such a villain."

Several times during the night Nella had inquired for her father, but could gain no knowledge of his whereabouts.

Notes Worth Noticing.

FOR STOUT READERS ONLY.

1. No physical condition is so distressing as abnormal stoutness, especially when accompanied, as it generally is, by weakness, depression, and indifferent health.

2. Stout persons without number have seriously jeopardised health and become debilitated through the rash means they have employed to regain a good figure. The remedies (so called) which they have used have perhaps involved a famine diet, sweating, and drugging with poisonous minerals. These are worse than useless; for if they have the effect of temporarily reducing weight, it is only by a wasting, injurious process.

3. When the constitution is not ruined by such drastic methods, the fat will always develop anew as soon as they are abandoned.

4. It is the worst thing possible to try and continue such methods for any lengthy period. The consequences are very much worse than the disease.

5. What is required is a remedy that will increase strength and nerve force all the time it is absorbing and eliminating the superfluous and diseased fatty deposits from the system.

6. The dangerous fatty layers that cling to the vital organs —the heart and liver—and impede their action must be got rid of for the sake of health, and the excessive subcutaneous fat must be dispersed for the sake of comeliness.

7. "Antipon," the great permanent cure for corpulence, performs this duty with absolute certainty, and at the same time, by its grand tonic action, rapidly reinvigorates the whole system.

8. "Antipon" acts with marvellous rapidity. Within the first day and night of taking it "Antipon" will effect a reduction amounting to 8oz. to 3lb., according to circumstances. Then day by day there is a sure and steady loss of weight until correct proportions and normal weight call for the cessation of the doses.

9. There need be no apprehension lest the fat should re-accumulate. Ordinary prudence will maintain the perfect conditions of health and symmetry re-acquired by this admirable remedy.

10. "Antipon" improves the appetite and promotes digestion, and the extra food taken, which must be of the wholesomest quality, is naturally the source of increased strength and vitality.

11. "Antipon" is entirely harmless, and would not hurt an infant. It is of agreeable flavour and appearance (like a rich red wine), and contains nothing of a mineral nature.

12. "Antipon" is sold by chemists, stores, etc., in bottles, price 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d., from stock or on order; or, should difficulties arise, may be had (on remitting price) post free, privately packed, direct from the sole manufacturers, the "Antipon" Company, 13 Buckingham Street, Strand, London, W.C.

WARM PRAISE FROM THE PRESS

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

"'Antipon' not only speedily absorbs and throws out of the system all superabundant adipose matter, but increases strength and vitality."

THE LADY'S PICTORIAL.

"To reduce superabundant fat is of vital importance. The wonderful new fat absorbent known as 'Antipon' performs this work promptly, safely, and with permanent effect. It goes to the very root of the evil; the cure is complete and permanent."

METHODIST RECORDER.

"It is satisfactory to know that the new cure, 'Antipon,' is the practical result of a specialist's researches and discoveries, so that reliance can be placed upon its efficacy"

PENNY ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

"In 'Antipon,' the great new permanent cure for corpulence, the world is made richer by a marvellous discovery."

Digitized by Google

Now, at half-past six in the morning, a rumour had mysteriously spread among the servants of the hotel about the happenings of the night before. How it had originated no one could have determined, but it had originated.

"Where is my father?" Nella asked of Hans.

He shrugged his shoulders, and pointed upwards. "Somewhere at the top, they say."

Nella almost ran out of the room. Her interruption of the interview between Jules and Theodore Racksole has already been described. As she came downstairs with her father she said again: "Prince Eugen is dying—but I think you can save him."

"I," exclaimed Theodore.

"Yes," she repeated positively. "I will tell you what I want you to do and you must do it."

TWENTY-NINTH CHAPTER.

Theodore is Called to the Rescue.

As Nella passed downstairs from the top storey with her father—the lifts had not yet begun to work—she drew him into her own room, and closed the door.

"What's this all about?" he asked, somewhat mystified, and even alarmed by the extreme seriousness of her face.

"Dad," the girl began, "you are very rich, aren't you?—very, very rich?" She smiled anxiously, timidly. He did not remember to have seen that expression on her face before. He wanted to make a facetious reply, but checked himself.

"Yes," he said, "I am. You ought to know that by this time."

"How soon could you realise a million pounds?"

"A million—what?" he cried. Even he was staggered by her calm reference to this gigantic sum. "What on earth are you driving at?"

"'A million pounds,' I said. That is to say, five million dollars. How soon could you realise as much as that?"

"Oh!" he answered, "in about a month, if I went about it neatly enough. I could unload as much as that in a month without scaring Wall Street and other places. But it would want some management."

"Useless!" she exclaimed. "Couldn't you do it quicker, if you really had to?"

"If I really had to, I could fix it in a week, but it would make things lively, and I should lose on the job."

"Couldn't you," she persisted, "couldn't you go down town this morning and raise a million, somehow, if it was a matter of life and death?"

He hesitated. "Look here, Nella," he said, "what is it you've got up your sleeve?"

"Just answer my question, dad, and try not to think that I'm a stark, staring lunatic."

"I rather expect I could get a million this morning, even in London. But it would cost pretty dear. It might cost me fifty thousand pounds, and there would be the dickens of an upset in New York—a sort of grand universal slump in my holdings."

"Why should New York know anything about it?"

"'Why should New York know anything about it'!" he repeated. "My girl, when anyone borrows a million sovereigns the whole world knows about it. Do you reckon that I can go up to the Governors of the Bank of England and say, 'Look here, lend Theodore Racksole a million for a few weeks, and he'll give you an I O U and a covering note on stocks'?"

"But you could get it?" she asked again.

"If there's a million in London I guess I could handle it," he replied.

"Well, dad," and she put her arms round his neck, "you've just got to go out and fix it. See? It's for me. I've never asked you for anything really big before. But I do now. And I want it so badly."

He stared at her. "I award you the prize," he said, at length. "You deserve it for colossal and immense coolness. Now you can tell me the true inward meaning of all this rigmarole. What is it?"

"I want it for Prince Eugen," she began, at first hesitatingly, with pauses. "He's ruined unless he can get a million to pay off his debts. He's dreadfully in love with a Princess, and he can't marry her because of this. Her parents wouldn't allow it. He was to have got it from Sampson Levi, but he arrived too late—owing to Jules."

"I know all about that—perhaps more than you do. But I don't see how it affects you or me."

"The point is this, dad," Nella continued. "He's tried to commit suicide—he's so hipped. Yes, real suicide. He took laudanum last night. It didn't kill him straight off—he's got over the first shock, but he's in a very weak state, and he says he means to die. And I truly believe he will die. Now, if you could let him have that million, dad, you would save his life."

Nella's item of news was a considerable and disconcerting surprise to Racksole, but he hid his feelings fairly well.

"I haven't the least desire to save his life, Nell. I don't over-much respect your Prince Eugen. I've done what I could for him—but only for the sake of seeing fair play, and because I object to conspiracies and secret murders. It's a different thing if he wants to kill himself. What I say is: Let him. Who is responsible for his being in debt to the tune of a million pounds? He's only got himself and his bad habits to thank for that. I suppose if he does happen to peg out, the throne of Posen will go to Prince Aribert. And a good thing too! Aribert is worth twenty of his nephew."

"That's just it, dad," she said, eagerly following up her chance. "I want you to save Prince Eugen just because Aribert—Prince Aribert—doesn't wish to occupy the throne. He'd much prefer not to have it."

"Much prefer not to have it! Don't talk nonsense. If he's honest with himself, he'll admit that he'll be jolly glad to have it. Thrones are in his blood, so to speak."

"You are wrong, father. And the reason is this: If Prince Aribert ascended the throne of Posen he would be compelled to marry a Princess."

"Well! A Prince ought to marry a Princess."

"But he doesn't want to. He wants to give up all his royal rights, and live as a subject. He wants to marry a woman who isn't a Princess."

"Is she rich?"

"Her father is," said the girl. "Oh, dad! can't you guess? He—he loves me." Her head fell on Theodore's shoulder and she began to cry.

The millionaire whistled a very high note. "Nell!" he said at length. "And you? Do you sort of cling to him?"

"Dad," she answered, "you are stupid. Do you imagine I should worry myself like this if I didn't?" She smiled through her tears. She knew from her father's tone that she had accomplished a victory.

"It's a mighty queer arrangement," Theodore remarked. "But, of course, if you think it'll be of any use, you had better go down and tell your Prince Eugen that that million can be fixed up, if he really needs it. I expect there'll be a decent security, or Sampson Levi wouldn't have mixed himself up in it."

"Thanks, dad. Don't come with me; I may manage better alone."

She gave a formal little curtsey and disappeared. Racksole, who had the talent, so necessary to millionaires, of attending to several matters at once, the large with the small, went off to give orders about the breakfast and the remuneration of his assistant of the evening before, Mr. George Hazell. He then sent an invitation to Mr. Félix Babylon's room, asking that gentleman to take breakfast with him. After he had related to Babylon the history of Jules' capture, and had a long discussion with him upon several points of hotel management, and especially as to the guarding of wine-cellars, Racksole put on his hat, sallied forth into the Strand, hailed a hansom, and was driven to the City. The order and nature of his operations there were too complex and technical to be described here.

(Concluding instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

England Ready!

What would become of England were she not prepared to defend herself against the attack of some unforeseen enemy? She's ready—always ready for anything that may come along. It wouldn't do to wait until the enemy came in full force, for the time that would elapse in preparing for action might prove her undoing. How many people are ready for the enemy Disease? That little ache which keeps creeping in has its significance. Stop and think! If you neglect it now, won't it be all the more difficult to remove later on? An occasional dose of Page Woodcock's Pills is sufficient to keep one in health—to drive out the enemy. Indigestion, Headache, Biliousness, Stomach and Liver troubles, all need immediate attention. Have a box in the house. Any chemist will supply, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d.; or can be obtained, post free for price, from Page Woodcock Limited, 14 & 16 Euston Buildings, N.W. (Late Lincoln.)

MISCELLANEOUS ADVERTISEMENTS

Will be inserted in this column at the rate of 6d. per line of 8 words or part thereof. All advertisements should be addressed to Advertisement Manager, "Short Stories," 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., 11 days prior to date of appearance.

Pawnbroker's Clearance Sale.
10/6. Lady's 18-Carat Gold-Cased Keyless Watch, Jewelled movement, exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also long Watch-guard, 18-Carat Gold (stamped) filled; two together only 10/6; approval.
10/6. Gent's 18-Carat Gold-Cased Chronograph Stop Watch, Jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper; 10 years' warranty; also 18-Carat Gold (stamped) filled Double Curb Albert, Seal attached; three together, 10/6; approval before payment.
19/6. Lady's Six-Guinea Solid Gold Keyless Watch, richly engraved; splendid timekeeper; 10 years' warranty; week's trial; sacrifice 19/6.
10/6. Lady's Solid Gold (hall-marked) Five-Guinea Diamond and Emerald Doublet Half-hoop Ring; large lustrous stones, 10/6; approval.
8/6. Handsome Long Watch-guard.—Real 18-carat gold (stamped) filled; ditto, heavier (extra long), exceptionally choice design, 10/6; approval.
10/6. Field Glass, Four-Guinea Military Binocular: 50 miles' range; 10 Achromatic Crystal Lenses, Wide Field; saddler-made sling case; sacrifice, 10/6; approval.
E. C. DAVIS, 26 Denmark Hill, London.

"Poultry Keeping for Pleasure and Profit," by F.E. Wilson. A thoroughly reliable and practical handbook. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (P. K. Dept.) 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Walking," by C. Lang Neil, is a thoroughly practical guide to pedestrianism, contains information as to how to train in order to become an expert walker, &c. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (W. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Eczema and all Skin Eruptions.—A victim who was cured after 5 years' suffering will gladly send full particulars of an inexpensive guaranteed Cure on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Address: F. M. Pacdderma, 3 Swallow Street, Piccadilly, London.

Teeth Bought, Gold and Platinum. Banker's reference.—Apply, Teeth by Instalments Institute, 48 Edgware Road, W.

Art.—Work at home, tinting prints, post-cards, etc.; easily acquired; good prices.—Addressed envelope, Art Company, 6 Gt. James Street, London, W.C.

Old Artificial Teeth Bought.—Call or forward by post; full value per return, or offer made.—Messrs. O. Browning, Manufacturing Dentists, 133 Oxford Street, London. (Established 100 years.)

"Small Gardens, and How to Make the Most of Them," by Violet Biddle, is just the book for those desirous of procuring the best possible results from their gardens. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (S. G. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Cricket," Edited by G. L. Jessop, contains practical instructions as to how to play the game by K. S. Ranjitsinhji, C. B. Fry, G. L. Jessop, and others. Price 1/2, post free, from the Publisher (C. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Photography.—"How to Take and Fake Photographs," by Clive Holland, contains all information required by the beginner. Price 1/2, post free, from the Publisher (P. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

2/6 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD.
Our warranted Timekeeper, with guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent, post free, to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/6 and four stamps extra for postage. During this month we give absolutely free a Mexican Silver Watch Chain. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.

GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS,
89 Pimlico Road, London, S.W.

£8 10
From 6/- Monthly. Special Offer. 500 New Cycles £3 10s. 500 Genuine B.S.A. £6 10s. Sample Victory Motor Cycle £26. Sent carr. paid before payment. Agents Wanted
Dereham Rd. Cycle Co., Norwich

TO CURE DRUNKARDS
with or without their knowledge. Send Stamp for FREE TRIAL PACKAGE of a wonderful remedy that has saved homes. Send no money. Address in confidence: WARD CHEMICAL Co., 51 Century House, Regent Street, London, W.

REDUCE YOUR BOOT BILLS ONE HALF BY USING "BLAKEY'S" BOOT PROTECTORS INSIST UPON "BLAKEY'S" THE GENUINE ARTICLE

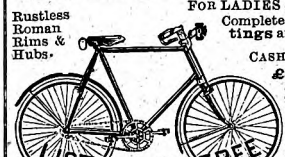
MOTH IN BLANKET
"Ruination"
KEATING'S POWDER
"Preservation"
TINS 3D. 6D. & 1S. BELLOWS 9D.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.
FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN
Complete with All Fittings and Carriage Paid.
Rustless Roman Rims & Hubs.



CASH OR 12 MONTHLY PAYMENTS of
£8 0 0 „ 15/- ea.
8 3 0 „ 15/10 „
9 0 0 „ 16/8 „
9 10 0 „ 17/6 „
JUNO Motor Cycles, 3 H.P., £34, or Monthly Payments.
JUNO Two-Speed Gear Cycles, £12 12s., or 12 Payments of 23/4 each. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories; over 130 pages and Hundreds of Illustrations, sent post free.
Metropolitan Machinists' Co. Ld., S.S. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London E.C.; and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

A Good Cycle
At a FAIR price is cheaper than a poor Cycle AT ANY price. Buy the best and avoid risks.
"CENTAURS," "COVENTRY CHALLENGE," "HUMBERS," "PREMIERS," "ROVERS," "SWIFTS," "SINGERS," &c.
Their names guarantee their quality.

FROM 8/- MONTHLY.
WITHIN YOUR REACH
A HIGH-GRADE COVENTRY CYCLE FOR £6
On approval. Two Years' Warranty. Write for Lists (Free).
EDWARD O'BRIEN Ltd. (Dept. S3).
World's Largest Cycle Dealers, COVENTRY.

RIDER AGENTS WANTED

One in each district to ride and exhibit a sample 1904 Cycle.
Highest grade fully warranted.
British Made Cycles
LATEST MODELS £2-10 to £6
New Departure Coaster Hubs, Best Makes Tyres, and best British made equipment throughout.
200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES all makes, good as new, £1 to £2-10
Great factory clearing sale at half factory prices. Ten Days' Free Trial on every cycle. Money with carriage charges refunded if you are not satisfied.
EARN A CYCLE taking orders from sample machine furnished by us. Our agents are making large profits. Write at once for free catalogues and our special offer. Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonos., half prices.
MEAD CYCLE CO. Dept. 44e
85-97, Paradise Street, Liverpool,
19, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

VARICOSE VEINS,
Bad Legs, etc., are completely cured with inexpensive home-treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full particulars on receipt of 2 stamps.
S. S. ROBERTS,
45 Henley Road, Southsea.

You Can Dress Better and Save Money By using
MAYPOLE SOAP
Colours 4D. per cake — WHICH DYES ANY COLOUR — Black 6D. per cake
BRILLIANT—DURABLE—FAST—ECONOMICAL.
Curtains, Blouses, Frocks, Silks, and Satins made to look like new.
NO MESS—NO TROUBLE.
Send for Free Booklet "THE PERFECTION OF HOME DYEING" to the Maypole Co., 17 Cumming Street London, N.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Results of a Mistake

"SID" is worried. His girl lately went for a holiday, and, while away, wrote to him. He happened, in his reply, to copy the address wrongly, not putting the county, so the letter was returned. There has been a little mistake over the matter, to which neither of them will own, and the result has been that she now goes out, not with "SID," but with "SID'S" friend. Should "SID" write and apologise?

* * * * *

It is always well, "SID," to apologise, especially if, in a dispute with a lady, she happens to be in the wrong. Somebody once said that there is no Pope so infallible as a woman who knows she is in the wrong. She won't, of course, admit that it was her mistake, so why argue about it? It is such a trivial affair that it really doesn't matter. It seems a very little, though, to have severed you. Still I think she is only going out with the other fellow just out of a desire to probe you.

Would It be Cruel?

"PATRICIA" writes to tell me that she is engaged to a man who was formerly very handsome, but who, having met with a serious accident, is now disfigured for life. She asks me whether it would be very heartless and cruel of her if she were to throw him up.

* * * * *

It would be very heartless of her. To like a man solely because he is handsome is a very debased sort of attachment. She must remember that love can overcome all obstacles, and that if she has really been in love with the man she will find that she will learn to love him still in spite of his disfigurement, and perhaps even more truly than heretofore.

Waiting for Trains.

"I AM walking to the station with a young lady," writes "B. T. E." "My train goes at 9.5, hers at 9.15. If I miss mine, I have to wait half-an-hour for the next, and am late for my engagement. Should I wait the ten minutes with the young lady, or would it be pardonable for me to leave her and catch my own train?"

* * * * *

If you have a pressing business engagement, and your engagement with the young lady is not pressing, then she would not expect you to wait with her. If otherwise, then you might spend the additional ten minutes looking after her on the platform. What, after all, would the remaining twenty minutes matter, seeing that you had spent the previous ten so sweetly? Perhaps, further, she might agree to wait until your train departed, and then you, in your turn, might agree to wait until her next one, and so on until, as a final result, you decided to lose all the trains, and yourselves, in the newly-aroused feelings of love.

Breaking the News.

"HAVING had a quarrel with my lover," writes "ROSA," "and having both agreed to break off the engagement, how had the affair better be announced to our various friends? Should I say nothing at all about it, and just leave it to them to find out, or should I tell everybody? Then, do you think it would be wise to tell the whole truth, or should I just say that he has gone away for a time?"

* * * * *

It is always better, in such cases, to blurt out the whole truth. People—the people we all love so dearly—always put the very worst conclusion on any mystery which may be sprung upon them, and if you only told half the truth, people would tell it doubled. So why not calmly tell all your dear friends that you have definitely broken off the engagement—make it quite clear that you have broken it off, not he—and you will save them the trouble of inventing the fact.

A Girl With a Temper.

"I AM engaged," writes "B. P.," "and have found my sweetheart so far to have a sweet nature, and very fascinating character. The other day, however, I saw her for the first time amongst her family. I then realised that she had a fearful temper, and spoke in the most snappy way to the others in the house. It has altered my opinion of her to some extent. Do you think I ought to break it off?"

* * * * *

I wouldn't do that. If so far she has shown herself to have a sweet character, and without any affectation, is not that enough for you? The temper she displays in home life, of course, might be in future turned on to yourself. But I rather think, had you been the kind of person to rouse her temper, she would have shown it before, unless, of course, she is a very practised actress, of which you are the best judge. Generally speaking, every woman should have some kind of temper, as the entirely sweet, amiable creature, is often weak-minded, and not best able to manage a home, a family, and a servant, or deal with tradesmen. A little temper on a wife's part, so far from spoiling married happiness, often acts as a check to her husband, and he has much more respect for a woman, occasionally aroused, than he would have for one who has never been known to get ruffled. Take your wife, temper and all. I don't suppose you yourself are entirely free from a bit of it, supposing you to be a man of average character.

Should She Go to the Wedding?

"LILLIE," and her sweetheart have had a quarrel, since which she has been asked to his brother's wedding. She wants to know whether she should go, as her sweetheart will be there. The cause of their estrangement was that the young man had been keeping company with another young lady, who had, however, since given him up.

* * * * * * *

I am sorry to hear of your little trouble; but I cannot suggest a more excellent preparation towards a reconciliation than your attending the wedding. The marriage ceremony is a splendid advertisement for the matrimonial state, and few men and women can attend one without turning their attention in that direction themselves. Now you and your estranged lover will both be there. You will both think of matrimony, and will both realise that the partner of your respective hearts is in that very place of worship. Could anything but a complete reconciliation come of such a thing, supposing, of course, that you still love each other?

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"The Most Perfect Form of Cocoa."

—Guy's Hospital Gazette.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa

300 Gold Medals, &c.

TRY ALSO FRY'S COCOA AND MILK.

A Combination of FRY'S PURE COCOA with the Best English Milk.

MADE INSTANTLY WITH BOILING WATER.

NO MILK OR SUGAR REQUIRED.

"Refreshing and Nutritive."—Lancet.

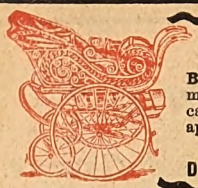
Digitized by Google



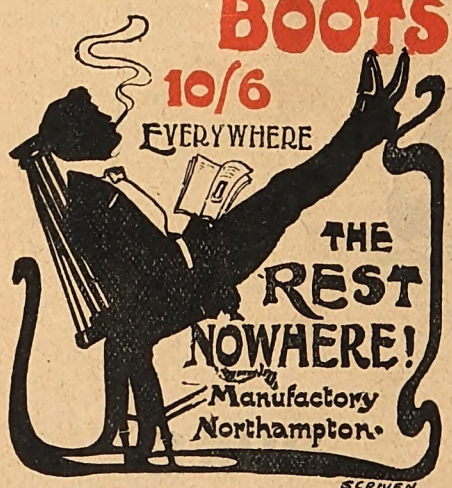
BABY CARS.

Buy direct and save 5/- in the £. Easy Payments from 3/6 Monthly. Good discount for cash. Every Car sent carriage paid, on approval. Our Catalogue shows many lovely styles, send for it.

DIRECT PUBLIC SUPPLY CO., COVENTRY.

"OCEANIC" BOOTS

10/6 EVERYWHERE



FENDERS AND BEDSTEADS

of Every Description Direct from Works.

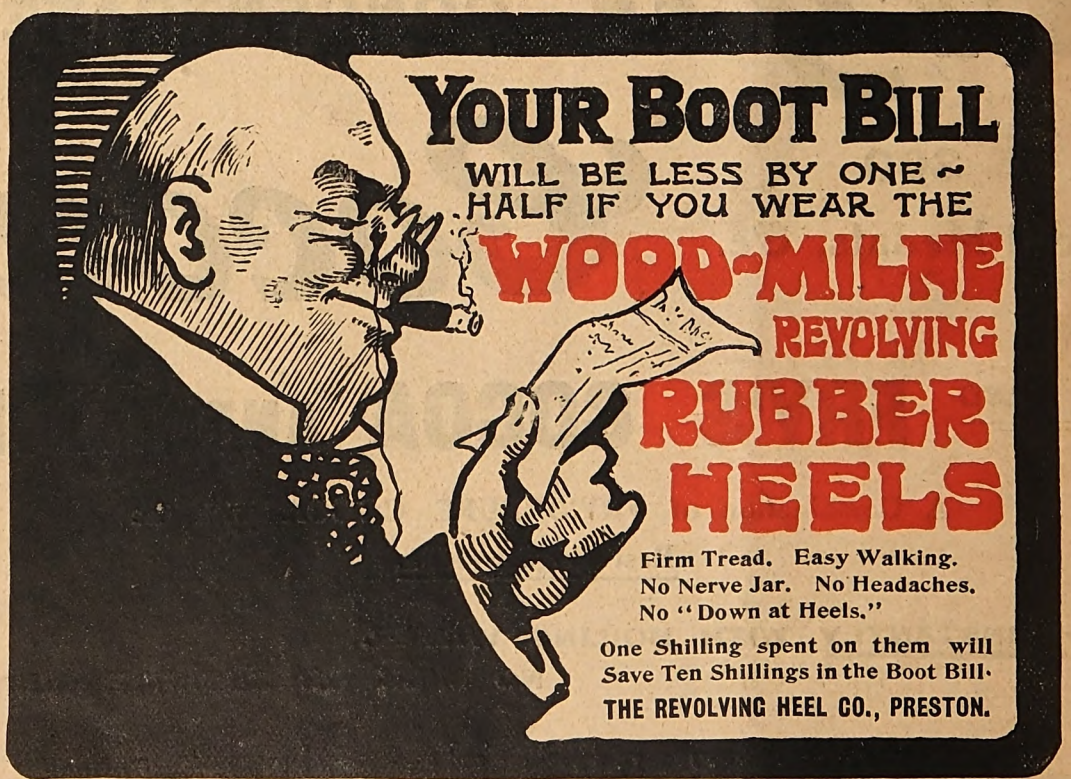
Also CURBS, FIRE IRONS, BRASSES, FIRE GUARDS, &c.

Send particulars of your requirements.
Sketches and Prices can be sent on at once.

SPARKHILL FENDER AND BEDSTEAD CO.,
B88 DURHAM ROAD, BIRMINGHAM.

Phosphates are necessary to natural nourishment, and you get them in

CEREBOS SALT.



YOUR BOOT BILL

WILL BE LESS BY ONE-HALF IF YOU WEAR THE

WOOD-MILNE REVOLVING RUBBER HEELS

Firm Tread. Easy Walking.
No Nerve Jar. No Headaches.
No "Down at Heels."

One Shilling spent on them will Save Ten Shillings in the Boot Bill.

THE REVOLVING HEEL CO., PRESTON.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 807.] Week Ending June 18, 1904. [Price One Penny.

Next Tuesday this paper will appear under the title of SMITH'S WEEKLY. The paper will be built up on quite new and popular lines. It will contain a complete novelette of some ten or twelve thousand words in length. These novelettes will be written each week by popular authors.

At least a dozen capital articles will be found in the paper, each one of interest and written by an expert writer. A new feature will be introduced under the title of QUIET THOUGHTS FOR SUNDAY, and will contain the brightest bits from the brightest of the Sunday journals.

Besides this, there will be a big competition in which £500 and a huge number of beautiful silver brooches are offered in prizes to readers.

Finally, we come to the serial story written by Arthur Applin, the famous author of so many great serials, entitled "THE CLATTER OF THE CLOGS." This serial will deal with life in a factory town, and is full of human interest.

Altogether you will find in SMITH'S WEEKLY all you found in SHORT STORIES, with the addition of an enormous amount of general reading matter thrown in free of cost.

Remember that when you go to purchase next week's number of this paper you must ask, not for SHORT STORIES, but for SMITH'S WEEKLY.

Digitized by Google

. . THE . .

KODAK

AT THE SEASIDE.

NO Holiday can be complete without a Kodak. It does away with the tedium of holiday-making by providing a wholly fascinating and profitable recreation.

For £1 you can buy a serviceable little Kodak with all the appliances of picture-making, including the Daylight Developing Machine, and by its use you can secure valuable records of the charming places you visit and the friends you meet. You can make pictures of your children in their happiest surroundings, and your records will enable you to live the holiday over again.

The new Kodak photography needs no dark-room and no previous experience. It is free from all mess and staining, adding very little to the cost of a holiday, but everything to its enjoyment. We will forward an illustrated booklet which will tell you all about it if you will send a post-card to

KODAK Ltd., 41-43 Clerkenwell Rd., LONDON, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; and 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow.
Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, W.; 171-173 Regent Street, W.; and 40 Strand, London, W.C.

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY!

This Phenomenal Offer is made to the readers of "Short Stories," 18/6/1904. On receipt of Postal Order for 5/-, we will forward, Direct from our Looms to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in 30 different patterns and art colourings, to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for our goods below the actual cost of production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms thus saving the purchasers all middle profits.

OVER 200,000 SOLD DURING THE PAST 12 MONTHS.

GIVEN AWAY! GIVEN AWAY!

With every Carpet we shall Absolutely Give Away a very handsome Rug to match, or we will send 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs for 5/6.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.
Thousands of Repeat Orders and Unsolicited Testimonials Received.
Illustrated Bargain Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Table Linen Curtains, &c., post free.

F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.) Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants.
WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Sale Price: 3/6 Postage 4d. extra.

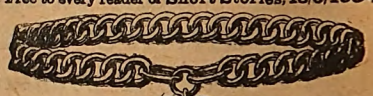
Free Gifts. Sizes: 38, 40, 42

F. HODGSON & SONS, City of Leeds, will Present Free to every reader of Short Stories, 18/6/1904



carriage paid, on receipt of postal order for 3/6, with stamps 4d. extra, for postage, for one of our Ladies' Beautiful Tailor Made Cloth Serge Dress Costume Skirts, in Black or Navy, richly trimmed with mercerised silk stay-pings, and fitted with good linenette pocket. We shall include FREE with each Skirt a Massive 18-ct. Gold Pattern Curb Bracelet, with Heart Pendant mounted with Pearls and Turquoise, and scented with Forget-me-Nots. Cased with Pure Gold.

Money willingly returned if not approved. Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Curtains, &c., post free.

Address: F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.), Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

A medicine of which the people have long known the remedial value in

BILIOUS AND LIVER DISORDERS,

SICK-HEADACHE, FAILING APPETITE,

LANGUOR AND WANT OF TONE,

caused by depressed conditions of the nervous system. In all such cases it is not too much to say that the benefit to be derived from a judicious use of

BEECHAM'S PILLS

is practically known all over the world.

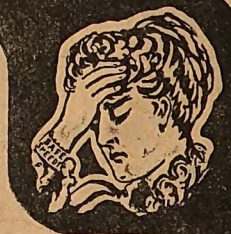
BEECHAM'S PILLS

are specially suitable for Females of all ages. Every woman who values health should read the instructions wrapped round each box.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1s. 1½d. (56 pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 pills).

ONE DOSE of

Kaputine cures in Ten minutes the most violent Headache or Neuralgic Pain no matter what the cause of the attack.



KAPUTINE is not an aperient, but is for one purpose only—to cure Headache and Neuralgia.

KAPUTINE

Cures in Ten Minutes.

Kaputine goes right to the seat of the trouble—the Nerves—it puts the Nerves right, that is why it cures almost instantly

Headache or Neuralgia.

Refuse dangerous white Headache Powders, such as have been condemned by the press. Demand Kaputine, the remedy that is backed up by medical testimony—the Safe Remedy.

Packets of 18 doses 1s.; Samples 1d. each. Of all Medicine Dealers.

Samples Free from Proprietors:
C. G. Kaputine, Huddersfield.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Don't forget that the title of SHORT STORIES next Tuesday will be SMITH'S WEEKLY.

SHORT STORIES

No. 807.] [ONE PENNY.

Week Ending June 18th, 1904.

The Intervention of "Fluff."

TELLING THE LOVE STORY OF THE MAN WHO WAITED.

"So 'Fluff's' coming home?"

Rachel nodded. "Yes, she has had a long ramble through France, Germany, and Italy, with the Delameres. They have globe-trotted her to death nearly—but I fancy it has done her good. She will be home in time for her nineteenth birthday."

The man who had opened the conversation about "Fluff" was a clean-limbed, typical Britisher. His eyes were blue, his skin healthy, and his mouth well-cut and decided. In age he was nearly forty, though he did not look it, and socially he was the elder son and heir of Sir Charles Hastie—an all-round, good sportsman, a genuine friend—and—the despair of every mother in Society with marriageable daughters. Maurice Hastie was impervious to their wiles, and neither loved nor rode away. People called him at last an "incurable bachelor."

Only Rachel Vanbrugh knew why he had remained so long a bachelor. She herself was the elder daughter of the Vicar of Lullworth, and her beautiful, grave face, with its flashing, sombre eyes of velvet brown, and tender mouth, were enshrined in Maurice Hastie's heart, a talisman against all other charms.

"So you will have 'Fluff' to chaperon now, eh?" he said, after a pause, during which he had flicked carelessly at the long grass at his feet.

"Yes," she replied, with a wistful smile. "'Fluff' is nineteen—she is to come out, and I shall chaperon her."

He frowned. "You only are to blame for that, Rachel," he said quickly. "Years ago I asked you to be my wife, and I ask you again to-day. Darling, will you change your mind, and cease to wait for a man who by this time——" He stopped abruptly, and she finished his sentence with a slight smile—"who by this time has probably forgotten that I am waiting for him?"

Then she shook her head. "No, Maurice, I promised Guy Barrington to wait till he returned to England. He said it might be five or seven years before he made his fortune in Australia—but he left me his affianced wife, and he must find me the same when he returns."

He made an impatient movement. "You are too quixotic, Rachel," he said half-tenderly, half-ruefully. "The seven years Guy Vanbrugh prescribed as the limit to the period of waiting, are nearly over—what then? You were young seven years ago, and had hardly seen anything of the world, or of men; the promise you made then may now become a fetter. Suppose," he turned to her suddenly, "suppose you should find Guy Barrington had changed with the years, would it break your heart?"

For a moment she did not reply, then when her answer came it caused the blood in her veins to run riot.

She looked at him, then a slow colour stained her face, lending a deeper glow to her eyes.

"Guy Barrington," she began slowly, twisting and untwisting a spray of lilies in her hand, "took away with him what I thought was my heart—but now I know that it was only that portion of one's heart that is given to an esteemed friend or cousin. It—it would not be damaged if he dropped it."

He caught her hand. "Then—Rachel—your heart—the kernel of your heart—is in whose keeping?"

She raised her eyes and looked at him steadily. Her face was very pale now, and when she spoke her voice trembled.

"It is in my own keeping," she said slowly. "In honour bound, it can be in no other now."

"And for the sake of a principle you would spoil not only your own life, but someone else's too," he said bitterly. "You good women are very cruel."

"It is you who are cruel," she answered. "You think only of yourself. You don't consider my position. I want help for I am weak, and it is hard to always put one's chances of happiness on one side, but I gave my word—my honour must at least be clear from contumely—and when Guy Barrington returns, I shall redeem my promise and marry him."

"If he does not return?" he breathed hoarsely.

Her eyes flashed into his with a sudden light. "Then I can give my hand where I have perhaps already given my heart."

He rose and crossed over to her. "Rachel—this must not happen. If only Guy Barrington——"

He stopped suddenly. The maid had come down the steps that led across the lawn to the summer-house, and in her hand there was a salver on which two letters lay.

Digitized by Google

Rachel took them up carelessly, then she started as she looked at the handwriting on one of the envelopes. The letter had been addressed to the old vicarage they had left years ago, and had been forwarded from place to place.

She opened it with trembling fingers, and read the few lines hurriedly.

"My Dearest Rachel," they ran, "I left Australia by the P. and O. 'Asia,' and as I was seedy I vacated the boat at Marseilles and came on to Nice to recoup. I shall soon, however, be in England, and then shall hope to return to Australia with you as my wife.—With love, yours in great haste,

"Guy Barrington."

She crushed it in her hand, then glanced at Maurice Hastie. He was pale and his mouth was set in a grim line.

"He is coming back," she said simply. "He is at Nice now. We shall return to Australia when he is better."

He winced. The possessive pronoun hurt him.

"Then I shall go away," he said, after a pause. "I cannot stay here." He took her hand in his. "Tell me, Rachel—must your honour rooted in dishonour stand? Must you marry Guy Barrington?"

She bowed her head. "I must. He has come for me!"

He raised her hand to his lips. "Then good-bye. I shall not see you again."

He turned and walked down the wide velvet lawn, out through the little white gate, and Rachel, standing where he had left her, watched his head disappear over the top of the high hedge that skirted the road. Then she sat down to think. She was a woman of twenty-nine—and she knew that she had sent away her life's happiness for the sake of honour!

Suddenly she remembered the second letter. It was from "Fluff," whose real name was Rosamund, but from her babyhood she had always been "Fluff." Rachel had taken the place of the mother who had died when "Fluff" was a tiny thing, and she regarded the little winsome sister, who was ten years her junior, in the light of a sacred charge from the mother she had adored.

"My Dearest Rachel," "Fluff" wrote, "We are having such a splendid time here. Nice is filling up now for the carnival season, and everything is very gay. We are going to have a carriage in the procession of the first Battle of Flowers. I wish you were here, dear. Mrs. Delamere has met a lot of friends at the Hôtel des Anglais—one man I specially like. He is a rich Australian squatter, but doesn't look a bit like my idea of a person who 'squats,' being very English, and handsome. I shall come home next month with the Delameres. Give my love to father and Maurice Hastie, if you see him. Your loving,

"Fluff."

Rachel sighed—then smiled. "Happy 'Fluff'! She has just to gather the rosebuds of life now—the thorns have not yet touched her fingers."

The month had come and gone. "Fluff" was home once more, and after the first flush of sisterly greeting, and the usual flood of rippling nonsense from the younger sister, Rachel noticed a change in her little charge. A change not so much of manner or appearance, but one that left her sometimes pensive when others laughed, or sent a vivid colour into her rose-tinted cheeks at the sudden sight of the letter-bag, leaving it pale again as the petals of a creamy gloire de dijon.

Rachel noted all these signs in her little sister, and wondered whether she had left her frivolous, butterfly heart on the Riviera. She hoped not. She was fearful of losing too soon the gay, lovable little creature, whose moods were as variable as an April sky.

Of her own pain she never spoke. Maurice Hastie had left Lullworth, and gone abroad. She had not seen him since that day in the summer-house. And she had not heard again from the man to whom her word was plighted. She did not speak of the letter she had received from Marseilles; her father was ignorant that Guy Barrington was again in Europe, and as for "Fluff," she only knew that for years her sister had been writing letters to a man abroad. She did not even know his name.

The sisters were sitting together one morning when the post came in. "Fluff" sprang up from her chair, and took them in her hand. Her eyes were sparkling and her cheeks flushed.

"Two for you, Rachel—and"—she stopped suddenly, gazing at the third letter with dilated eyes. "I wonder," she said slowly, "is this for you, Rachel—or for me? It is addressed to 'Miss R. Vanburgh,' and has been re-directed from the old vicarage and from auntie's on to here. But the writing seems familiar to me. I thought it might be for—for me."

Rachel rose, and took the letter in her hand; one glance told her that it was from Guy Barrington. He had evidently imagined that she was still in the old vicarage, where they had first become engaged seven years ago.

"It is for me, dear," she replied quietly. "From the man whom I promised to marry when you were a little girl years ago. He is back in England after being away seven years."

"Fluff" buried her face in a vase of deep-crimson roses. "I forgot," she murmured. "What is your fiancé's name Rachel? Fancy my not knowing my future brother-in-law's name."

"It is Guy Barrington, dear," Rachel began, opening the letter with reluctant fingers.

A little cry came from the girl bending over the flowers.

"Have you pricked yourself, 'Fluff'?" her sister said absently.

"Fluff" turned a white, quivering face to her. "Yes—only a thorn," she replied, with a faint laugh. "I forgot that such a beautiful thing as a rose had thorns!"

Rachel sighed. A line from some poet ran in her head. "He who wakes to love, must needs wake to pain." Surely she had met both the rose and the thorn in her love! And perhaps even little "Fluff." She glanced up quickly, but "Fluff" had vanished.

The letter she had received from Guy Barrington informed her that he would be with her the following evening to dinner. So it was with a sense of reluctance that she wrote, and, at her father's request, invited him to make the vicarage his headquarters while in Lullworth.

When he arrived the following evening, it was the half-hour before dinner, and Rachel, dressed in a gown of crimson chiffon, that made her resemble some graceful lotus flower, waited in the drawing-room to receive him. Her hands were icy cold and she shivered like a criminal in the dock expecting to hear the dreaded sentence. She hated herself for feeling like that, when the poor man who loved her, and who had worked for her sake, was returning to claim only what was legitimately his.

The door opened and the servant announced "Mr. Barrington." A tall, dark man with a brown skin and keen, blue eyes came towards her. "Well, Rachel," he said, when he had touched her cheek with his moustached mouth, "you see I have turned up after all, dear. You have altered a little—not much though," he went on, as though eager to make conversation. "Perhaps a little graver and more dignified—but then we are both getting weighed down by our responsibilities to be too gay."

"Are you better now?" she said quietly. "You don't look as though you had been very ill."

He flushed. "No. I was a bit chippy at first, but then I bucked up wonderfully when I got to the South of France. Met a lot of friends there."

He rose and strolled across to a table, on which stood a lot of photographs. There was the latest of "Fluff" taken at Nice. It was a panel, and she looked a very lovely little Dresden china sort of figure—her yellow hair framing her dainty head like an aureole.

"Who is this?" he said abruptly.

"My little sister 'Fluff,'" she answered. "You will see her at dinner."

He put the photograph back silently, and when he spoke again it was in a preoccupied manner.

At dinner, a message came from "Fluff's" room to say she had a bad headache, and wished to be excused, and Rachel missed the bright, racy chatter of her little sister.

Digitized by Google

The following morning she was not present when "Fluff" met Mr. Barrington, but was pained and surprised to see that, as the days went on, "Fluff" grew paler and thinner, and Guy Barrington moody and taciturn. She was sorry they did not seem to hit it off. She had hoped that "Fluff" would have helped her with her burden of entertaining, but since they seemed to shun each other's society, the effort of appearing bright and sociable fell upon her own shoulders. And it was a burden heavier than she had anticipated, for she was informed by a friend that the rumour was going about that at last Maurice Hastie had become a convert to the fascinations of femininity, and was shortly to be married to an American beauty whom he had met abroad. Though it was ignoble to resent his finding happiness elsewhere, while she could never be anything to him, yet she felt a twinge of pain shoot through her, as she thought of that other woman being the wife of the man she loved — yes — loved — while her word was given to another.

It was one morning in such a mood that she sought the quiet of the summer-house, where Maurice Hastie had said "Good-bye!" She had left her future husband writing letters, and "Fluff" of late had been strangely prone to seeking solitude.

As she sat thinking on the events of the past few weeks, voices at the back of the summer-house roused her from her reverie. They were those of Guy Barrington and "Fluff."

She rose to call them, then a word fell on her ears, freezing the blood in her veins, and making her powerless to move.

"Darling," said the voice of her affianced husband, in tones of passionate love, such as she had never heard from him, even in the early days of their engagement. "This can't go on 'Fluff,' sweetheart! How did I know that she was your sister when we met at Nice? The similarity of the names did not even strike me. I met you and loved you at first sight. I could not help it—it just came to me, and I forgot Rachel till afterwards, when it was too late. I loved you, and you only, desperately, passionately!"

"Hush," said the low, sobbing tones of "Fluff's" pretty voice, "you have no right to speak like that. It was a cruel mistake that we met; we must forget it, that's all. Rachel loves you—and trusts in your honour. You must not betray her! We must forget everything!"

"And you?" said the man. "Are you to be sacrificed, 'Fluff,' to an empty principle?"

The listening woman in the summer-house started. Those were, the very words that Maurice Hastie had said to her, "An empty principle." And now another man—her future husband—was saying them to her sister!

"I shall go away," answered "Fluff" unsteadily, "when you and Rachel are married."

Maurice peered through the French windows and saw Rachel looking infinitely weary and sad.

"Oh, sweetheart!" groaned the man, and then Rachel softly left the summer-house, and made her way to her bedroom. She could not listen to any more. The words of love she had heard burnt into her brain, and seared her heart with the rod of humiliation. For this—she thought bitterly, she had flung away the substance for the shadow! In sticking to a principle she had brought misery upon four people—Maurice Hastie, Barrington, "Fluff,"—and —herself. They were all victims beneath the Juggernaut of "Honour." And now the only thing "Honour" could do was to let her at least make two of the victims happy!

After dinner—at which meal "Fluff" did not appear, and Barrington forced himself to make conversation—Rachel said:

"I want to have a chat with you, Guy; come into the library."

He followed slowly, listening for the sound of another skirt, the thrill of another voice.

Rachel faced him calmly. "I have been thinking," she said slowly, "that the years have changed us both, Guy. And what we fancied love was only the attraction of propinquity. I want you to let me give you back this ring—I think it will fit someone else."

"What is the meaning of this, Rachel?" he said unsteadily. "What do you know?"

"Enough to be quite sure that our marriage would be a great mistake," she answered quietly. "I think you would fail in making me happy, but would succeed with—'Fluff.'"

Digitized by Google

"Rachel!" he broke in hoarsely, "you must think me a blackguard."

She smiled. "No, only very foolish not to have been quite frank with me. It would have spared a great deal of pain that cannot be undone."

He flashed a keen glance at her. Somehow her dark, southern beauty had never appeared so alluring. "This will not hurt you, Rachel?" he said quickly. "There is someone else——"

"There is no one else—now," she answered, then added quickly, "now go to the drawing-room; you will find 'Fluff' waiting."

With a shame-faced air, yet a gladness in his eyes, he stole out of the room, and Rachel was left alone.

Six months later a tall, tanned Englishman turned into the Hotel Paris at Monte Carlo. He engaged a room, then scribbled his name in the visitors' book. As his eyes scanned the page before him, they fell upon a name that sent the blood throbbing through his veins, and left even his lips pale. The name was "Mr. and Mrs. Guy Barrington," and maid.

That was all, yet the sight of that simple announcement was an unexpected blow. He had heard of the marriage of the Rev. Cyril Vanbrugh's daughter, but had read no more, and after wandering from place to place, had come to Monte Carlo to dispel his thoughts at the tables.

"Rachel here," he muttered. "I can't stay and meet her. I dare not. It would undo all the good resolutions I have made, and I should forget everything except my love for her. I must get away as soon as possible, and put the seas between us."

Old Sir Charles had died only two months before, and now Maurice was "Sir Maurice Hastie," but his accession to wealth and position had not driven from his memory the vision of that proud, beautiful woman whose lofty ideals had sent him from her side. He wondered feverishly whether she ever thought of him! Whether, as "Mrs. Guy Barrington," she remembered him—the lonely man—sacrificed for honour; a mistaken sense of honour, while she had lent herself to a loveless marriage!

He played recklessly at the roulette table, and curious eyes watched him, as his very recklessness seemed to bring him good luck, and a few superstitious habitues began to place their money on his number.

Suddenly a voice—a clear, girlish voice—fell upon his ears.

"Maurice—you here! Oh, I am glad to meet you!"

He turned quickly and looked down into the fair, fragile loveliness of "Fluff"—Rachel's sister.

"Why, 'Fluff,'" he stammered, "I am surprised to see you—are you—are you with your sister?"

She stole a quick glance at him. "No, I am with someone else," she answered demurely. "You have not congratulated me yet."

"On what?"

"Why—my marriage!" she exclaimed, in surprise. "I am Mrs. Guy Barrington!"

A light seemed to dance before Maurice's eyes, and a thousand drums to beat in his ears.

"You—you!" he said hoarsely. "Why—then—where is Rachel? What does this mean?" he stammered.

"Rachel found out that Guy and I loved each other," "Fluff" said softly, "and not loving him herself, she gave him to me. She was noble and self-sacrificing, and—and"—she whispered suddenly—"I want to do her a good turn, Maurice—I have learnt a lot since then. She thinks you are engaged—we were told so—but I know you are not so, just hurry back as fast as you can, and make Rachel Lady Hastie!"

"I engaged?" he said. "Why I only loved Rachel—no one else."

"Then go and tell her so," she retorted. "She's longing to hear it!"

He took her hand in his.

"'Fluff,' if this place were not what it is, I would take the kiss I missed on your wedding-day."

* * * * *

Within twenty-four hours Maurice was again in England. He arrived at the vicarage one evening, just before the blinds were drawn in the drawing-room. He paused outside the long French windows, and saw Rachel alone, and looking infinitely weary and sad. His heart contracted. He—he—was the cause of that sadness.

He pushed the window softly; it yielded, and he stood in the room.

"Rachel," he whispered. "Sweetheart! I have come back!"

She turned startled eyes upon him—her colour paling with terror.

"What do you mean?" she faltered. "You must not come here, Maurice—you are bound now."

"No—no—that is all false," he answered quickly. "There is no barrier between us, beloved—I have come to you for my reward!"

He drew her into his arms and kissed her.

"For seven years Jacob served for his Rachel," he whispered. "How long must I serve for mine? Not twice seven, darling. I have done that already."

She raised her face to his.

"Just so long as you wish, Maurice."

Blanche Eardley.

. . READ "YOUR EDITOR CHATS" ON PAGE 783 . .

FOR FULL PARTICULARS ABOUT THE SPLENDID NEW PAPER "SMITH'S WEEKLY."

Digitized by Google

THE - - - BLIND ARTIST.

Telling of the Frightful Revenge He Contemplated, and of the Manner in which He was Frustrated.

"WILL someone be good enough to take me across the road?"

The question was asked near one of the great London thoroughfares, and the speaker was a tall, well-set-up man whose most striking feature was his freely-growing grey beard; in his right hand he carried a stout stick, and one glance at his face was sufficient to show that he was totally blind.

"Yes, certainly; take my arm," replied a fresh-looking young girl, transferring the portfolio she carried to her left hand as she spoke.

The blind man started a little, then took her arm and submitted to her leading him across the busy street.

"Thanks," he said, when they reached the kerbstone.

"Oh, don't mention it," she said brightly, and was going on when he stopped her by a question.

"One moment, if you can spare it. What is your name?"

"Evelyn Grey," she replied, willing to humour one so afflicted, strange though the inquiry might be.

"Evelyn Grey," he repeated slowly. "And are you very busy just now, Evelyn Grey?"

"Not very."

"Not too busy to walk with me a hundred yards to where I live in Sandport Street?"

Evelyn considered. It was an odd demand on so short an acquaintance; indeed, the whole thing was as curious an experience as she had had, but the place he mentioned was much frequented, and there seemed no harm in gratifying his whim. She consented to accompany him if it would give him any pleasure.

Accordingly they walked on together, the blind man tapping the pavement kerb with his stick as they went.

"You are quite young, by your voice," he observed, "and I so seldom fall in with young people that their presence affords me great pleasure."

They talked for the remainder of the short distance on indifferent subjects. Presently the blind man stopped at what appeared to be his own door. He lifted his broad-brimmed felt hat very courteously and thanked her again for her kindness.

"I daresay we shall meet again sometime," she said as she took her leave; "I live near here myself."

"I hope that may be the case, and that if you should see me—you have the advantage of me there, you know—you will not fail to speak to me."

She promised him and went on home, feeling peculiarly happy under the consciousness of having performed a kind action.

Meanwhile the blind man mounted the stairs to his lodgings with an ease born of long habit. He seated himself in an armchair, rested his head on his two hands, and heaved a deep sigh.

"At last!" he murmured. "After I had given up all hope, spent all I could possibly afford; and now, by sheer chance, the game falls into my hands. From to-day I can order things as I wish. I must think. It won't do to bungle it now. One thing is clear, I must have another interview. I think I can count upon that; she's young, she will rejoice in the idea of doing good to a poor blind wretch—ha! ha!" He laughed mirthlessly, and the sound was not pleasant to hear. "She'll come again, she'll come again; I'd have frightened her if I had asked more questions, or I'd have liked to learn more. Never mind." Here he rose from his seat and leant against the chimney-piece. Anyone coming into the room would have said he was looking at his own reflection in the glass above it. He passed his hand across the mirror and continued his monologue in an undertone.

"There you are, Alphonse Gerard, there you are, though these eyes cannot see you. Much changed you must be since I last saw you in a looking-glass. Your hair is nearly white, they say, and your face is lined with twenty years' suffering—mental and physical suffering. Suffer you must, my friend, till the end of your days, but those who made you suffer shall not escape, long though they have eluded me. Take comfort, Alphonse Gerard."

Two days after Evelyn Grey was in the park when her new acquaintance passed quite close to her. She called out "Good morning," in her cheery way; and the blind man turned, came up to the seat where she was taking a short rest and sat down upon it.

"This is kind of you," he said, removing the felt hat.

"Only the terms of the compact," she replied. "Do you often walk here?"

"Very often. I like to hear the trees rustle and the birds chirping in them. I wish they let us walk on the grass. I can't see it, but I should like to feel it under my feet."

She looked at him with intense pity in her big blue eyes. "And to think that is all you have of these things," she said, half to herself.

"That's all; but this is a depressing subject. Let us talk of something else. Tell me what you do all day."

"I paint as long as it is daylight, and in the evening I draw."

"Oh, you are an artist, I perceive."

"Trying to be one, that is all. I came to London a few months ago to study."

"Do you live alone in London? Surely you are rather young for that?"

"I'm nearly twenty," she said, laughing.

"Not more? It's too young, I say."

"But I don't live alone; I live with my cousin near the Art School. We share rooms; she is a great deal older than I am; but we get on very well together."

"What made you think of being an artist? Have you to get your living?"

"I expect I shall have to some day, but I'm afraid I shall never paint well enough for that. My mother is down in the country; she is a nurse and her present case is away in Devon."

"And your father?"

"He was an artist, too, but he died many years ago. And I cannot let mother work to keep me for ever, you see."

"I wish I could see some of your painting, I should soon be able to tell," he murmured; "but there, it is useless to talk of it."

Digitized by Google

"Do you—used you to paint?" asked the girl earnestly.

"I was an artist when I was your age."

"An artist—and you have lost your eyes!" she cried.

"Yes," he said, "that's the story. You can see these trees, these colours, these lights and shades, shapes and forms; you live by the sight of them as I did once; while I—well, you see what I am."

"Oh, I am sorry for you!" she said, and emboldened by heartfelt sympathy, ventured to lay her hand on his shoulder.

"I think you are; there are tears in your voice," he replied. "But, as I said, it's a depressing subject. My mood is depressing to-day; I have no right to intrude upon you with these things."

"Oh, don't say that," she said. "If you like talking to me, please go on. I should be so glad to help you pass the time if I could."

"You could, indeed, if you chose. Supposing we were to meet here once or twice a week and talk; it would give me the greatest pleasure. Do you think you could manage it?"

"Certainly I could, and I should be delighted."

Thus the acquaintance grew and strengthened. They met at least twice a week, and had half an hour's conversation. Alphonse Gerard's great desire seemed to be to talk of art. He made his young companion tell him all she could about the latest pictures, the latest gossip, the latest developments in the artistic world; and if she sometimes, in giving a glowing account of some sketch or painting, checked her enthusiasm through fear of paining him, he always encouraged her to go on.

Thus passed some weeks, and then Gerard found the seat empty several days in succession. He wondered what the reason of it could be, and at last one day, hearing Evelyn's step on the gravel, he went to meet her.

"I fear you must have been ill, Miss Grey," he said.

"Because I have not been here lately. No, I have been quite well, thank you. I——"

"Something has happened to keep you indoors; of course I cannot expect you should be constantly coming here on my account. But, indeed, I have missed you sorely."

"I am very sorry, but—— Let us sit down for a little and talk. I want so much to tell you about my new picture. I really do think it is going to be a success this time."

"I hardly think it will be wise to sit now, it is getting late for sitting out of doors; suppose we walk about and discuss it."

She was quite willing, for the day was inclined to be misty and raw, being late autumn. Up and down they walked for a considerable time, and then Evelyn said:

"Well, I think I must be getting home; it is getting so foggy."

"They tell me fog is predicted in the forecast for to-day," said Gerard. "Does it seem to you to be getting thick?"

"Very," she replied. "I was so interested in what I was saying I hardly noticed it. I am not quite sure really which way the gate is. We have turned round so many times."

"Is it as bad as all that?" he said kindly. "Well, I think we shall find this the right way."

They reached the gate, the fog thickening every moment. In the streets the lamps were lighted, but they made scarcely any impression, and the traffic was completely disorganised. Evelyn turned to her companion, who alone seemed unconcerned.

"What shall I do, Mr. Gerard? I don't know how I shall ever find the way home."

"Suppose you trust yourself to me. I shall be able to get you there all right. We blind men don't mind the fog, you know."

"Oh, it would be kind of you; I really am frightened. Will it put you out much?"

"Not at all. This will be the way. Now, keep close to me and don't lose sight of me, or we shall never find each other again."

With sure and firm step did Alphonse Gerard thread his way through the maze of streets, the only man collected and calm in the desperate confusion that reigned all over that quarter of London. In complete confidence the girl followed him. It seemed to her that the way was long, yet she never for a moment doubted but that she was being led aright.

He asked the number of her house as they turned down one street; she told him. He went a few steps farther and turned deliberately up a flight of steps leading to a front door. Evelyn followed him up. The steps seemed unfamiliar, but the fog and darkness rendered everything strange. The door opened, a strong hand was laid on her shoulder, and before she had time to grasp what was taking place she was forced into the house and the door fell to heavily behind her.

She was in darkness, utter darkness; not a streak or point of light was visible. Her eyes tried vainly to pierce the gloom in order to catch the outline of some familiar object.

"Where am I?" she asked, a sensation of terror coming over her.

"You will learn soon. Come this way," replied the voice of her guide; and the strong hand was laid on her again. Convinced that something was wrong, the girl tried to slip from under it and reach the door; but the darkness confused her so hopelessly that escape was impossible. She cried out; her pitiful cry echoed noisily through the house, and by her side she heard a harsh, mirthless laugh.

"No use, my dear; no one will hear you. The place is empty and the walls are thick. Better come quietly. Give me your hand."

"But what does it all mean? What do you want with me?"

"That you are shortly going to hear. Come this way."

The hand caught her wrist; helplessly she followed through the darkness up the stairs, her companion leading the way without hesitation. They stopped on the next landing, paused before a door, as she guessed; he opened it and led her through it.

"There's a chair for you; sit down," he said, and put her down into an armchair as he spoke. Immediately afterwards she heard the key turn in the lock. She was now thoroughly frightened, but made an effort to keep collected; perchance, she might still get away.

"Well, and how do you like the darkness?" asked the blind man.

"I expect I shall get used to it presently. Are there no means of lighting this place?"

"None. There is a gas fitting, but the gas has been disconnected. You may as well begin to accustom yourself to darkness as soon as you can, for you've seen the last of light in this world."

"What do you mean?" she asked, trying to keep her voice steady.

"You'll see presently. Now I am going to tell you a story." As far as she could judge he seated himself as he spoke. "It's an old story, it began more than twenty years ago. In those days I was a student living in the Latin Quarter of Paris. I had life before me, and talent to develop, a brilliant career was predicted for me.

"One day a woman arrived in our midst. She was an English student, her name was Evelyn Collet. I don't know how old she was, or what her position might have been; all I can tell you about her was that she was the most beautiful creature I had ever looked upon, and that we one and all worshipped her. I can see her now," his voice softened as he went on, "with hair like burnished gold, movements as graceful as an Arab's, and a face, well, indescribable in words, walking amongst us like an empress among her slaves. For she evinced no interest in any one of us with the exception of me, and that, I now believe, solely because I painted better than the others. Still I was flattered, and cherished hopes of one day making this beautiful, inaccessible being my own.

"Soon after there was another new-comer who was destined to have a great influence on my life. This was a young student, also English, by name Wilfred Grey. His talent soon bid fair to rival mine, and he was likewise intimate with Evelyn Collet. Whether she was a consummate coquette, or whether she really did not care one way or the other, I never knew, but she divided her attention between Grey and myself with wonderful impartiality, disregarding everyone else.

Digitized by Google

"Now, that year Grey and I were both going in for the Nemo prize of two thousand francs. Others were entering for it too, but it really lay between us. Both of us were hard up and anxious for the money as well as the glory. We worked assiduously at our rival pictures, and being fairly intimate through our mutual acquaintance with Evelyn Collet, sometimes showed each other the progress we were making.

"One day, very shortly before the competition, I was at Grey's studio and examined his painting. He had chosen a classical subject, mine was an allegorical one. I acknowledged his picture was good and that his chance was excellent, but even while I said so I knew that I must beat him. Fool that I was, I asked him to come to my studio and inspect my attempt. He willingly did so. My painting was not so far advanced as his, yet it was sufficiently so to startle him by its promise alone. I remember how he looked into it, silently and regretfully, even though he could not but praise it. This was pretty late in the day and there was no light to get on with the work that evening. We spent the time in the usual manner and something past midnight I got to bed.

"And now it is difficult to explain to you what happened next, though it is most essential that you should understand it. I passed a night of such intense agony that I shudder to think of it to this day. Intense, scorching, racking pain in my eyes as if they were being burnt out, and I could not move! I simply had to lie in dull agony, unable to cry out, to lift myself up, alive to nothing but the most frightful suffering. And when at last motion returned and I could turn and moan in my pain, I found myself—in darkness! My sight was gone.

"I felt terribly ill and weak, and there was a strange and unusual smell in the room, as of some potent drug. I was only half in my senses, and allowed myself to be removed to the hospital without any protest; my pain was so acute I could not even think. I remained for some time in the hospital, and was cured, as far as could be, of my injuries; till at last one day I walked forth to face the world again—a blind artist!"

There was a pause. Then the speaker suddenly gave vent to something like a cry.

"Child, do you know what it means to lose your eyes! Do you know what it means to love all things seen, to live in that love, and to have it taken from you! To have all that makes life worth living taken away and know it is for ever! To be imprisoned in darkness when it is your nature to worship light! But no, of course you can have no idea of any such thing. Let me go on.

"I soon found that Grey had won the Nemo prize, left the Latin Quarter, and gone they knew not where. Evelyn Collet had gone with him. I had been discovered late one morning several weeks ago, just recovering from the effects of chloroform, under the influence of which I had been blinded with sulphuric acid. Who had done the deed the police had not been able to trace. The incentive which Grey had for it was all they could go upon, and he proved beyond a doubt that he could not have done it. But upon Evelyn Collet there fell no suspicion, except mine. There was but one possible conclusion, namely, that he had told her he had no chance against my picture, and with or without his help and connivance, she had done this thing.

"But for her sake, because I had not yet got over my infatuation, I made no further attempt to find them. I resigned myself to my fate, and Providence sent me a friend. When I was still comparatively prosperous I had been acquainted with a little seamstress, who always went by the name of Mimi. She was the plainest woman I ever came across, even French taste could not redeem her. I once saw her in Evelyn's company, I never shall forget the contrast. Well, this little woman came to me in my trouble and offered to devote herself to me. Helpless as I was and unable to work, I accepted her offer, which she put as a petition, and from that day forward I verily believe she thought of me before everything. She worked like a slave, poor little woman, to keep herself and me; and, strange though it may sound, we were happy together. She became all in all to me, and I know I was the same to her. After a time she had an offer to come over to work in an English house, and things being bad with us just then, she accepted. We came to London. Here we lived for some months, and then Mimi was taken ill. Her sickness was dangerous and infectious; she was removed to a fever hospital, and there she died.

"Now I was utterly alone again, though not so helpless as heretofore. Soon after her death I inherited a small income, more than sufficient for my wants. But I missed her sorely. And in my loneliness and darkness I fell back upon my past life, and I became filled with one idea, namely to be revenged on those who had taken from me all that made existence worth living.

"I spent a good deal looking for Evelyn Collet and Wilfred Grey, but all to no purpose. Then by accident you, their daughter, fell into my hands. You, representing both by your very name, you with Evelyn's voice and Grey's turns of speech, you through whom it is easiest to injure that traitress, your mother, on you shall my vengeance fall! You have heard my story, you know my determination, what do you say to it?"

"I say that you have utterly misjudged both my mother and my dear dead father, and that if you inflict any injury on me you will suffer for it to your life's end!"

"Well spoken, but what proof have you of your words?"

"Only conviction."

"Ah! That is all I have, it wants nothing more. Now, are you ready?"

"What are you going to do with me?"

"What was done to me, exactly as I have told it you."

"To give me chloroform and burn out my eyes!"

"Yes, just as you are getting on with your picture, as I was; just when you want them most. You have seen the last of daylight; when you recover from the sleep you will fall into you will find yourself in darkness blacker than this, darkness that can be indeed felt."

"Oh, you cannot mean it," she wailed piteously, her courage forsaking her. "Oh, Mr. Gerard, what harm have I done you; I, who only meant to show you kindness? Take pity on me, Mr. Gerard; where are you? Oh, this darkness, if it were not for this darkness perhaps I could do something. What shall I do, what shall I do?"

"Yes, we are on equal terms for once," he said grimly, and she shuddered to hear him approaching her chair. Instinct of preservation made her spring up as he came nearer. A strange scent began to spread itself over the room; deadly terror paralysed her, she shrank back against the wall, fancying for a moment that he had lost any idea of her whereabouts. But at once she knew it was not so, for his steps were coming straight in her direction, the heavy scent increased in strength, in another moment she felt his hand on her shoulder, his breath on her neck, the strong, overpowering drug was close to her nostrils. She put her hand over her face and dropped on her knees.

Digitized by Google

"Mr. Gerard, have pity on me!"

For all answer her hands were forced away from her face and the chloroformed handkerchief thrown over it. For a few minutes she struggled faintly, then the drug began to take effect, and very soon she fell senseless on the floor.

He opened the door and stood for a moment in the fresh air of the passage. Then he took a small bottle from his pocket and returned to the room, leaving the door behind him unlocked. It would not be a long business, and as soon as it was done he meant to leave the house with all the doors open, and put himself into safety before she should have regained consciousness and told the story to others.

He knelt down by her on the floor and uncorked the bottle. He knew he must be careful with it. He passed his hand over her face and located her eyes. And then——

There came a sound of footsteps and voices, the door opened violently, and a rush of fresh, if fog-laden air made itself felt as the intruders entered.

Next came the sound of a match being struck, and a woman's voice cried:

"Ah, I am right; look here, doctor."

Gerard rose from his knees and turned instantly in the direction whence the voice had come.

"You, Evelyn!" he cried.

"Yes, I, who have kept a watch on your movements ever since my daughter there told me of her acquaintance with you. I warned her quite lately against having anything more to do with you."

"Is there no light in this place?" said a man's voice impatiently. "Will you take this box of matches, Mrs. Grey, and go and see if you can find light in any of these rooms. I'll stay here."

Mrs. Grey went, and Gerard heard the door locked behind her. The doctor knelt down by the girl without paying any further attention to him. Very soon Mrs. Grey returned and was admitted.

"Do you think she is very bad?" she asked anxiously. "What has he done to her?"

"Given her chloroform, but that is all as far as I can see."

"I've lighted the gas in the room across here; shall I come with you?"

The doctor looked at her and glanced in the direction of Gerard. She saw what he meant and took the key out of the lock. Gerard heard her and laughed.

"Go with your child, Evelyn," he said, "I've no intention of running away."

"I hope not, I want to speak to you."

A look of fleeting surprise passed over his face as he noted the absence of resentment in her tones. He stood with folded arms leaning against the mantelpiece while the girl was removed. After they had gone he slowly and laboriously began to open the shutters of the room. She re-entered while he was doing this, and rolled back one of them for him.

"Can you see now?" he asked, "or is the fog too thick?"

"It is lifting; yes, I can see quite enough. How changed you are, Alphonse!"

He laughed his bitter laugh. "It is appropriate for you to say so," he rejoined. "So you have outwitted me again, as you think?"

"If you mean that I have had you watched so that I knew you had engaged this room in this house, and that you two days ago contrived to buy a certain quantity of chloroform and sulphuric acid, yes, I have. I arrived in London this afternoon and drove straight to my daughter's home. They told me she had been missed for some time, whereupon I engaged a doctor's services, telling him to bring the needful restoratives for chloroform, and drove here. I was only just in time, it seems. She is better now, and the doctor has taken her home."

"And now you are going to have me arrested, I suppose?"

"No, I do not wish to do that," she said thoughtfully, and as she looked at him standing leaning against the mantelpiece, a look of bitter indifference on his face, something like pity was to be read in her eyes. "But I have to disillusion you."

"What about? Ah, you are going to lie to me about the wrong you inflicted on me; well, you can pare yourself the trouble, I cannot see you now, and you cannot deceive me with your angel face."

She said nothing, but sat looking straight in front of her, as if considering something in her mind.

"Whom did you love better in the end, Mimi or I?" she asked.

"The two cases cannot be compared, since you ask the question. But why? Is it anything to do with this matter, beyond the fact that one of you acted like a saint towards me and the other like a fiend?"

"It is everything to do with this matter; and I think, if it were only myself that were concerned, I would let it alone. But there is Evelyn. With a man of your temperament she will never be safe if she should ever cross your path again. No, it must be done. You think I burnt out your eyes."

"I am certain of it."

"It was not I, it was Mimi."

He gave a great start and just caught the table in time to save himself from falling.

"Impossible," he cried. "It is a lie, another of your wicked inventions! She loved me, she could not do it."

"She did it for that very reason. She loved you desperately, and you cared nothing for her. Perhaps if I had never crossed your path she would have let things take their course, but your friendship with me fairly maddened her. Apart from your obvious delight in my society, she realised that as long as you could see there would be no hope that she should win your affection. I saw it all though you didn't, but, of course, I never thought she would act as she did. Your eyes were her enemies, and she resolved to be rid of them. Wilfred Grey's picture afforded her an excellent cloak for her machinations. She lived in the same house as you did, and continued to do so after the outrage. She had nerves of iron and the determination of a Bonaparte. Then, when you returned, she repented of her crime, and devoted herself to you for the remainder of her life."

"And how do you know of this?" he asked, and his voice shook.

"I will tell you. After my husband's death I took to sick nursing to earn a livelihood for myself and Evelyn. For a time I was in the fever hospital in which she died. I nursed her and she recognised me. She was sure she would not recover, and she chose to make me the confidante of this story before she died. She feared, knowing your character, that some such thing as this might happen, and she told me this that I might make use of the information if necessary, begging me not to do so unless the necessity was absolute. To make it incontrovertible, I wrote out a statement of the facts, which she signed, and her signature was witnessed. Here it is. You can have it read to you by anyone you please, if you do not believe me."

He shook his head.

"No use," he replied sadly. "My life is done. I have lost my last illusion, through my own fault. I feel you speak the truth.

His trembling hand sought for a chair, fell on the back of one, he sank on to it, and dropped his head on his hands.

There was a short silence. Then he asked wearily:

"What are you going to do next?"

"Next?" she echoed. "Why, what more is there to be done? When it has been proved to you that your resentment was misplaced you will have no further cause for attempting to injure me or Evelyn. That's why I told you."

"Then you don't mean to prosecute me?"

"No. If I had I should have sent for more assistance. There is really no harm done—except to yourself," she said, for the man before her looked so utterly broken down and despairing that she had no heart to reproach him further.

There was silence. Then at last she came near to him.

"Is there nothing I can do to comfort you?" she said.

"Say you forgive me," he murmured.

She took his hand, pushed back his hair from his forehead, and kissed it.

"I forgive you, Alphonse," she said. Dorothy Riley

Digitized by Google

"BABS."

Relating How Providence, Aided by a Little Girl, Reunited Two Parted Lives.

"I LIKE you," said Babs seriously.

The man to whom the five-year-old girlie said this smiled encouragingly.

"Thank you," he said, equally seriously.

"I will give you a kiss—if you like," said Babs, with just the suspicion of a smile creeping over her baby face. The kiss was at once accepted and given—several times over. "You finded me," said Babs, "when I was lost. And mummy always tells me to be polite."

Gerald Challoner had hard work to keep a smile from coming upon his handsome face; but the little maid was so solemn and so serious that he felt he dared not let her see how amused her dear self-confidence made him.

'So you are home now, Babs, and not lost any longer," he said, "and now we must say 'Good-bye.'"

"Good-bye," said Babs, "and thank you. Mummy always tells me to say 'thank you.'"

"You dear little mite," cried Challoner, bending down to kiss the sweet little upturned baby face yet once again; "I wonder if I shall ever see your dear little face again. It reminds me so strangely of one I once used to know."

But Babs did not hear. She had fled up the garden path of the cottage, and was lost to sight. Challoner closed the wicket gate, and went on his way, musing and trying his best to remember.

It had been a strange meeting, that of Babs and Gerald Challoner. He, on a walking tour, alone, and with knapsack on shoulder, had found Babs sitting by the wayside, with big tears in her baby eyes, and being tenderhearted, had essayed to comfort her. All she could say was that she was lost. But a very brief walk, during part of which Gerald Challoner carried Babs in his arms, contrived to bring the little maid into recognisable regions, and she soon found "home."

"Home" was a tiny little cottage, with a quaint, old-fashioned garden in front, and a wicket gate—the gate through which Babs had run so quickly—and, when the full summer came, the promise of sweet and scented summer roses clambering all about the old-world porch. It was nearly dusk on this June afternoon, but Challoner had both time and opportunity—he made them—to observe the quaintness of the cottage, the white curtains at the windows, and the neatness of the tiny garden.

It is strange sometimes how one's whole life can be affected by a minute's hesitation. Gerald Challoner hesitated quite that space of time outside Vine Cottage, in the centre of the village of Winterton; and all his future life was altered by that sixty seconds of hesitation. Instead of walking on to the town of Stanworth, where he had intended to put up for the night—it was barely two miles further on—he decided, in that minute, to remain, if he could find decent accommodation in the place, in Winterton. Upon such little trifles of decision sometimes do our destinies lie!

Challoner, walking on a little way, came upon the "Green Lion," which offered everything that he desired. A cosy room, a bright and plump landlady, a fire which seemed to suggest ox-roasting, lavender-scented sheets, and a supper that was most welcome, served in an old oak-panelled room, that might have been existent since the days of Cromwell. "Better," thought he, "than the Royal Hotel, beloved of commercial travellers, at Stanworth!" And he felt sincerely obliged to Babs for having detained him on his journey.

Before seeking the lavender-scented sheets, he went into the smoking-room of the "Green Lion," where he speedily made himself very much at home. The worthies of the little village were smoking and drinking in the warmth of a blazing fire, and, though at first a little shy at the intrusion of a stranger into their select village circle, when they discovered that he could tell a good "yarn" and was not averse to being friendly, he was heartily made welcome.

He frankly avowed, even in the portly presence of the landlord, his intention to have gone on to Stanworth; and after certain discussions of purely local interest, in which he was compelled, perforce, to join, he contrived to lead the conversation to other matters.

"It is curious, gentlemen," he said, at last, "but a strange incident has made me a visitor here to-night. I happened to meet with a little maid of five, who lives at Vine Cottage, close at hand, if I remember right; and dusk coming on, she had wandered rather farther than she knew, and was lost."

No one spoke for a few moments. Then the burly landlord took his pipe from his mouth.

"That's Mrs. Summers' little maid," he said.

"She was so tired that I carried her home to the gate of the cottage," went on Challoner, "and then she knew she was at home once more."

Again that strange silence fell upon the room. This time Gerald Challoner noticed it.

"Can anyone tell me," he said, "who her mother is? Is she——"

"Better not ask," interrupted a voice from the far end of the room. It was that of the village schoolmaster and organist. "Nobody knows," he went on, oracularly, "and so far as we're concerned nobody wants to know."

"But I should like to know," said Challoner quietly; "if any of you will tell me." But nobody vouchsafed him a reply, except the burly landlord.

"She came here a twelvemonth ago, took Vine Cottage, and nobody knows where she came from or who she is."

"The vicar don't call on her," said the organist.

"Nor do his wife," chimed in another.

"She's got no friends," said the organist.

"Not in this room," thought Gerald Challoner to himself, and he could not help feeling a strange sort of pity for the mother of Babs.

"But her husband?" he queried.

"Ah!" said the organist. And the simple exclamation conveyed volumes.

"She's a widow woman," said the landlord, in explanation.

"Perhaps," said the organist, unkindly.

* * * * *

Gerald Challoner, barrister, out on a walking tour for the benefit of his health, slept in the lavender-scented sheets at the "Green Lion" splendidly. But his first waking thought in the morning was of Babs and her mother. What did it mean? What was it to him if Mrs.—what was her name?—Summers was looked upon by Winterton village with suspicious eyes and was not even visited by the vicarage people? Personally, Gerald Challoner said to himself it did not matter a jot. But all the same, he could not help but confess that he was interested. Of course it was Babs, the dear, sweet little mite—who could help being interested in her! He had fully intended going on his way to Stanworth at nine in the morning, but he did not. Something—he did not know what it was—seemed to persuade him to remain in Winterton—and see Babs again.

Digitized by Google

* * * * *

Of course he stayed—and he saw "Babs" the very next morning. She was in the garden, and he spoke to her, called her by her name.

The little mite came running to kiss him—it was a happy and pleasant trait in Gerald Challoner's character that all children loved him at first sight.

"Mummy is not well," said Babs most solemnly.

"I am so sorry," said Challoner.

"Is you?"

"Of course I am," responded Gerald, with a smile that he could not quite repress; "I don't like to think that anyone is ever not well."

"You is laughing!" exclaiming the little maid. And forthwith she ran up the garden path and left him. But half a moment later she turned again with a smile on her little face. "Here's mummy!" she said. Hearing voices, "Mummy" had come out, and was standing, a lattice-framed picture, at the threshold of the cottage.

"Come, mummy!" said the little voice. And "Mummy" came down the garden path.

"You!" said Challoner, lifting his hat; "of all people in the world——"

And then he suddenly recollected several things. That he had seen a likeness in Babs' face to someone he had known; that he had been interested in the previous evening's talk about Mrs. Summers; that he had been led somehow to the very garden gate where he was now standing. And his old sweetheart, who had jilted him for a richer man, was facing him!

He put out his hand, and Lucy Summers took it.

The garden gate, closed, was between them. Babs watched most interestedly. Again Challoner was the first to speak.

"You are well and happy?" he said. As he looked at the rounded form and sweet face, he felt in his heart that he had suffered.

"Yes, came the calm reply; "and you?"

"Oh, I am all right now."

It seemed to him that his old sweetheart's eyes looked at him reproachfully.

"I mean," he said, "that I am better off and not so worried by the cares of existence."

"And you forgive me?" murmured Babs' mother, more softly; "you know why I did it?"

"No, I know nothing."

"But surely you heard? My mother was ill, dying, and I—I—what could I do? Stop! Chance has brought this meeting about, and I will tell you, I must tell you, why I——"

"Threw me over!" interpolated Challoner.

"Yes. You had no money, no prospects. Gordon Summers offered to marry me, and take the mother I loved away."

"Please don't be cross wiv him, mummy," said Babs' childish voice, but her mother patted her shoulder with tender fingers.

"There was a hope," she went on. The scent of the early June roses came wafting to him on the summer breeze. Gerald Challoner looked at his old sweetheart's face, and thought—just as one thinks at times in an infinitesimal part of a moment—that she looked sweeter than ever; spiritualised by sorrow, trouble, and the world, and yet more lovely than of old.

"There was a hope," she repeated, "but, alas! a forlorn hope. She died three months after, in Italy."

"I am deeply sorry," said Challoner, "because I loved her. I heard nothing of this. No. one could tell me anything about you, Lucy."

"No one knew. Gordon was very good to me, and—and you know how I loved her"

"I know," said Challoner, simply. At this very moment Babs, who had got tired of listening to what was to her an uninteresting conversation, came dancing up gaily with a rosebud in her tiny hand.

"Flower from garden," she said, with a beaming smile. Gerald Challoner took it from the uplifted baby hand, and slipped it into the button-hole of his coat. He turned to the mother.

"I hope you are happy," he said; "and I am glad to have seen you again. Your little maid, strangely enough, brought us together again. I think, if I go with her rosebud in my coat, it will be a symbol of my forgiveness of any happenings in the past."

"You do forgive me, Gerald?"

"Why not? I could not until I knew, and now that I do know the true reason, I give you my full and complete forgiveness. But—good-bye."

"You do not blame me?"

"How can I—now I know?" He stooped to take Babs' hand in his.

"Is you going?"

"I must, little woman!"

"Oh, please no!"

But Gerald Challoner, with the love of seven years ago surging passionately back into heart and mind and memory, set his teeth and bade himself be strong.

"I must," he said.

"Oh!" And Babs began to wail pitifully; "I wanted you to come and play wiv' me in the garden, and give me swings. Mummy can't, she's so tired, and dere's no one else!"

"Hush, Babs: Mr. Challoner has to go a long way—all the way to London," said the mother.

"London?" said Babs; "is that where daddy is?"

"Perhaps!" answered Babs' mother. Gerald Challoner caught a strange expression upon Lucy's face, and his heart seemed to stand still. What did the word mean? Had Gordon Summers deserted her—and was that the meaning of the village gossip he had heard overnight?

"Did you not know?" she said, turning a strained face to him. The sudden meeting with her old lover had tried her.

"Know what? I know nothing but what you have told me."

"My husband died—three years ago!"

"Then you are alone in the world?"

"Except for Babs."

"Me?" said that youthful person, hearing her name spoken.

"When my husband died," continued her mother, "it was found that he was not so rich after all, and when things were finally wound up, I had about a hundred a year to live upon. So I came here, and have been here over a year—with Babs."

Gerald picked the child up in his strong arms.

"Babs," he said, "would you like to have me ever and always to play with you whenever you wanted me to?"

"Yes," said Babs; "I like you so much."

Gerald Challoner turned with a smile to Babs' mother.

"Shall the angel in a pinafore give your answer for you," he said softly. "I love you as much as ever, Lucy, even more. Will you marry me?"

Lucy Summers looked up in his face lovingly.

"You have forgiven me?" she said.

"I have forgotten," he replied, putting Babs down.

"And I have been so alone, so lonely, in the world!"

"Never again, Lucy," said Gerald Challoner, taking her into his arms, with Babs a highly interested spectator; "never again. Fate, Providence, Chance—never mind which—has brought us together again, sweetheart, and I shall never part with you now."

"It was Fate," murmured Lucy, as her old lover kissed her upon the lips.

"He finded me and brought me home to you," put in Babs.

"I think it was Babs, after all," said Challoner.

Clifton Bingham

Digitized by Google

The Keeping of a Promise.

The Story of an Unfaithful Lover and an Inconstant Friend.

THE course of the river was between great hills, whose sides were dotted with villas, while at their feet nestled little hamlets and more pretentious villages. There was one spot at which it broadened into a lake-like expanse, with little inlets where the rushes fringed its edges, and where large, white, odorous lilies floated on its softly undulating waters.

Clarice Reeves always felt grateful that her ancestors had chosen an elevation near this spot to build their home—a great rambling house, with bay windows and terraces overlooking the river, and commanding a view of the country for miles.

"I always thought," she said one morning to Hugh Valincott, who had ridden over to spend an hour on the wide terrace, "that the ideal life was to be lived on an eminence, from which one could see the action and turmoil of the world, and yet not be in it."

"The ideal life for me," he returned, "is—where you are, whether on a hill or in a valley."

And he stopped trailing his whip for the amusement of the leonine-looking poodle, Tiny, and, looking straight into Clarice's eyes, possessed himself of the dainty little hand lying idly on the arm of the chair.

"If I could only be sure!" she said in a half-aside.

"Of what?" he exclaimed. "Of my love?" And again he brought the magnetism of his glance to bear upon her sweet face.

"No," she returned, with a quick, proud little motion of her head; "but sure that the gown I have ordered for the next dance will arrive in due time; sure that Cousin Lucie will be here by the evening train; sure that I shall always have the same relish for chocolates."

Then she daintily treated herself to one from the bon-bon dish on the wicker table, and held out another for Tiny's delectation.

There was an angry flush on Valincott's dark handsome face, and he rose and picked up his gloves and his riding-whip, which he had just dropped.

"One thing I am sure of," he said; "that you have no faith in me."

"'Who never doubted, never half believed?'" she quoted with a tantalising smile

"Clarice," he said, with a little gesture of remonstrance, "do you think you are using me kindly? I came this morning because I could not remain away from you another moment; and yet you treat me only to flouts and jeers. Come into the drawing-room and play for me—my perturbed spirits need soothing."

"As you like," said Clarice; and, with a grave little air of acquiescence, she led the way into the wide hall.

Valincott watched the slight, graceful figure with eager eyes. She wore a simple dress of white, soft cambric and a bunch of cinnamon-pinks was carelessly thrust in her belt.

"A peace-offering," she said, selecting one and giving it to him. "Now, what shall it be?" she asked, seating herself at the piano, after an adroit movement in which she eluded Valincott's too evident intention of beguiling her into the corner of the drawing-room for a lover-like demonstration.

"Whatever pleases you," he replied, with an air of mock resignation; "for you seem not to care to please me much this morning."

"Schumann?" he asked, as she played a soft, dreamy air.

"Yes. Did you ever hear Schumann's music likened to the lace-like network of delicate rootlets?"

"No, I don't think I ever did; I shouldn't have appreciated it if I had. I am not equal to such intricate comparisons. Let me ask you, in turn, if you ever heard your hair compared with a shining, wavy mass of bronze-brown? Or if," and he bent over and put his hand gently under the dimpled chin and raised it a little, and looked into the beautiful hazel eyes, "anyone ever told you that yours were the sweetest eyes ever seen?"

A few moments after Clarice stood watching him ride up the river-road.

"I wish I could be sure," she was again saying wistfully.

"Of what?"

"Oh! is it you, Aunt Amy?" And she turned her lovely perplexed countenance towards a middle-aged woman who had just entered the room. "Why, sure of anything," she continued. "Is there such a thing as certainty? Life, love, friendship, wealth, health, happiness—everything seems unstable to me, this morning."

"Clarice," returned her aunt brusquely, "your liver is out of order. A pill night and morning will rid your mind of such fancies."

"I do not believe there is a woe in the whole world, from a broken heart to the slightest ailment, that you haven't a panacea for in the shape of a pill," laughed Clarice. "And now tell me one thing; do you suppose Lucie will be in the least like I expect?"

"Nothing is as we expect. Sometimes it is better, or—sometimes worse," she added sententiously; for, in her inmost heart, Mrs. Reeves—who was Clarice's aunt by marriage, and filled the place of companion and chaperon to the orphan heiress—doubted the wisdom of her niece's latest caprice of sending for an unknown second cousin to spend the summer with her in her country home.

Digitized by Google

"It will be something for me to do," Clarice had said. "Her life is dull; I will give her a pleasant summer. You say she is pretty, and I am anticipating much pleasure in seeing the dear little rosebud make her début."

So she dispatched the invitation, and, when it was accepted, sent a delicately worded letter with a generous cheque; for Lucie Dayton's father was a country clergyman in rather straitened circumstances.

"I was never so surprised," announced Clarice to her aunt the next morning after her cousin's arrival. "My rosebud has resolved itself into some strange tropical flower. Lucie is simply beautiful; she dresses in exquisite taste, and has, although she is barely nineteen, the aplomb of a shining beauty of several seasons. She quite outshines me; but I am delighted with her all the same."

"I am glad you like her," returned her aunt drily.

Two hours later the girls were on the broad terrace; Lucie had been for a short drive with Mrs. Reeves, and was resting for a moment before going to her room.

She had been looking down the river, watching a distant steam-launch and some small boats that were setting sail, but had thrown herself gracefully into a chair, and was contemplating the ranges of hills covered with masses of evergreens, and the fleecy, white clouds which floated across the bright blue sky and seemed entangled among them.

"You like my home?" questioned Clarice eagerly, watching the dreamy, satisfied expression.

"It is Paradise to me—who have spent my days in that little old parsonage, with its barren outlook."

"I am so glad if you are going to be happy here," returned Clarice warmly. "But I beg you to tell me if country clergymen's daughters are usually like you, with your grand air and almost Parisian taste in dress?"

Miss Dayton smiled in a slow, inscrutable manner, which might mean anything or nothing, and said: "It is the Reeves' blood, I suppose; for I certainly haven't acquired a grand air in that remote country village."

So Lucie sat watching the ever changing scene, while Clarice looked at her furtively.

She was tall and slender, and carried herself with exquisite grace; her eyes were velvety black, with delicate arched brows, while her hair was pale golden—a contrast which Clarice thought would lend itself perfectly to some effective costumes she had in mind. For she meant her to be the belle of the next ball and to captivate Doctor Darrell.

Hugh Valincott rode up before Clarice had quite made up her mind about the wonderful gown that was to accomplish so much, and she greeted him warmly; she was so eager to introduce him to her cousin, that she quite forgot the vague doubts of the day before, which all his tender words did not entirely remove, and which had caused her much hurt.

"Now, you two are to be the best friends in the world," she said in her imperious, pretty way. "I want Cousin Lucie to have the happiest summer of her life; and you, Hugh, are to help."

Valincott bowed low over the slim hand in its long, black glove, and looked with admiration at the beautiful, fair face with its soft, black eyes and frame of golden hair.

"If we are going to sit here, I will go for my hat," said Clarice.

"Let me ring for it?" offered Hugh.

"Don't trouble; I have to see Aunty Amy a moment."

"What do you think of her?" she asked, finding her aunt in the pretty morning-room, busy with her knitting. "Isn't she a wonder?" she continued eagerly. "Can you imagine how she made the cheque I sent her go so far? Oh, yes—Hugh is here; I mean to ask him to stay to luncheon."

Mrs. Reeves' nose was aquiline and her features sharp; and she looked unusually grim and forbidding at that moment, when she prepared to sit in judgment on the new cousin.

"Do you know what I think?" she said. "I think," and she spoke the words with deliberation, "that you are laying a scheme to destroy your happiness. I hate to see a person approaching a fuse with a match, when the explosion will involve ruin."

Meantime Hugh, who was never so much at home as when saying soft nothings to a pretty woman, was looking into Lucie's fair face with that air of devotion which made him adored by the sex.

"Of course, I am delighted to know you," she was saying in her low contralto voice. "I have heard your praises so sounded that I regard you already as a perfect model of a man." Then she looked at him with a glance which seemed to say: "And I find you to be all that you were described." While her words left a sound in his ears of Clarice's having talked too readily of her affairs to the new cousin.

Clarice came back, wearing a grey dress and a broad hat.

"I find I have to leave you," she said. "An old lady, in whom I am much interested, has sent for me to write a letter for her."

"Are you the scribe for the indigent old women of the vicinity?" asked Lucie with a little laugh. "Don't you want a secretary?"

"Yes," gaily assented Clarice. "Will you come with me?"

"No, thank you. I have unpacking to do."

"May I come?" asked Hugh.

"Oh, no; you are to stay and talk to Lucie."

"How can he talk to me when I am unpacking my trunk? I am going this moment."

And she bowed gracefully to Hugh and went into the house.

"You have planned so that we shall have but few uninterrupted hours this summer," grumbled Hugh, as they went down the river-path. "Don't walk so fast—let us be leisurely this morning."

So they loitered in the soft, bright sunshine, and watched the shadows of the floating clouds mirrored in the calm surface of the river.

"Here are roses—will you have some?" asked Hugh as they passed a great bush of wild roses in the perfection of bloom.

He cut a spray, which was a luxuriant mass of pink fragrance, carefully trimmed the thorns, and held it for a moment close to Clarice's cheek, scarcely less pink than the flowers.

"The roses suffer by contrast," he said, and with a tender little smile he placed them in her hand. "And now, tell me if your doubting mood has passed away?" he said, as they resumed their walk.

"Yes—entirely. I have perfect faith in you," she answered, turning her lovely, flushed face towards him.

"You may have," he said gently; "for I shall love you for ever and for ever——"

"That is an indefinitely long time," she returned, with a

Digitized by Google

shy little smile. "Measure it by earthly duration—as long as the roses bloom, for instance."

"No," he said gravely; "but 'as long as the river flows.' And you?"

"Let me echo your words: 'as long as the river flows,'" she answered with tender solemnity.

Then that silence born of perfect content fell upon them, and they went on to the little cottage with again but few words; while the river whispered to the rushes and sedges at its borders that it was accepted as a type of fidelity; then all its broad, swift surface broke into a thousand ripples and sparkles, which might or might not mean that it was laughing at any confidence which might be reposed in it.

Valincott rode over oftener than ever, to idle away his mornings at "The Reeves," as the old mansion was called.

"Now that there are two attractions instead of one, one may be pardoned for coming twice as often," he would gallantly declare. And Clarice would give a pretty grateful look, while Lucie would smile softly.

"Subtly," Mrs. Reeves would say. "For that girl is nothing if not subtle!" she would declare angrily. "And totally devoid of feeling, too. She would button her gloves, organise a gunpowder plot, or assassinate a Tsar with equal calmness. Only the other day, she coolly asked me which was the richer, Dr. Darrell or Mr. Valincott!"

All this Mrs. Reeves would confide to an intimate, adding that Clarice's blindness drove her to desperation, and that so much duet-practising and boat-rowing was only a pretext for flirtation.

Dr. Darrell, however, refused to transfer his allegiance to the new-comer, or be more than barely polite to her.

"There are no friends like the old friends," he would say, when Clarice accused him of his defection. "Your cousin is very charming, but I have no time for small-talk."

And the stalwart doctor, with his fine, straightforward face and earnest grey eyes, was very tender in his manner to Clarice, as if he would shield her from impending harm.

That very morning, Lucie and Valincott were on the river. There had been a pretence of learning to row; then they had drifted into one of the secluded, rush-bordered inlets, where Lucie was idly trailing an oar in the water, and telling Hugh in a low, tremulous voice a pathetic story of the barrenness of her life in the old parsonage.

There were tears in the dark, beguiling eyes, and a sad downward droop in the corners of the lovely scarlet mouth, while the pliant, exquisite figure was inclined slightly towards him.

Hugh had been struggling for days against the spell she was weaving around him, and at that moment was struggling with his better self.

She had been looking down, but she slowly raised her eyes and looked at him through the long lashes, with a semblance of shyness which only half concealed the passion that lay behind it.

Hugh's handsome, dark face grew pale with emotion, and, when he spoke, it was with a husky voice:

"Let me make your life beautiful," he said. "There are far countries where existence passes like a dream"

"But—Clarice?" she murmured

He placed her carefully in the boat, then loosened it from its moorings.

Valincott made no answer, but took the oars from her and rowed home in silence.

There had been several dances at the neighbouring houses—dances at which Lucie had received plenty of attention and admiration; but the gaieties of the season were to culminate in a ball to which most of the residents in the vicinity were to be invited.

When Lucie made a show of protestation against the lovely dress ordered for her, Clarice would only laugh and say:

"It is so little for me to do. Then just think how fine it will be for you to be the bright particular star of the evening!"

But, the very morning of the ball, Lucie was saying to Valincott: "I am simply a fad of Clarice's. She tired of her district-visiting, wore her gaieties out, and wanted to be amused; so she sent for me. And now she has been devising a costume for me, in which I am to reflect credit on her."

They were in the dim, fragrant drawing-room, and had been singing together; but Lucie was then touching the keys lightly, and looking up into his face with her wonderful eyes.

Having made this audacious speech, she smiled in a slow sweet fashion which showed her lovely teeth, struck a few minor chords, and added: "I am nothing if not frank."

"It is refreshing!" warmly declared Valincott, with a half angry feeling towards Clarice for patronising such a glorious creature.

It was the universal verdict that Miss Reeves and her cousin were the most beautiful girls at the ball.

Digitized by Google

"Almost in bridal white," whispered Hugh, as he whirled down the long room with Clarice in the first waltz. "Nothing could be more lovely!" he added, looking with admiration at the gown of dead-white silk, ropes of pearls, and a great cluster of creamy roses; while she looked up at him a moment with a shy, tender look in her soft hazel eyes, then blushed divinely.

However lovely Clarice was, Lucie that night was the cynosure of all eyes.

"A symphony in pale gold," declared one of the leading society men.

When the pretty speech was repeated to Mrs. Reeves, she only shrugged her shoulders, substituted "sinner" for "symphony," and whispered it to her intimate. And then, dowager-fashion, the two nodded and talked earnestly behind their fans; for, just at that moment, Lucie passed by on Valincott's arm, in her pale gold silk, just a shade darker than her hair, which had its luxuriance confined by a curiously wrought golden dagger set with yellow stones, while she wore a necklace and bracelets of the same stones, and at her corsage a bunch of pale-yellow roses with amber hearts.

"And you do not even admire her to-night?" Clarice was exclaiming reproachfully to Dr. Darrell, as the couple passed them.

"Less to-night than any time. She is Lilith—if we could find her dead lovers, there would be one of her golden hairs round their hearts."

"She has no lovers," laughed Clarice; "I doubt if she ever had one. She doesn't seem to care about them."

"No?" returned Darrell with an equivocal inflection. And again he looked down with a sad, grave air at the lovely head, with its masses of shining bronze-brown tresses.

Later in the evening Valincott and Lucie had gone out on the balcony—for "a breath of air," as Lucie said. They had turned one of its corners and were in a sheltered secluded nook.

"It is cold even here; the breeze comes this way—let me protect you!" and he placed her in front of him.

But she suddenly wheeled and stood so near to him that the roses she wore were crushed against him and filled the air with perfume; her dark eyes were glowing, and her beautiful bare arms gleamed white. She bent her head so that the fragrant golden hair just brushed his cheek and sighed softly.

"You sigh—are you unhappy?" he asked tenderly.

Then she softly raised her bewildering eyes and he saw in them what men saw in Lilith's eyes, in Circe's eyes, in Cleopatra's eyes—and drew her head to his breast, and held her close to his heart for a moment; then he released her, and they stood looking down the river, where the full moon made a long, shining pathway on the water.

"See!" said Lucie; "a golden roadway, leading where?"

"To bliss, if you will go with me. Let us row down the river," he said, in a low, constrained voice.

And she silently followed him down to the boat-house.

"In the boat-house are rugs," he said; "they will serve for protection against the dampness."

He wrapped her in one, but not before she had put both soft, white arms about his neck and clung to him, and he had covered her face with kisses.

Then, placing her carefully in the boat, he loosed it from its moorings, and, with long, steady strokes, sent the frail craft out into the narrow, glittering track of the moon.

* * * * *

An hour and a half later, Mrs. Reeves came up to Clarice with an anxious air.

"Everybody is going home," she said. "Where is Hugh? And where is Lucie? They have been gone from the ballroom a long time."

"I thought perhaps they were in the cardroom. Will you kindly speak to them, Dr. Darrell, and ask Mr. Valincott if he will please order our carriage?"

Darrell returned with a grave face.

"I cannot find him," he said. "He has not been seen for an hour or more."

"Undoubtedly Lucie has been taken suddenly ill, and he has gone home with her.'

"Possibly," assented the doctor; "I will see if your carriage has gone." And he hurried away.

"It is here," he said, returning shortly after. "Shall I order it for you?"

"Yes," answered Mrs. Reeves with decision. "Come, Clarice!"

"Say something to people," implored Clarice, with a white face, when they reached the dressing-room. "Say that Lucie is ill and has gone home. I think we shall find her there, do not you?" And she looked at her aunt with pitiful intreaty.

"Oh, very likely," returned her aunt evasively.

"Permit me to accompany you," said Dr. Darrell, who stood waiting for them with his overcoat on and his hat in hand. "My man will drive over after me."

Clarice could not join in the conversation on the way home, for her heart was like a leaden weight; but she eagerly ran up the steps and touched the bell, while the doctor was handing her aunt out of the carriage.

"Miss Dayton has come home?" she questioned the sleepy maid, who replied that she had not.

"Are you sure?"

"Quite sure, Miss Reeves."

"I do not understand it." And she turned to her aunt and Dr. Darrell, with a strained, anxious look in her lovely eyes.

Mrs. Reeves did not trust herself to speak, but turned away with set teeth and firmly compressed lips, while Darrell tried to reassure her.

"They have been unavoidably detained and will undoubtedly soon be back." Then he looked at his watch. "It is after three now. They may be waiting for daylight.'

Clarice was deathly pale and her teeth were chattering as with ague-chill.

"Here, child—drink this," said her aunt, who had sent the maid for wine. Then she wrapped her in a fur-lined cloak and stood with one arm protectingly round her, while the doctor said that he would go in search of the truants.

"You must try and get some rest," was his parting injunction.

But Clarice only walked backwards and forwards from the drawing-room into the great hall, while Mrs. Reeves bemoaned the day that Lucie Dayton, with her beautiful face and false heart, entered the house.

"I never trusted her," she said. "And she has enticed Hugh to his ruin."

"Don't—don't say that; you hurt me!" exclaimed Clarice putting out her hand with a gesture of intreaty. "Do not condemn him until there is proof."

Then the day dawned, showing pallid streaks of sky between great dark rifts of clouds; and a slow, drizzling rain set in, and dripped, dripped, from the roof in mournful accompaniment to the river's sullen murmur.

Clarice still paced the floor, her face wearing the pallor of death, while great dark circles were under the beautiful eyes. The roses hung from her corsage, crushed and faded, and their petals were strewn over the carpet, and seemed to her typical of her blighted hopes.

Her aunt tried to comfort her, and her maid followed her about with an extra wrap, and urged her to take some light refreshment; while Tiny even offered his dumb sympathy, and whined dismally and got himself rolled up in the train of her dress.

There was an hour of dreadful suspense, and when at last footsteps were heard outside, Clarice hastened into the hall.

"I told you they would come soon," she said; "now we shall know all about it."

But the door opened only to admit the doctor, who came up to her with a grave face.

"You have something to tell me!" she exclaimed. "Say it quickly, and tell me all—even the worst. Anything rather than this uncertainty!"

"Some men found an empty skiff——" He paused, shocked by her ghastly face. "Can you endure the rest?" he asked gently.

Her lips were dumb, but she bowed her head and went up to him and clasped her hands round his arm, as if for support.

Digitized by Google

"The bodies of your cousin and Mr. Valincott were washed ashore and have been carried to the boathouse. His friends have been telegraphed for," he continued, "and will be here by the next train. I await your directions regarding Miss Dayton's remains. One thing more," and Dr. Darrel bent low over the slight figure and laid his hand protectingly on the cold little fingers that were interlaced on his arm. "It is thought that, on their way down the stream, their boat was overturned by the wash of a steamer."

Clarice bowed her head on Darrell's arm in mute agony.

"Lean on me," he said tenderly. "Let me comfort and protect you, as if I were your father or brother."

Mrs. Reeves came close to the doctor's side and said, in a low voice: "As for this matter upon which you wish Clarice's decision, I will take it in my own hands. Now, will you help me to get this poor child to her room, and leave a prescription for her?"

To Clarice, whose life hung in the balance for weeks, the tragedy became like the memory of a terrible dream. Her illness spared her a keen realisation of the facts; she did not see Lucie's brokenhearted father, or hear Hugh's mother deplore his inconstancy.

But she did realise more and more, as time passed, the unfaithfulness of her lover, and the treachery of her friend, and it required all the strength of a resolute will to prevent her sweet nature from turning to a bitter misanthropic one. She clung to Mrs. Reeves, who, with all her grimness, had a warm motherly heart, and confided in Dr. Darrell.

After a time—a long time, in fact, the doctor ventured to plead his cause.

"No," answered Clarice, "I have no heart to give. And then, would you have me be unfaithful, too? I promised Hugh, that, as long as the river flowed, I would love him."

The doctor said no more, and time passed—on wings, to most people; but to Clarice so slowly. For Darrell's visits were less frequent, and she missed them more than she cared to own; then rumour connected his name with that of a fair young widow, and, when he did come, she met him with restraint and a wholly changed manner.

"I do not see," he said to Mrs. Reeves, "why my little friend has so changed towards me."

"Do you not?" she returned, with a shrewd little smile.

It was drawing near Christmastide and the month had been the coldest December known for many years.

Clarice stood, late one afternoon, looking out at the snow-crowned hills and dreary, dismal landscape; at the bare brown branches of the trees outlined against the cold grey of the winter sky; at the leafless shrubs and utter absence of life; and she felt that the scene repeated itself in her heart—so barren and desolate, its summer hopes all fled.

The revivifying finger of Spring might touch Nature and give it sunny skies and green fields and leaves and flowers, but what could bring back her lost joys? And now the faint new hope that had begun to awaken in her heart was dead, too!

She sighed deeply and came back to the fire with a shudder.

Then she crouched over the fire dejectedly, and sat lost in reverie until a voice at her very side caused her to start.

"Building air-castles in the coals?"

"Oh, is it you, doctor?" And she sprang to her feet.

Then she shyly glanced at him, standing there so stalwart and erect,

"Will you come to the window with me? I have something to show you," he said. "Do you see the river?"

"Yes; it is frozen over. Is not that uncommon?"

"Has it no significance to you? To me it is a symbol that I may hope; for, as it no longer runs visibly on its swift course, are not you absolved from that old promise? Will not you come to me?" he said.

She stood irresolute a moment; she had felt herself so bereft, so forsaken, so buffeted by the waves of sorrow, that she could not seem at once to grasp the idea that she might sail her storm-tossed boat into the safe harbour. Then, with a shy smile and downcast eyes, she faltered: "I cannot help coming—because—I love you," and laid her head on his breast and began her life anew.

Albert Price.

In accordance with my promise made last week, I now propose to give you some information regarding the paper which comes out next Tuesday under the title of SMITH'S WEEKLY.

In the first place, you will find in it the two features which have made SHORT STORIES so popular in the past—viz.: "IN CONFIDENCE" and "YOUR EDITOR CHATS." A portion of the paper will also be retained for the publication of short stories of a similar nature to those which you have enjoyed in this paper. Beyond this the paper will be built up on quite new and, I venture to think, popular lines. It will contain a complete novelette of some ten or twelve thousand words in length. These novelettes will be written each week by popular authors, and I have decided to include it in the new paper in deference to the continually expressed wishes of the readers of SHORT STORIES.

At least a dozen capital articles will be found in the paper, each one of interest, and written by an expert writer. A new feature will be introduced under the title of "QUIET THOUGHTS FOR SUNDAY," and will contain the brightest bits from the brightest of the Sunday journals.

Besides this, there will be a big competition in which £500 and a huge number of beautiful silver brooches are offered in prizes to readers.

Finally, we come to the serial story written by Arthur Applin, the famous author of so many great serials, entitled: "THE CLATTER OF THE CLOGS." This serial will deal with life in a factory town, and is full of human interest.

Altogether, you will find in SMITH'S WEEKLY all you found in SHORT STORIES, with the addition of an enormous amount of general reading matter thrown in free of cost.

Remember that when you go to purchase next week's number of this paper you must not ask for SHORT STORIES, but for SMITH'S WEEKLY.

YOUR EDITOR.

Digitized by Google

Telling of the Mistake that Hilda Latimer Made.

Hilda Latimer stood before the glass in her pretty dressing-room and surveyed herself complacently. Then she put on her hat, secured it dexterously by means of two pearl-headed hat-pins, and called her maid.

"If anyone asks for me," she said, "I have gone into the village."

"Yes, miss."

Hilda hesitated.

"If Mr. Stanhope should ask," she added, and paused again.

The maid waited. Hilda tapped her dainty little foot upon the soft carpet in impatience at her own indecision.

"You may tell him the same," she said at last.

"Yes, miss."

Hilda went out of the house into the glorious beauty of a summer's afternoon. But she did not turn her steps in the direction of the village.

She had never intended doing so, but she went along the broad gravel paths of the beautiful park until she entered the wood that fringed the lake.

There was a little rustic seat near by, and upon this she seated herself with a sigh of relief. She wanted to be alone, and her recent little deception had been practised with a view to achieving this end.

She was a lovely girl—not more than two-and-twenty—with large, lustrous eyes and a wealth of rich, brown hair that shaded as sweet a face as one need wish to look upon. Her figure was tall and slender, and she moved with a grace that was pleasing to see.

She was just the sweet, womanly woman Nature designed her, and in only two things did she differ very materially from the normal girl of her age.

She was a little—just a little—over-inclined to wilfulness, and she was—or she thought she was—ambitious.

The first of these characteristics was perhaps due in part to the way in which, from her very infancy, she had been spoilt. The second was attributable to no particular cause, and being a woman, was therefore of paramount importance.

She had inspired the belief that she was the possessor of considerable literary ability, and was determined to show the world that her conviction on this head was not without foundation. She began by writing short stories, which she submitted to various magazines, with the result that two had already appeared in the glory of print to gladden the heart and budding ambitions of this charming young authoress.

There is always a rift in the lute, and hers lay in the fact that the journals containing her stories were but fifth-rate publications.

But then she was only a comparative beginner. She was not at all disheartened by her frequent failures. She had a high opinion of her dormant abilities, which, she said, merely wanted developing, and this kept her up when others would have despaired.

But she found the work a little harassing. It prevented her from enjoying herself in the way she had been accustomed to do. There was no earthly need for these self-imposed tasks. She was rich, very beautiful, and the constant centre of genuine admiration. Most girls would have been satisfied with Hilda's lot, but she had other and more important considerations to claim her attention. And now—within the past few days—a new and wonderful idea had come to her that made her tingle with growing excitement.

She would write a novel!

"Let me see," she said, as she sat in solitary state, "there must be a man in it—and a girl. They must love each other, of course, but somehow I must work in a lot of obstacles—a misunderstanding or a quarrel or something of that sort—to keep them apart. And then, in the last chapter, I shall have to clear it all up and marry them off. Yes, that will do splendidly! Oh, how glad I am I've really got genius for this sort of thing!"

She paused and looked doubtfully at the lake. She had a vague feeling that the plot she had contrived had been adopted before. It didn't sound very original. But perhaps she could work in a few side issues which would take off the lack of novelty in the main plot.

Her pretty brows contracted as she compelled herself to think. She was right in the middle of it when she heard a step behind her and a voice said:

"Good afternoon, Miss Latimer. I heard you had gone to the village, so I came down to the lake."

Hilda came out of her meditations and looked sharply at the new comer. She didn't quite know what he meant. It almost sounded as if he had guessed from the outset that she had not gone to the village, and the funny little smile that played about his mouth gave weight to the suspicion.

"I changed my mind," she said coolly. "A lady is allowed to do that, you know."

Edgar Stanhope made her no reply, but, seating himself on the rustic bench beside her, gazed thoughtfully out over the lake. He was a tall, handsome man of about thirty, with close-cropped, auburn hair and dark, flashing eyes. The face was genial and the expression that now distinguished it would have been eminently attractive to any but an irritated authoress whose flow of literary inspiration had been rudely interrupted. So she too looked straight before her over the broad lake and beat a little impatient tattoo on the ground with her feet.

But it was obviously impossible to prolong this sort of thing, so Edgar Stanhope had resource to commonplaces.

"What a splendid day this is!" he said. "It makes one glad only to be alive."

"It's too warm for my liking," responded Hilda.

Edgar Stanhope glanced round at his companion. There was an amused twinkle in his eye as he regarded her steadily.

"I trust my presence is not annoying you, Miss Latimer," he said.

Hilda raised her pretty eyebrows in affected amazement.

"Not in the least," she said freezingly.

Edgar laughed. Try as he might to restrain it, the laugh would come.

"I'm awfully sorry," he said apologetically, "but I really couldn't help it. I'm afraid I disturbed you in some way by my unseasonable arrival. Perhaps you were occupied with some plan for a future story—perhaps even a novel—and I have unwittingly interrupted it."

He levelled the shaft at a venture and stopped to watch its effect. He knew quite well that she had not desired his company and he wanted badly to discover the reason. He knew, too, of her little weakness, and his hint concerning a "future story" had sprung from this knowledge. But the mention of a novel struck the girl as remarkable, since she had told no one of her intention.

"What makes you think," she said slowly, "that I—that I'm going to write a—a novel?"

Digitized by Google

Edgar Stanhope observed the partial admission and made the most of his stray shot.

"That's telling," he said. "Say I guessed it."

Hilda regarded him critically. She liked this tall, strong, handsome young man—liked him a great deal better than she did anyone else. If it had not been for her art—well, she wasn't going to think about that. He was a nice man—a very nice man—and she, Hilda Latimer, liked him very much. But that was all—absolutely and positively all. He grew conscious of her scrutiny, and turned his eyes to meet hers.

But she was too quick for him, and he found her calmly studying the lake again.

"I wonder," he said after a brief pause, "if I could be of any service to you in the building up of this—er—projected novel."

For a moment Hilda's eyes kindled, but she gave him a swift glance to see if he were in earnest or merely teasing her. The glance, however, somewhat reassured her.

"I don't know," she said, still a little loftily. "You've had no experience, you know."

Edgar sighed regretfully and looked helplessly down at the toes of his boots. The assumption of humility was not ill advised, for it effectually concealed the tell-tale twinkle in his eyes.

"I know," he said sorrowfully. "But—but I could learn, couldn't I?"

Hilda considered.

"I don't know," she replied, with the authority of genius. "It isn't all acquired, Mr. Stanhope. It's a gift."

"Well," persisted her companion, "who knows but what I, too, possess the same gift."

Hilda pondered thoughtfully for a moment, and then said:

"Well, it isn't impossible. Let's talk about it. If you'll listen, I'll tell you what is in my mind."

Edgar did as he was desired, and listened patiently to her already explained plot for a new and wonderful novel. The corners of his mouth twitched once or twice as she ticked off the items about "the man," and "the girl," and "the obstacles," and "the happy ending," but she was too absorbed in her subject to notice it. When she had finished there was a long pause, after which she asked him:

"Well, Mr. Stanhope, how does the plot strike you?"

Edgar fidgeted uneasily on the seat.

"I don't know," he said, thoughtfully stroking his chin. "I'm no authority, you know, Miss Latimer. But it'll have at least one merit."

Hilda looked up interestedly.

"What's that?" she asked eagerly.

"It very often happens in real life," replied Edgar with a funny little screw to his countenance. "So I suppose one might call it 'true to life,' you know."

Hilda flashed him a look of gratitude and appreciation, and the two lapsed into silence. Presently, however, Edgar Stanhope cast a furtive glance at his companion's face, and, seeing there no further trace of her former resentment at his presence, turned to her abruptly and said:

"Miss Latimer, I came here this afternoon to ask you a question which concerns my whole future life."

Hilda started, flushed, and made as though to check him. But he went on, heedless of the gesture, in a voice that told all too plainly of the emotion within.

"I love you, Hilda, with all my heart and soul, and my dearest wish is to make you my wife. I am not a poor man, dear, and I think—or, at least, I will try to make you happy. Will you have me, Hilda?"

A whirl of emotions crowded in the girl's mind.

Two things stood out pre-eminently among the rest—first the thought of her work, her art, her novel—and second the realisation that she liked—only liked—she would own no more than that—she liked this Edgar Stanhope very much indeed.

"Oh, I am so sorry," she said, while little pink blushes chased one another across her cheeks. "But it can't be—oh, it can't be! I must think of my work, Mr. Stanhope. If I mar—I mean, if I were so silly as to let such things enter my life, I should never be able to devote all my energies to art and the gifts I unquestionably possess. I must do like the man in the parable, you know, and render up a worthy account of my talents."

Edgar Stanhope seated himself on the rustic bench beside Hilda.

There was silence for a minute or two, and then Edgar said:

"Nature has endowed you, as she has endowed all true women, with an inexhaustible capability for loving. Is this talent to be neglected because of your conscientious realisation of the responsibilities of others?"

Hilda was becoming a little impatient.

"Oh, why didn't you choose Maud or Evelyn?" she said impetuously. "I believe either of them would have accepted you. They haven't any higher responsibilities. Why didn't you ask them?"

"Because," replied Edgar simply, "I didn't happen to fall in love with either of your sisters."

Hilda sighed.

"It's very worrying," she said with emphasis. "I'm sure Evelyn would have made you a splendid wife."

Again there was a short silence, at the end of which Edgar asked:

"Don't you love me a little, Hilda, ever so little?"

Hilda shook her head.

Digitized by Google

"I like you awfully," she said. "But—but I don't love anybody."

Edgar Stanhope looked searchingly into her face. Her eyes met his, and a deep blush swept over her cheek. In an instant she had averted her eyes, and Edgar Stanhope turned away his head. He sighed, but there was a light in his face that certainly did not look like failure or hopelessness.

"Well," he said at last, and he spoke the words slowly, "I think I'll take your advice, Miss Stanhope. I'll make myself agreeable to Evelyn, and, at the end of a month, if I feel justified in doing so, I will propose to her. Allow me to wish you a very good afternoon."

He rose as he finished speaking, and, with a low bow, left her alone on the rustic seat by the park lake.

It seemed so strange when he was gone. There was a sense of loneliness in the air.

Hilda Latimer tried to shake off the feeling, and once more returned to her meditations concerning the forthcoming novel. But somehow the current of her thoughts had been interrupted, and, try as she might, they would not resume their former course. With an exclamation of impatience she got up and returned to the house. And all the way she was thinking of her sister Evelyn.

"She'll be very happy," she said, and then added: "I'm glad my work demands all my attention. It's ever so much better than this everlasting love-making and marrying, and all the rest of it."

But the thought didn't appear to afford her much real consolation after all.

The next day Hilda Latimer sat down before a little table in the seclusion of her own private sitting-room and wrote the title-sheet for her forthcoming novel.

Before beginning, she chanced to glance out to the park beyond, and had caught a distant glimpse of Edgar Stanhope and her sister Evelyn.

The sight seemed to disturb her. It was very absurd, particularly as she herself had recommended it. She wrote half a chapter, and then, her disgust deepening, she tore the whole to ribbons.

A solitary walk through the woods brought her no relief, and she sat down to dinner in a state of inward perturbation. Outwardly, however, she was frigidly self-possessed.

Edgar Stanhope, who was her guest, devoted himself with marked attention to the fair Evelyn, who smiled upon him graciously. Already it seemed as if some definite, though as yet unspoken, understanding existed between them, and Hilda frowned as she watched him wait upon her, anticipating her wishes even before they could be uttered. It was clear Edgar Stanhope had taken her suggestion seriously, and, as she herself had predicted, her sister Evelyn was in no way averse to the attentions of their handsome guest.

It was all just as Hilda had proposed it, and yet she was growing unaccountably miserable at the sight. He didn't even look at her.

And so the days went by, till at the end of a month Hilda had discovered the root of the whole matter and asked no further questions of herself.

A month! He had said he would devote himself to Evelyn for a month, and then, if he felt justified in doing so, ask her to be his wife.

She counted the days and the weeks since that meeting by the park lake. It was just a month ago this very day, and her heart almost stood still as she remembered it. What would he do? Ah, she knew that well enough! She had surprised them more than once, and, though their attitude had scarcely been that of recognised lovers, it had been enough to show Hilda what must be the inevitable issue of their obvious attraction to each other.

He was going away to-morrow—going back to London and his chambers in the Temple, and she knew he would put his question before he went. She stood looking out of the window, a drawn, sad little look on her lovely face, and caught a glimpse of him as he entered the house from a stroll in the park.

There was a look on his face that sent a quick pang to her heart

Evelyn was in the drawing-room, sitting there alone, and she heard him go in that direction. With a little gasp that was curiously like a sob, she put on her things as she had done a month ago and wandered down to the park lake. It was the same scene, the same rustic seat, and yet how different everything seemed.

Art? It had turned to ashes at her touch! Her great novel? She had burnt even the title-page!

What was the matter with her? Alas, she knew now, and the knowledge had come too late! Two big tears trembled on her long, dark lashes, but she brushed them away with an angry gesture. Evelyn was happy—that ought to afford her some consolation. Yet it didn't do even that. She was very miserable, and her heart ached and yearned for what it could not have.

"Good afternoon, Miss Latimer.'

Hilda gave a little start, and looked round in undisguised astonishment.

"Oh," she said, a faint tinge coming into her cheek, "I thought you were indoors, Mr. Stanhope."

"I don't know if you remember," he said slowly, "but it's just a month to-day since we sat on this seat together and you counselled me to think of your sister Evelyn in the light of my—my future wife."

He paused, and looked swiftly at his companion. But she never spoke, and he continued:

"I have spent the month, Miss Latimer, in acquainting myself with the disposition and qualities of your fair sister, and the task has afforded me more pleasure than I can ever express."

Again he paused, and glanced quickly at the girl at his side. Her face was very white, and there was a suspicious tremour of the lips.

"I'm so glad," she said, in a low, strained voice. "Evelyn is a splendid girl, and—and I hope you will be happy, Mr. Stanhope."

Edgar smiled and looked away. When at last his eyes returned to the white face at his side a great, happy light blazed up in them, and he put out one hand towards her. She flushed painfully as she saw the action, but did not move.

"Hilda," he said gently, "have you found out yet that there is more in love than in art?"

"What—what do you mean?" she gasped.

"What I have always meant," Edgar said earnestly. "I have always loved you—and only you. Won't you have me—now?"

Hilda looked up in helpless bewilderment.

"But—but Evelyn?" she said protestingly. "You—you love her—now!" The words seemed to choke her, but she must voice them.

"Evelyn is a dear, good girl," Edgar replied, with a smile. "She knew I loved you, and, like me, she thought you might grow to—to care for me. So we put our heads together and evolved a plan which would stimulate your love, if any existed at all, by means of your jealousy. And she has sent me to you now, dear, to ask you once more to be my true little wife. You don't love me now, don't you, darling?"

She nodded her head, for her lips were trembling too much to speak the word he wanted. But he stopped their trembling by touching them with his own and kissing them passionately.

"What about the novel?" he asked banteringly.

"Oh, bother the novel!" she pouted.

"Let's see," he said teasingly. "There was a man—and a girl—and an obstacle—and, in the end, complete understanding and—and happiness. Wasn't that it?"

Hilda nodded.

"Well," he said, "if we aren't novelists, we're dramatists, for though we have not written the story, we've acted it to perfection."

And then they went back to Evelyn, who met them with a laughing, mischievous face, and then ran away again before Hilda had time to scold her for her innocent little part in the deception which had been practised upon her.

So Art was routed by Love, and when Edgar Stanhope returned to town the following day, he left behind him the happiest girl in all England.

W. J. Mowbray.

Digitized by Google

A SUCCESSFUL EXPERIMENT.

Telling How a Tyrant was Out-Tyrannised.

"I COULD get along with him, I'm quite sure," cried Minnie Roberts.

"Nobody could get along with him!" chorussed the three other Misses Roberts in unison.

Uncle Henry was the personage of whom they spoke—a crabbed, ill-tempered, little old man—who lived in a superb old country seat in Suffolk.

He had money to leave, but his nieces and nephews secretly believed that it would be a deal easier to go to Klondyke and dig fortunes out, nugget by nugget, than to stay at home and earn them by making themselves acceptable to the old gentleman.

Emma Roberts had tried it first.

"No one can help loving Emma," said Mrs. Roberts, as she kissed her daughter good-bye.

But in three weeks Emma came back, half-frightened out of her wits.

Madge Roberts went next, but Madge, although a fine girl, with a spirit of her own, was cowed by Uncle Henry's savage eyes in less than a week.

"I'd sooner sweep crossings for a living," said she, "than be his heiress."

Rhoda Roberts, in no wise abashed by the successive failure of her sisters, was the third one to try Black Grange and its possibilities. But she also succumbed before the terrible scourge of her uncle's savage tongue.

"It's scold, snarl, snarl, scold, from morning till night!" said Rhoda, as in three days' time she tearfully related her experience to her parents.

But here Minnie, the youngest, tallest, and prettiest of the four girls, spoke up:

"I could get along with him, I'm quite sure," she said.

It was sunset—a red, flaming sunset—when she came up the terraced flight of steps that led to the house. Uncle Henry stood on the steps.

"So you are Minnie?" said he, surveying her with little twinkling eyes, like glass beads.

"Yes, I am Minnie," said the bright-cheeked girl, giving him a kiss.

"You're late," said Uncle Henry.

"I am late," said Minnie. "I thought the old carriage never would get here. The horses fairly crept and the roads were horrid."

"It's a dreadfully warm day," growled Uncle Henry

"I'm almost baked," sighed Minnie.

"The whole summer has been rather warm," said the old gentleman.

"We might as well be in the tropics and be done with it," retorted Minnie, flinging off her jacket and fanning herself vehemently.

Uncle Henry gave her the keys that night, just as he had three times before given them to her three sisters.

"I shall expect you to take charge of the whole establishment," said he. "The servants are miserable——"

"No more than one might expect," interrupted Minnie, with a deprecatory motion of her hand. "Servants are mere frauds nowadays!"

"And nothing goes right about the place."

"Nothing ever does," said Minnie.

At breakfast next morning Uncle Henry began to scold as usual.

"Fish again!" said he. "This makes four mornings this week we've had fish."

"I detest fish!" said Minnie, pushing away her plate.

"And the bread stale again!" growled Uncle Henry, breaking one open.

"Please give me the plate, Uncle Henry," said Minnie, and she rang the table bell sharply.

Betty, the cook, a stout, good-humoured woman, made her appearance.

"Betty," said Miss Roberts, "be so good as to throw this bread out of the window."

"But what am I to eat for breakfast?" bewailed Uncle Henry.

"Biscuits, of course," said Minnie. "Anything is better than imperilling one's digestion with such stuff as this! And, Betty, if you send up any more fish in a month you may consider yourself discharged—do you hear?"

"But, my dear, I am rather fond of fish," put in the old gentleman.

"One can't eat fish the whole time," said Minnie imperiously. "Here, Betty—this coffee isn't fit to drink, and the toast is burnt, and you must have put the cooking butter on the table by mistake! Let these errors be rectified at once."

"My dear," said Uncle Henry, "Betty is a very old servant, and——"

"I don't care if she is the age of Methuselah," said Minnie; "nobody can be expected to put up with such wretched cooking as this!"

"I really think she is not so bad, if——"

"Oh, pray don't apologise for her, Uncle Henry," said Minnie. "They are all lazy creatures, who must be discharged promptly if they don't do their duties."

Uncle Henry began to look frightened. He had kept Betty, Jane, and old John for ten years. Was it possible that he had scolded at them for ten years, only to have Minnie Roberts outscold him now?

"My dear," said Uncle Henry, "Betty is generally very excellent, if——"

"Dear uncle," interrupted Minnie, "pray permit me to be the judge of these matters."

Old John, the gardener, was not exempt from his share of the general turmoil. Miss Roberts chanced to hear her uncle reproaching the old man for some fancied neglect in the flower-beds, the pride of his horticultural heart, and she promptly came to his aid.

"Gardening, indeed! Do you call this gardening?" she said. "Uncle Henry, I'm astonished that you keep such a man as that about the place!"

And the torrent of taunts and reproaches which she showered upon the luckless head of poor old John was enough, as that individual observed, "to make one's flesh creep."

"My niece is a young lady of spirit and energy," apologised the old gentleman, when Minnie had gone back to the house.

"Verra like you, sir, verra like you!" said old John.

"Like me!" said Uncle Henry slowly.

And he stood full five minutes, quite speechless and motionless. And at the end of five minutes he spoke two other words, and only two:

"Like—me!"

"There's no knowin' the master, he's that changed," said Betty in the kitchen a week or two later. "He's as mild as a lamb and as peaceable as a kitten."

"Well, isn't that what the young lady told us," said Jane, "when she came down into the kitchen, the first morning after the fire was lighted, and told us she was goin' to try an experiment? We wasn't to mind a word she said, 'cause it was all by contraries. 'He don't know what his temper has got to be,' said she, 'and I'm going to show him.' And, bless her sweet heart, her plan has worked like a charm."

But Uncle Henry took all the credit to himself. He never knew that Minnie had taught him a lesson. And Minnie was his heiress and darling after all—for he will always believe that it was he "who formed her character."

T. B. Handell.

Digitized by Google

WON BY MISTAKE.

Telling of the Curious Dilemma in which Dick Hervey Found Himself.

"THIS is getting on my nerves!" muttered Dick Hervey, pacing up and down the little room which was an offshoot, so to speak, of the private office of Mr. Roger Markham, the head of the firm of Markham and Company, wholesale commission agents. "There's no doubt that the chief is very fond and very proud of his two daughters, but it's a bit hard on a fellow to—to have to put up with as much of it as I do!"

Dick Hervey was his employer's confidential assistant, and as such was intrusted with a good deal of private work as well as office work. He was a go-ahead young fellow, and had risen by sheer ability from the post of errand boy to his present position. He had brains enough to acquire the kind of knowledge which would be useful in that line of business, and in that office in particular, and he was reaping the reward of intelligent and faithful service.

"He would be jolly wild, I expect, if he had any idea of—of——" There Dick stopped and reflected. "I don't see why I shouldn't risk it!" he mused, half audibly. "I believe she rather likes me, you know, and she's just the kind of girl who would make a fellow so happy that he didn't know where he was! 'Faint heart never won fair lady,' so they say, and a girl likes to think that a fellow has done something bold in order to get her!"

He allowed his thoughts to wander again for a few seconds.

"If the chief hadn't had those photos stuck up there I might have got over it, although I was a bit smitten when I saw her and her sister; but when you are brought face to face with a girl's photo every day, and you are half in love with her into the bargain, and you have to mix up with the private business and learn what they are doing this day and that day and hear their praises sung constantly, why it adds fuel to the flame! I am always hearing about them, and they are always hearing about me, because they continually ask the chief to get me to do this and that for them. In fact, we are almost friends without knowing it! Dash it! I'll risk it!"

This resolve taken, Dick's face assumed a determined expression, and he stole in the empty room of his chief and gazed at the two photos. The girls were just budding into womanhood; one was decidedly pretty, the other was plain. There was a charm about both, but the appearance of the pretty one was far more calculated to attract than that of her sister.

"That's my choice!" muttered Dick Hervey, gazing fixedly at the photo of the more attractive girl. "That's Lizzie; I suppose it's really Elizabeth. I'll begin to-day! The chief himself has opened the way by leaving me to send this packet home for him as he is going to stay in town to-night to attend a dinner. 'Address this to my daughter Lizzie,' he said, just as if I knew whether she had been christened Lizzie or Elizabeth. I will add something to the parcel, and that will set the ball rolling."

He had to write a note with the parcel, at the request of his employer, explaining why the parcel was sent instead of being taken home by the proud father, and Dick had the temerity to add a postscript, begging the girl's acceptance of a curiosity which he had "come across" in the city. This was a small book, sold for sixpence, a miniature edition of Handel's "Messiah," with music and words. Lizzie Markham was fond of music, he knew, and the book would arouse her interest.

"I shouldn't be surprised if the chief thought I was trying to woo his daughter in order to get a lift in life; but I don't think that Lizzie will have the same bad opinion of me! I don't care a snap for his money; I can work, and I'll get on in life just as he has done. I don't care if he cuts her off with a shilling, and I fancy that she will be of the same mind. She looks as if she had some go in her!"

It must be confessed that Dick Hervey waited in some trepidation for the result of his first step; he was self-reliant, ready to stand up for himself, but he expected to receive an angry summons from Mr. Markham two mornings later. "I'll own up straight off!" he muttered to himself as he heard the chief enter his private office. "I'll tell him candidly that I am in love with her, and take my chances!"

The bell rang, and Dick entered with a pretended air of nonchalance.

"Just help me through this correspondence, Hervey," said Mr. Markham cheerfully. "Oh, here, before I forget it. Lizzie wants this book changed at the library; see to it, will you!"

He handed a parcel over the table, and Dick Hervey felt a thrill as his hands touched the paper. There seemed to be something magnetic about it; the very knot with which the string was tied suggested a lovers' knot; he longed to cut the string and open the parcel, but he had to control himself.

So far his first step had not been altogether unsuccessful, because Mr. Markham had received no complaint from his daughter—that was evident!

That correspondence seemed endless. At last it was done, and Dick retired to his own apartment. In an instant the parcel of books was opened. A cold chill had swept over him during this rapid process; suppose that Lizzie had deliberately returned the "curiosity" without a word! No! There was a note on the top of the book and it was addressed to him.

It was a pleasant, simple note with a ring of genuineness in it. Lizzie Markham thanked him prettily for the "curiosity," which had greatly interested her. She supposed that he, too, was fond of music. Would he be good enough to send the office boy to the library in order to change the book sent for another?

"Good!" Dick nearly forgot himself and began to shout. She was not only not displeased; she was quite friendly over it. If she had not been interested in him, as well as in the book, she would not have said anything more than a few words of thanks, stiff and formal, whereas she had ventured to say that she supposed he was musical! The book she wanted in exchange for the one returned was a book of poetry, and Dick saw another opportunity.

Digitized by Google

That evening he handed to Mr. Markham the exchange book, neatly packed in brown paper, and the unsuspecting chief took it home without the least notion that he was being made the medium of a love correspondence. Yet in that parcel was a note from Dick Hervey to Miss Lizzie Markham, in which he replied to her inquiry, spoke of the pleasure which certain poems in the new book had given him when he had read them a few days previously, and artfully started an exchange of letters that was to end in undying affection.

"I'm going on with this, and will bring it to a head as soon as I can!" was Dick's comment when, two days later, he found another note in a parcel. "I don't want Mr. Markham to think that I am doing anything underhand. Perhaps he won't be so much annoyed, because Cissie, the plain one, seems to be his favourite."

In answering the second note, Dick grew more bold, and the contents of his reply necessitated a rejoinder that settled for ever in Dick's mind the question whether or not the girl entertained for him a feeling warmer than that of mere condescending friendliness. Within another fortnight a regular correspondence was going on, and the tone of the letters was growing more and more affectionate.

As the correspondence ran its course, the lovers saw each other's character unfold in a manner that surprised and delighted them. Lizzie discovered that the young confidential clerk had qualities which would have been suspected by very few; it was not till one obtained an intimate knowledge of him that these qualities became visible. He was manly, affectionate to a degree, and of sterling worth in every respect. As for Dick, he had not conceived that the girl upon whom his affection had been centred would have proved so womanly, so lovable, so noble. It was a contradiction to the general belief, an exception to the rule, that those who have been gifted with a charming exterior should not be so well endowed with the inner graces.

"Take her, my lad," said Mr. Markham, "and make he happy."

At the end of six weeks there was no longer any question of uncertainty; both had expressed themselves in a way that left no room for doubt that they loved one another.

"I am sending you a photo of myself, dearest," wrote Dick in one letter, "and I should like one of yours."

Lizzie replied that she had not one solitary photo left, but that she would have one taken especially for him.

Having arrived at this stage in their distant courtship, it was but natural that the lovers should cast about for some means of effecting a meeting. Dick longed to take the girl in his arms and kiss the original of the photo in Mr. Markham's office, and he boldly told her so in one letter. He suggested various ways of bringing about a meeting, but all savoured of the clandestine and did not commend themselves exactly to Lizzie.

"I wish it could be arranged that papa would bring you home to dinner one evening," she wrote in the letter in which she gently rejected his schemes. "I will try to engineer it. It seems to me that you might come with him one Saturday and stay till Monday, helping him to make up arrears during Saturday afternoon and evening and then having Sunday free!"

"Splendid!" ejaculated Dick. "I wonder if it can be worked?"

If the lovers had been more cool-headed, they might have considered that this was working matters a trifle under the board, but they saw nothing against it. "We shall soon have to own up, so I want to see her and settle how and when we shall do it!" muttered Dick several times during the next few days.

He waited for some sign of Lizzie's contriving, and he had not long to wait. Mr. Markham jerked it out on the Friday morning, in his spasmodic style.

"I say, Hervey, I don't seem to get even with some of these things this week. How would it suit you to come down to Elstree with me to-morrow and stay till Monday morning? You could help me during the afternoon, you see, and then you'd find it pleasant round there on Sunday at this time of the year. What do you say? Any appointments on?"

"No, sir! That will suit me quite well!" responded Dick. He spoke deferentially, taking care not to show too much readiness.

"Then that settles it!" said Mr. Markham, looking pleased.

The head of the firm rather liked the young fellow, who did not take a yard when he was given an inch, as some up-to-date young fellows are apt to do. It did not occur to Mr. Markham that Dick might take Cupid as a companion.

Dick's heart beat high at the prospect of meeting his beloved; in fact, it did not resume its ordinary rate of motion for the rest of that week. He went about like one in a dream till the moment arrived when he was to accompany Mr. Markham to the train en route for Elstree, and then the nearness of his happiness had the effect of sobering him.

They were nearing Elstree when Mr. Markham introduced the subject of his daughters.

"You have seen them, haven't you? Yes, of course; they have been to the office two or three times—not lately, though. I expect you young fellows have smiled at me for having their photos in my office, but they are very dear to me. Especially—well, I ought not to make invidious distinctions, for they are both very good girls, but Lizzie takes the place of her dead mother more naturally than Cissie, somehow. Lizzie's photo is the left-hand one, you know—the one nearest the door."

Digitized by Google

"You mean that that is the photo of Miss Cissie, as you call her, sir?" corrected Dick quietly.

"Cissie?" said Mr. Markham, looking up questioningly. "Did I say——. What did I say? I thought I said Lizzie! That's what I meant, at any rate! Her photo is nearest the door. Some people think she is decidedly plain, and I admit she has but a modicum of good looks to help her; but Lizzie is my favourite! Only you mustn't say anything of what I have said to you, young man! I fear that I have been telling tales out of school!"

Dick Hervey turned and gazed out of the window, lest Mr. Markham should see the trouble in his face. What did it mean? He was dazed, but he realised that it meant that he had made a dreadful blunder! He had mistaken the names, and had been paying court to the plain girl! He had fallen in love with one girl and had declared that love to another! The plain one! He remembered now that she was just the least bit lame; very slightly and many persons would scarcely notice it. His soul revolted at the thought that he had been binding himself to this girl in words, while in his own heart he had given himself to her sister! He dimly heard Mr. Markham saying that Cissie was away for the week-end so he would have to face Lizzie alone!

It was a terrible dilemma; he shut his teeth hard and tried to think it out. The charm which had pervaded her letters appeared to vanish. How could he take this girl to his heart when he had believed that he was winning her sister?

Could he get out of the dilemma? He thought of pretending to be ill or something, and insisting on taking the train back to town. That would not help him ultimately, he remembered. No; the only thing to be done was to meet her and decide. He could take her aside, on the Sunday, and tell her the truth, asking her to release him. Or, and this was the alternative, he could meet her and say nothing of his mistake! In the former case, Lizzie would be happy, while he—what would that be for him? He could not tell! In the latter case he would be free, and Lizzie—would break her heart!

"What shall I do?" he groaned as the train stopped at Elstree.

As his feet touched the platform, his mental vision appeared to be extended. His whole being changed. Like a flash the many sentences and sentiments of Lizzie's letters passed through his brain.

"She will make a good wife," he murmured. "I will say nothing for her sake! If any one must suffer, it must be I! So I will meet her and let her continue to believe that I have never been thinking of the other. And perhaps—who knows?—I may afterwards be glad that I am acting thus!"

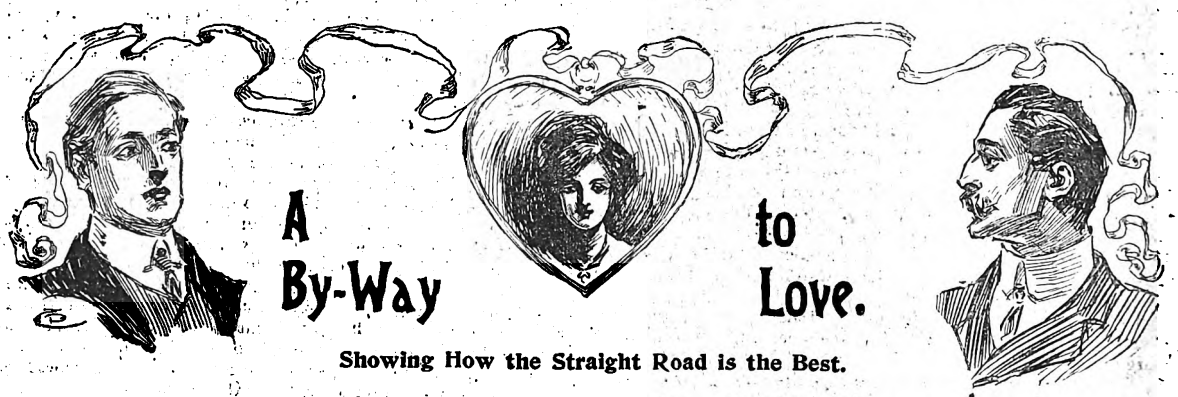
In that frame of mind he met her; and, without even asking for Lizzie's consent, he made a confession to Mr. Markham and requested the hand of that worthy gentleman's daughter in marriage. Mr. Markham was taken completely by surprise, but he promised to think it over.

It was on Sunday morning that Mr. Markham came up to Dick, leading Lizzie by the hand. The girl was blushing and her eyes were downcast.

"Take her, my lad!" said Mr. Markham with a tremulous voice. "And make her happy!"

"I will!" replied Dick Hervey fervently, as he kissed the girl he had wooed and won by mistake.

Lester Muscott.



A By-Way to Love.

Showing How the Straight Road is the Best.

"I can't get the girl's face out of my mind since I saw her a fortnight ago!" murmured Ralph Sothcott. He dropped his pen on the large blotting pad and leant back in his chair. "The fact is, I now discover that I have actually portrayed her—in physical appearance at least—as the heroine of my last short story. Phew!" He grew warm as he thought of the possibility. "I hope she won't read it and recognise herself!"

Ralph Sothcott was a rising young author; he was not conceited, rather the reverse, but it was not extraordinary that he should imagine that most people round about him should read his productions. This girl, whose name he did not even know, was a neighbour, although she apparently resided at one end of the long street and he lived at the other; it was highly probable that she would know about his writing and look out for his stories, and then——!

"I hope to goodness she won't!" he breathed fervently. "If I hadn't sent that manuscript in, I would re-write the story and cut her out! Yet I'm positive that I couldn't find a better character to substitute!"

Ralph Sothcott was conscious that he had spent a good deal of his time since that morning in watching for that girl to pass his window; he had been rewarded several times, and each time he liked the girl's appearance more, so that he had ended by discovering that he had fallen in love with her. He felt that he had committed an absurdity, but he could not help it. He had scrutinised her figure, her bearing, her features, and he had been satisfied with them and had deduced therefrom that her disposition was a loving and a lovable one. If it were not, he argued, her demeanour, the expression on her face, would all have been different from what they were. Yet, after all, it was mainly conjecture on his part!

"I don't care!" cried Ralph, rising and pacing the room restlessly. "I'm in love with her, and I cannot rest till I know more about her, till I come in contact with her. How can I manage it?"

That was a puzzle. Most other young men would have found little difficulty in carrying out some scheme whereby to effect a speaking acquaintance with this young lady, but Ralph was different. He could write love passages, he could evolve schemes and carry them out in fiction, but when it came to practice he was at a loss. He was too bashful to attempt any bold plan, such as some of his own masterful heroes had done.

"I believe that a girl likes a masterful man," he mused sorrowfully, "but I can't carry out anything so bold. I can think of any number of plans, but I couldn't carry them out to save my life!" And just then a horrible thought flashed across his mind and he felt an icy chill go slowly down his back. "Perhaps she is already engaged!"

Digitized by Google

Ralph Sothcott's feelings at that moment were not to be envied. He felt cold in the spine, but very warm in the head, while in the region of the heart there was such a strange sensation that even he, with his experience of describing the sensations of lovers, could not define. It was as if someone were clutching at that organ, preventing it from doing its work properly.

"Suppose she is engaged? I shall never know another happy minute!" he groaned, repeating the very last sentence he had set down on paper. The thought nerved him as nothing else could have done. "I must get to know her somehow, I must!"

Mrs. Peters, his landlady, could tell him about this dainty young lady, but he must be careful. Mrs. Peters looked after him well enough, but she was something of a dragon, and, moreover, she would not wish to lose her lodger, which would certainly happen if he married. He thought the matter over, and he went farther and farther into it till he had excogitated a plan whereby he might find out what the girl was like, if she were engaged, and, if not, whether she liked him—all without betraying himself. "It is so horrid," he told himself, "to lay your heart bare and then find that the object of your affection doesn't want it!"

Laura, his sister, had informed him on one memorable occasion that he would never marry because he was too timid to mingle with the other sex and to make love; and for the same reason, according to the same candid authority, he would never make a great name as a novelist, because a man who cannot make love will certainly not be able to write love passages and describe love scenes, as they should be written and described.

"I think I have succeeded fairly well at the writing," mused Ralph reflectively, "so I may falsify Laura's prediction in the other direction. Yet," he added suddenly, "I believe I succeeded better than ever in that last story, and—and I wrote that while I was falling in love!"

Ralph set to work immediately, and fortune favoured him.

"I have seen a young lady pass here day after day, Mrs. Peters," he mentioned innocently when she brought his tea. "Seems to me that she hasn't any work to do! I distinctly disapprove of girls idling away their young days just because they are too high and mighty to go out to work! It isn't right. It robs a girl of her independence to know that her parents will provide her with all she wants without her raising a finger to help herself!"

His tone was slightly indignant. Glancing askance at Mrs. Peters, he saw that worthy lady's face assume an expression of indignant protest.

"I'm sure you can't know what you're saying about Miss Effie Wallis, Mr. Southcoat!" she said haughtily. She found a difficulty in pronouncing his name as softly as it ought to be uttered, and she usually broadened the vowels and called him "Southcoat." "She is as nice a young lady as you'd wish to speak to—always so pleasant, so good-tempered——"

"I was sure of it!" cried Sothcott triumphantly. "I mean, I am pleased to hear it, Mrs. Peters," he corrected hastily.

Mrs. Peters looked at him with a puzzled air; she inwardly remarked that "them orthers are curious persons," and went on with her defence of Miss Effie Wallis.

"She is a right-minded girl in every way, as I happens to know, Mr. Southcoat. And the reason why she isn't doing nothing just now is as simple as can possibly be. She was in an office, doing shorthand and typewriting, and she hurt her hand. Then the manager wanted to get someone of his own into the place, so he said as he was sorry, but he couldn't wait till her hand got well, and he'd have to fill her place. And so she's been at home, but I do hear as she is looking out for a situation now, or going to."

Sothcott tried to hide his exultation by hastily taking a sip of tea, with the result that he nearly scalded his throat. Things were working in the very way he desired. The fact that Effie Wallis was a typine simplified matters considerably.

"How strange!" he remarked, as soon as he could speak. "I am even now advertising for a young lady to work here. I always have to get my copy typewritten, as most editors insist on it, and I rather fancy that I am suffering from writer's cramp; so I have decided that it will be best to employ a typine and dictate. Girls are best for such a position, and such a lady assistant will save me a lot of time, you know. Wouldn't it be curious if Miss Wallis were to answer the advertisement?"

Mrs. Peters admitted that it would, and even went so far as to say that if she knew the name of the paper in which Mr. Southcoat had advertised, she might contrive to turn Miss Wallis' attention discreetly in that direction. Either Mrs. Peters was dull, or she did not fear losing her lodger.

Sothcott had to be evasive; he had to say that as soon as the advertisement appeared for the second insertion he would let Mrs. Peters see it. And then he had to go out for a walk and take that advertisement straight to the office of a daily paper and arrange to have it appear on the following morning.

The result of that manœuvre was that Miss Effie Wallis made a personal application, which ended in mutually satisfactory terms being settled. Sothcott ordered a second-hand typewriter at once, and Miss Wallis thought that he was very easy to please—he agreed to everything so readily.

The commencement of the following week saw Miss Wallis installed in her new position; it also saw Sothcott more in love than ever and deeply embarrassed concerning his plan of work and his plan of a love campaign. How on earth was he going to dictate love passages of stories to her?

However, after the first morning they settled down fairly well. During the first day the work was prosaic, mainly consisting of collecting data for an article; the embarrassment almost vanished, and Sothcott noted with satisfaction that she wore no engagement ring!

Ralph Sothcott found that Effie Wallis was not a mere slip of a girl, but in reality a woman; she was twenty-three (he was three years older, he remembered), and she was sensible and would not laugh at this or that when he dictated it, like a giddy schoolgirl.

She took the endearing sentences in a matter-of-fact way that set him at ease; it was all business, nothing more.

It was sweet to have her near; she was so helpful that he caught himself wondering how he could have got on without her. In fact, it was so pleasant to have her with him that he postponed from day to day the further execution of his plan, lest she should leave him, as she would be bound to do if he made his love known to her and she did not return it.

Then the perversity of human nature began to manifest itself; he had hoped that she would not prove embarrassing, that she would take things in a matter-of-fact way; and now that she was doing so, he was cross. Why, if she acted so coolly, he would be quite unable to make any further headway with his scheme of love-making! It was too bad!

He flattered himself that it was rather an original idea; he intended to write a story, in which he would make use of certain remarks. Those sentences would be really intended for Miss Wallis herself; if she betrayed any emotion, he would understand that she was in love with him, and if she showed no perturbation, then he would assume that she did not care for him. In that way he would spare himself the pain of rejection, and she would not be forced to withdraw.

It was nearly a month after her first appearance when he made the venture; he could not delay any longer.

"Miss Wallis," he said, as she settled down at her table, ready for work, "I should like to give you an outline of the story I wish to commence this morning. It is rather strange, but I feel doubtful. That is rather uncommon with me, I think. I should like to know what you think of it."

"Certainly, Mr. Sothcott!" she replied with alacrity. Her face showed pleasure at this action on his part. "I don't know that I am a very competent judge, but I will do my best!"

"Oh, yes! You see, you are a woman, and you can tell me if I have judged them aright! I am afraid that my heroines are not always very human. I make the lovers talk a lot of rot to them, I fear. Do you think so?"

"They appear to like it!" answered Effie Wallis demurely.

Digitized by Google

That was not encouraging; there was nothing in that answer to show whether Effie Wallis liked it or not. Sothcott felt awkward, but he plunged into an outline of his story, while the woman he was longing to fold in his arms sat as still and unmoved as a marble figure.

"Looks as if my case were hopeless!" thought Sothcott. "If she thought anything of me, I fail to see that she could have sat there and given no sign of having recognised that I have woven a story round two characters which are none other than she and myself! Yet she hasn't moved a muscle!"

"The idea is good enough," pronounced Effie Wallis critically, "but it seems to me that you do not work it out clearly. I think that you should make it plainer to the heroine that the hero is in love. A woman wouldn't think that she was being treated fairly, perhaps, to have it conveyed to her in such enigmatic fashion!"

"Oh, wouldn't she?" asked Sothcott apprehensively. "Then you think I had better make him convey it more plainly? All right! We can do that in the writing!"

Sothcott's heart was heavy; Effie had not blushed charmingly and given him the sign for which he was waiting. He must make some of his allusions in the story more pointed, not only for the edification of the heroine, but also for the benefit of the typine!

So he began to dictate the story. He described the feelings of the young man when he first saw the girl passing through the street, and told how he watched for her and wondered how he could get an introduction.

He grew quite eloquent on this portion of the tale; he was describing his own feelings, his own hopes and fears, and he could do it to perfection. In the depths of his own emotion, he surpassed his previous literary efforts and drew a really grand picture. He came back to himself with a start and glanced quickly at her for an indication that she had divined his secret; she looked a little warm, probably because he had been dictating at a quicker rate than usual, but otherwise she was perfectly self-possessed.

The next stage was to relate how they met, and in this particular he departed from actual fact; the hero and heroine met in a very conventional manner at a ball, and, in a quiet corner, the hero began a conversation in which he timidly tried to convey to the heroine the fact that he loved her without actually saying so outright. In the dictation of this portion, Sothcott was distinctly flat and hesitating. It was not at all on a par with the pathos of the first portion.

It was the dialogue that gave him the most trouble; he could not find the proper words, either for the hero or for himself. He wanted to tell Effie that he loved her—he desired to make her understand it, rather than tell her—and to gain a clue to her own feelings, but the flow of thought and expression would not come right.

He would first dictate something which had no actual meaning; then he would tell her to strike that out and begin again, only to dictate another sentence which appeared to have no relation to the subject. Or else he would say something which was too plain to fit in with the tenour of the story, and he would stop abruptly in the middle of it for two reasons; firstly, because it was out of keeping, and, secondly, because he was afraid that his own thoughts were showing themselves to Effie in too plain a manner.

The poor fellow was in a dilemma, and it must be conceded to him in palliation that a part of his trouble was due to a chivalrous desire to spare Effie the vexation of rejecting him if she did not love him and of leaving her present post and finding a new one. If Effie had manifested any irritation at the frequent erasures and "let us begin again on a fresh sheet of paper," it would have relieved him, but she worked on quietly and patiently, as a good typine should.

"I think I must give it up for to-day!" he cried at last. "I'm making rather a mess of it!"

"I am afraid you are!" returned Effie sympathetically, yet unequivocably. "I don't think the second part of the story is good, if I may venture to say anything."

"Certainly!" cried Ralph. "I shall be glad to hear your views; perhaps you can help me out!"

"That idea of meeting in the ball-room is so commonplace; it ought to have come about in a more original manner."

"It did, in reality!" said Ralph quickly, eager to maintain his reputation. "But go on!" he added. "I interrupted you."

"It seems to me," pursued Effie Wallis calmly, "that the hero is giving himself a lot of trouble for nothing! Why couldn't he have told her straight out that he loved her?"

Ralph's breath came hard; in his agitation he paced the room with uncertain steps. He was so full of himself that he forgot that the idea of the story was not in agreement with the fact, and consequently he uttered words which had no bearing on the fiction. He did not notice that he was betraying himself.

Effie stooped to pick up her eraser, which she had dropped while toying with it. Perhaps that was why her face was so red when Ralph glanced in her direction.

There was an awkward pause. Effie appeared to have caught some of Ralph's agitation, for she rose from her chair and stood on his side of the table, her fingers nervously playing with the eraser.

"You think we had better not go on with it?" asked Ralph sadly. He was hopelessly mixing the personal with the fictitious.

Effie did not answer for the moment, but when he glanced at her, in a quick, appealing manner, she roused herself.

"I don't think it is fair to her!" she exclaimed, her voice trembling just a little with emotion. "You are sparing yourself rather than her. I mean the hero, of course! The girl would sooner or later jump at what he meant, and she would really be refusing him! But suppose she did not intend to reject him? See what a position she is placed in! It isn't fair! Why not say it straight out and take the consequences? But in that case," she added, turning away to hide her burning cheeks, "I suppose there would be no story, because it would be the usual commonplace."

"You are right!" cried Ralph Sothcott warmly, "and I feel that I have not acted properly, under a mistaken notion. No story? Bother the story! What do I care about the story? I don't want it! It's you I want, Effie—there, I've said it straight out! Effie!"—he took her gently by the arm and compelled her to turn and face him, which she did with hot cheeks and a half defiant, half appealing air. "I want you, Effie; may I have you?"

Effie said afterwards, when she had smoothed her ruffled hair, that he didn't give her time to answer, but just took possession of her willy-nilly, to which Ralph retorted that he read her reply clearly enough in her lovely eyes!

"And you gave yourself such a lot of trouble to accomplish what might have been attained by going straight to the point," laughed Effie. "Oh, please don't! No, I cannot say exactly when I began to love you, Ralph, so don't bother! I shall have to reflect and trace the sentiment back to its origin! Now, are we to do any more work to-day?"

"Work?" echoed Ralph in surprise. "How can I work to-day?"

"You mustn't grow lazy!" she admonished, holding up a warning finger with mock severity. "You have assumed larger responsibilities!"

"That may be, but the story is a failure and we must tear it up!"

"Not entirely! The first part is grand, because you felt what you were writing. The second part can be torn up, and it can be written in a different strain. I think that will be quite easy with the help of recent experiences, don't you, Ralph?" she asked boldly, and with a merry light dancing in her eyes.

There was more confusion, and then Effie discovered that it was time she went home to lunch. She did not return because, as Ralph informed Mrs. Peters, it was arranged that she should remain at home till the wedding, and he would work alone. Left to himself that afternoon, he took up his pen and finished the story in a way that enhanced his reputation and made Effie supremely happy as she read it.

J. Hartley.

Digitized by Google

PHANTOM SHADOWS.

A Story of Love and Crime.

By ARNOLD BENNETT.

TWENTY-NINTH CHAPTER.

Theodore is Called to the Rescue.

WHEN Nella returned to the State bedroom both the doctor and the great specialist were again in attendance. The two physicians moved away from the bedside as she entered, and began to talk quietly together in the embrasure of the window.

"A curious case!" said the specialist.

"Yes. Of course, as you say, it's a neurotic temperament that's at the bottom of the trouble. When you've got that and a rigorous constitution working one against the other, the results are apt to be distinctly curious. Do you consider there is any hope, Sir Charles?"

"If I had seen him when he recovered consciousness I should have said there was hope. Frankly, when I left last night, or rather this morning, I didn't expect to see the Prince alive again—let alone conscious, and able to talk. According to all the rules of the game, he ought to get over the shock to the system with perfect ease and certainty. But I don't think he will. I don't think he wants to. And moreover, I think he is still under the influence of suicidal mania. If he had a razor he would cut his throat. You must keep his strength up. Inject, if necessary. I will come in this afternoon. I am due now at St. James's Palace." And the specialist hurried away, with an elaborate bow and a few hasty words of polite reassurances to Prince Aribert.

When he had gone Prince Aribert took the other doctor aside. "Forget everything, doctor," he said, "except that I am one man and you are another, and tell me the truth. Shall you be able to save his Highness? Tell me the truth."

"There is no truth," was the doctor's reply. "The future is not in our hands, Prince."

"But you are hopeful? Yes or no?"

The doctor looked at Prince Aribert. "No!" he said shortly. "I am not. I am never hopeful when the patient is not on my side."

"You mean——"

"I mean that his Royal Highness has no desire to live. You must have observed that."

"Only too well," said Aribert.

"And you are aware of the cause?"

Aribert nodded an affirmative.

"But cannot you remove it?"

"No," said Aribert. He felt a touch on his sleeve. It was Nella's finger. With a gesture she beckoned him towards the ante-room.

"If you choose," she said, when they were alone, "Prince Eugen can be saved. I have arranged it."

"You have arranged it?" He bent over her, almost with an air of alarm.

"Go and tell him that the million pounds which is so necessary to his happiness will be forthcoming. Tell him that it will be forthcoming to-day, if that will be any satisfaction to him."

"But what do you mean by this, Nella?"

"I mean what I say, Aribert," and she sought his hand and took it in hers. "Just what I say. If a million pounds will save Prince Eugen's life, they are at his disposal."

"But how—how have you managed it? By what miracle?"

"My father," she replied softly, "will do anything that I ask him. Do not let us waste time. Go and tell Eugen it is arranged, that all will be well. Go!"

"But we cannot accept this—this enormous, this incredible favour. It is impossible."

"Aribert," she said quickly, "remember you are not in Posen holding a Court reception. You are in England and you are talking to an American girl who has always been in the habit of having her own way."

The Prince threw up his hands and went back into the bedroom. The doctor was at a table writing out a prescription. Aribert approached the bedside, his heart beating furiously. Eugen greeted him with a faint, fatigued smile.

"Eugen," he whispered, "listen carefully to me. I have news. With the assistance of friends I have arranged to borrow that million for you. It is quite settled, and you may rely on it. But you must get better. Do you hear me?"

Eugen almost sat up in bed. "Tell me I am not delirious," he exclaimed.

"Of course you aren't," Aribert replied. "But you mustn't sit up. You must take care of yourself."

"Who will lend the money?" Eugen asked in a feeble, happy whisper.

"Never mind. You shall hear later. Devote yourself now to getting better."

The change in the patient's face was extraordinary. His mind seemed to have put on an entirely different aspect. The doctor was startled to hear him murmur a request for food. As for Aribert, he sat down, overcome by the turmoil of his own thoughts. Till that moment he felt that he had never appreciated the value and the marvellous power of mere money, of the lucre which philosophers pretend to despise and men sell their souls for. His heart almost burst in its admiration for that extraordinary Nella, who by mere personal force had raised two men out of the deepest slough of despair to the blissful heights of hope and happiness.

"These Anglo-Saxons," he said to himself, "what a race!"

By the afternoon Eugen was noticeably and distinctly better. The physicians, puzzled for the third time by the progress of the case, announced now that all danger was past. The tone of the announcement seemed to Aribert to imply that the fortunate issue was due wholly to unrivalled medical skill, but perhaps Aribert was mistaken. Anyhow, he was in a most charitable mood, and prepared to forgive anything.

"Nella," he said, a little later, when they were by themselves again in the ante-chamber, "what am I to say to you? How can I thank you? How can I thank your father?"

"You had better not thank my father," she said. "Dad will affect to regard the thing as a purely business transaction, as, of course, it is. As for me, you can—you can——"

"Well?"

"Kiss me," she said. "There! Are you sure you've formally proposed to me, mon prince?"

"Ah! Nell!" he exclaimed, putting his arms round her again. "Be mine! That is all I want!"

"You'll find," she said, "that you'll want dad's consent, too!"

"Will he make difficulties? He could not, Nell—not with you!"

"Better ask him," she said sweetly.

A moment later Racksole himself entered the room.

"Going on all right?" he inquired, pointing to the bedroom.

"Excellently," the lovers answered together, and they both blushed.

"Ah!" said Racksole. "Then, if that's so, and you can spare a minute, I've something to show you, Prince."

THIRTIETH CHAPTER.

Conclusion.

"I'VE a great deal to tell you, Prince," Racksole began, as soon as they were out of the room, "and also, as I said, something to show you. Will you come to my room? We will talk there first. The whole hotel is humming with excitement."

Digitized by Google

"With pleasure," said Aribert.

"Glad his Highness Prince Eugen is recovering," Racksole said, urged by considerations of politeness.

"Ah! As to that——" Aribert began.

"If you don't mind, we'll discuss that later, Prince," Racksole interrupted him.

They were in the proprietor's private room.

"I want to tell you all about last night," Racksole resumed, "about my capture of Jules, and my examination of him this morning." And he launched into a full account of the whole thing, down to the least details. "You see," he concluded, "that your suspicions as to Bosnia were tolerably correct. But as regards Bosnia, the more I think about it, the surer I feel that nothing can be done to bring their criminal politicians to justice."

"And as to Jules, what do you propose to do?"

"Come this way," said Racksole, and led Aribert to another room. A sofa in this room was covered with a linen cloth. Racksole lifted the cloth—he could never deny himself a dramatic moment—and disclosed the body of a dead man.

It was Jules, dead, but without a scratch or mark on him.

"I have sent for the police—not a street constable, but an official from Scotland Yard," said Racksole.

"How did this happen?" Aribert asked, amazed and stagtled. "I understood you to say that he was safely immured in the bedroom."

"So he was," Racksole replied. "I went up there this afternoon, chiefly to take him some food. The commissionaire was on guard at the door. He had heard no noise, nothing unusual. Yet when I entered the room Jules was gone. He had by some means or other loosened his fastenings; he had then managed to take the door off the wardrobe. He had moved the bed in front of the window, and by pushing the wardrobe door three-parts out of the window, and lodging the inside end of it under the rail at the head of the bed, he had provided himself with a sort of insecure platform outside the window. All this he did without making the least sound. He must then have got through the window, and stood on the little platform. With his fingers he would just be able to reach the outer edge of the wide cornice under the roof of the hotel. By main strength of arms he had swung himself on to this cornice, and so got on to the roof proper. He would then have the run of the whole roof. At the side of the building facing Salisbury Lane there is an iron fire-escape, which runs right down from the ridge of the roof into a little sunk yard level with the cellars. Jules must have thought that his escape was accomplished. But it unfortunately happened that one rung in the iron escape-ladder had rusted rotten through being badly painted. It gave way, and Jules, not expecting anything of the kind, fell to the ground. That was the end of all his cleverness and ingenuity."

As Racksole ceased speaking he replaced the linen cloth with a gesture from which reverence was not wholly absent.

When the grave had closed over the dark and tempestuous career of Tom Jackson, once the pride of the Grand Babylon, there was little trouble for the people whose adventures we have described. Miss Spencer, that yellow-haired, faithful slave and attendant of a brilliant scoundrel, was never heard of again. Possibly to this day she survives, a mystery to her fellow-creatures, in the pension of some cheap foreign boarding house. As for Rocco, he certainly was heard of again. Several years after the events set down, it came to the knowledge of Félix Babylon that the unrivalled Rocco had reached Buenos Ayres, and by his culinary skill was there making the fortune of a new and splendid hotel. Babylon transmitted the information to Theodore Racksole, and Racksole might, had he chosen, have put the forces of the law in motion against him. But Racksole, seeing that everything pointed to the fact that Rocco was now pursuing his vocation honestly, decided to leave him alone. The one difficulty which Racksole experienced after the demise of Jules—and it was a difficulty which he had, of course, anticipated—was connected with the police. The police, very properly, wanted to know things. They desired to be informed what Racksole had been doing in the Dimmock affair, between his first visit to Ostend and his sending for them to take chrge of Jules' dead body. And Racksole was by no means inclined to tell them everything. Beyond question he had transgressed the laws of England.

The inquest upon Jules aroused some bother; and about ninety-and-nine separate and distinct rumours. In the end however, a compromise was arrived at. Racksole's first aim was to pacify the inspector whose clue, which by-the-way was a false one, he had so curtly declined to follow up. That done, the rest needed only tact and patience. He proved to the satisfaction of the authorities that he had acted in a perfectly honest spirit.

One afternoon, a fortnight after the recovery of the Hereditary Prince of Posen, Aribert, who was still staying at the Grand Babylon, expressed a wish to hold converse with the millionaire. Prince Eugen, accompanied by Hans and some Court officials whom he had sent for, had departed with immense pomp, armed with the comfortable million, to arrange formally for his betrothal.

"I wish to tell you," said Aribert, "that it is my intention to renounce all my rights and titles as a Royal Prince of Posen, and to be known in future as Count Hartz— a rank to which I am entitled through my mother. Also that I have a private income of ten thousand pounds a year, and a chateau and a town house in Posen. I tell you this because I am here to ask the hand of your daughter in marriage. I love her, and I am vain enough to believe that she loves me. I have already asked her to be my wife, and she has consented."

"You honour us, Prince," said Racksole, with a slight smile, "and in more ways than one. May I ask your reason for renouncing your princely titles?"

"Simply because the idea of a morganatic marriage would be as repugnant to me as it would be to yourself and to Nella."

"I suppose it has occurred to you that ten thousand pounds per annum, for a man in your position, is a somewhat small income. Nella is frightfully extravagant."

"Nella must reform her ways," Aribert said.

"If she is content to do so," Racksole went on, "well and good! I consent."

"In her name and my own, I thank you," said Aribert.

"And," the millionaire continued, "so that she may not have to reform too fiercely, I shall settle on her absolutely, with reversion to your children, if you have any, a lump sum of fifty million dollars—that is to say, ten million pounds—in sound, selected railway stock. I reckon that is about half my fortune. Nella and I have always shared equally."

Aribert made no reply. The two men shook hands in silence, and then it happened that Nella entered the room.

That night, after dinner, Racksole and his friend Félix Babylon were walking together on the terrace.

"I suppose, Racksole," Félix said, "you aren't getting tired of the Grand Babylon?"

"Why do you ask?"

"Because I am getting tired of doing without it. A thousand times since I sold it to you I have wished I could undo the bargain. I can't bear idleness. Will you sell?"

"I might," said Racksole, "I might be induced to sell."

"What will you take, my friend?" asked Félix.

"What I gave," was the quick answer.

"Eh!" Félix exclaimed. "I sell you my hotel with Jules, with Rocco, with Miss Spencer. You go and lose all those three inestimable servants, and then offer me the hotel without them at the same price! It is monstrous," The little man laughed heartily at his own wit. "Nevertheless," he added, "we will not quarrel about the price. I accept your terms."

And so was brought to a close the complex chain of events which had begun when Theodore Racksole ordered a steak and a bottle of Bass at the table d'hote of the Grand Babylon Hotel

The End.

Digitized by Google

THE MISSING CLUE.

Telling of an Adventure at an Old Well.

"THANK you, Miss Hensley!" There was a world of bitter reproach in Basil Cartwright's voice, and his handsome face emphasised the bitterness by the expression of deep pain that overspread it. "I love you, and I imagined that you were learning to return that affection; it did not occur to me that you were using me as a plaything, that you were amusing yourself with me in the absence of the man to whom you are secretly engaged!"

Macie Hensley started as if he had struck her; her lovely face grew as pale as death and then the colour came back to her cheeks and flooded them with crimson. Her eyes flashed, and her whole frame quivered as she straightened her tall, exquisitely-moulded figure to defend herself; but something seemed to stop the torrent of refutation which rose to her lips. For a few seconds she could not speak; when she did find her voice, the indignation had changed to something akin to an appeal.

"Why do you think so badly of me, Mr. Cartwright?" she asked with quivering lips. "I have never encouraged your attentions! I liked your society"—the crimson hue became a trifle deeper here—"but I had no idea! Yes, it is true—I am engaged! The engagement was not to be made known yet, and the revelation made to you just now through a slip of the tongue, places you in possession of information which I ask you, on your honour, to keep secret for the present! The engagement was not hidden by me to deceive you, as you have unjustly hinted!"

"Then why is it a secret?" he asked, forgetting that it was really no concern of his. "Are you not proud to let the world know that you have allied yourself to a man much older than yourself because he is rich?"

The girl shrank from him and raised her hands after the manner of one parrying a blow. That movement brought Basil Cartwright to his senses; his wounded feelings had got the better of him. In a moment the gentleman within him had triumphed.

"I beg your pardon!" he said humbly. "Whatever I feel, I have no right to upbraid you in that fashion! I will leave you now; I do not suppose that we shall meet again; I will try to keep out of your sight! I have not been drafted here long, so I can tell the head office that the place does not agree with me, and ask them to send me to a branch at the opposite end of the country."

He bowed and turned away. He stood motionless, gazing out of the window and apparently unconscious that he was standing with his back to her; he had lost himself in bitter memories. After a few moments he went slowly out of the room, talking audibly to himself, and she caught the name of John Poole, the man to whom she was engaged.

If Basil Cartwright could have seen Macie Hensley after he had left her, he would have modified his opinion concerning the real character of the engagement, and the whole course of events would have been changed. Life is full of those "Might-have-beens!"

So Basil Cartwright went on his way, uttering his thoughts half-aloud—went on his way to disaster!—and Macie wept in her trouble, knowing not of the greater trouble that was coming!

She learnt of that trouble very early on the following morning, when the news spread through the town like wildfire that John Poole had been found shot on the moor; and scarcely had she recovered from the first effects of this blow when she was told that Basil Cartwright was in custody on a charge of having shot John Poole and wounded him in a manner which was almost sure to prove fatal.

Some people said that the police had their hands full of work just then, for they were still in the midst of their task of unravelling the mystery of the many burglaries which had alarmed the surrounding gentry; or, perhaps, it would be more correct to say that they were only on the threshold of their task, for they had not made any headway. And now here was another burglary and an attempted murder on the self-same night!

Other people said that it was a good thing that the evidence in the case of attempted murder was so clear. It was true that nobody knew that John Poole had returned from his journey south, but that was not of importance, that seeing he was there, and badly wounded; but there was very little doubt that Basil Cartwright was the guilty party. Of course, Cartwright himself stoutly denied the charge; but his denial did not count.

The facts were simple. Poole was found lying on the moor, bleeding from a wound in the side; that was quite early in the morning. His watch and chain, his purse, with money in it, and other things (such as a gold pencil-case) were untouched; this pointed to some motive other than robbery, and revenge was the best motive to settle on. Now Basil Cartwright had been seen late at night not a long way from the moor, and he was heard to mutter the name of John Poole together with a remark that Poole had already done him one injury, and now was doing him another by taking Macie from him. The man who overheard this muttering was surprised at Cartwright's behaviour; the young man appeared to be a "bit looney-like." What had Miss Hensley to do with Poole? Poole had certainly paid her some attention, and the same remark applied to Cartwright himself; so—what? It did not take long for the inhabitants of the town to put two and two together, aided as they were by Macie's own incoherent words and her insistence on seeing the wounded, unconscious man.

Cartwright had been on the moor late at night; he admitted that, and it would not have been useful to deny it, for he had been seen on the edge of the moor, and near O'Grady's cottage. The curious thing was that a pearl was found near that cottage—a pearl which formed part of the property stolen by the burglars, who had entered Sir Richard Grenby's residence before midnight!

Digitized by Google

Then, Cartwright was confused when seen coming off the moor, and there was a bloodstain on his coat sleeve. He did not pretend that he had scratched his finger, or anything of that kind; he simply said that he couldn't account for it.

It did not take the inhabitants of the quiet town long to sum it all up. Macie had given the confirmation of the clue uttered by Cartwright in his muttering. Macie was secretly engaged to Poole; Cartwright also wanted her, and had been refused; in his jealous rage at this discovery, Cartwright had shot his successful rival, perhaps in a quarrel. Poole was not conscious, so he could not give any information whether there had been a quarrel or not, but as he had plainly been fired at from a point almost in front, it was quite probable that there had been some words between the two men.

The wound had been inflicted by a bullet from a revolver, but the revolver was not to be found.

After having attained her object in visiting the wounded man, who lay motionless and at death's door, Macie declared that she must visit the prisoner. Again she was so insistent that, through the influence of her uncle, her only relative, she was granted permission to visit Cartwright.

"She don't carry on much!" said one woman to another, as Macie left the house in which the wounded man lay. "Happen she don't care much for him after all. Queer affair, that engagement, eh? Wonder why she should hit on a man like Poole? She's as pretty a girl as you'd find anywhere, and it's no wonder that so many of the young fellows run after her!"

Yet the sight of the white, set face impressed them. Within that slight, girlish frame was an indomitable spirit; she was a girl who would do much.

They were granted a private interview, Macie and Cartwright, after the former had given a positive assurance that she carried no weapon or other instrument that could serve the prisoner. Macie repressed a shudder; it was not so much the question of an attempt at escape as the possibility of suicide, against which the police felt bound to take such precautions.

As Macie entered the cell, Cartwright, who had been seated with his elbows resting on his knees, and his face buried in his hands, looked up wearily. His face had grown very haggard in that short time. He stared at Macie as though he could not believe the evidence of his senses; then he sprang to his feet and faced her. Thus they stood for a full minute, gazing steadfastly at one another without speaking.

"Well," he exclaimed at length. "Why have you come here, Miss Hensley? To upbraid me for shooting your lover? Of course you believe me guilty, like all the rest?"

He spoke drearily; there was no trace of bitterness in his voice, only blank despair.

Macie's eyes had been fixed upon him with a penetrating gaze. As he finished speaking she held out her hand to him.

"No," she declared steadily. "I do not believe you guilty! I had my doubts at first, that is partly why I came here—to see if my doubts were justified. I am satisfied now that they are not!"

"Do you really mean that?" he demanded quickly, his whole demeanour changing. "Do you mean it?" he demanded again, seizing her hand with both his own, while his eyes looked searchingly into her, which withstood the scrutiny unflinchingly. "Heaven be thanked!" he added gratefully. "At least one person believes in my innocence!"

"I do!" confirmed Macie decisively. "And now, I wish to do what is possible to solve this mystery. The pistol must be found! You were on the moor somewhere about the time that the—the attempted murder took place. Did you see anyone or anything?"

"I passed two men near the edge of the moor," returned Basil, striving to collect his scattered thoughts. "One was O'Grady, I vaguely remember his voice. I had forgotten about the other man; that must have been just before I saw O'Grady. I brushed against him near that clump of bushes, you know the place better than I. You are not so new to the moor as I am. I apologised for brushing against him I recollect now, and wished him 'Good night' after the usual fashion, but he only growled."

"You brushed against him?" asked Macie eagerly. "Which side?"

"He was on my right," answered Basil, regarding her with some surprise.

"The bloodstain on your clothes—is that on the right?" was the further eager query.

"Yes!" came the swift response, as a light crept into the eyes of the accused. "Miss Hensley! Can it be——"

He was alive now; roused from the lethargy into which he had fallen, his eyes danced with intelligence.

"It means that you brushed against the murderer!" she declared positively. "It will be difficult to make the police believe that, especially if no trace can be discovered of the man, but we must try. I think I will visit the spot first, before the fact is mentioned to the police. I wonder that you did not tell them——"

"Because the events of yesterday upset me too much!" he said frankly. "I do not wish to rake up old troubles, Miss Hensley, but that is the truth. I am better now, and I can give all the known facts to the solicitor whom my friends will engage to defend me. If you can help me——"

"I must seek the key to this mystery, for Mr. Poole's sake, if for no other reason!" she replied slowly. "I will ask for another interview with you later. Perhaps not till to-morrow, though!"

They shook hands like old friends in mutual distress, and Macie left the prison. Cartwright fell back on his seat with a sigh; he was more deeply in love with Macie than ever. Miss Hensley wondered what the feeling was that disturbed her heart as she left the gloomy prison, but she refused to probe it. She was afraid, although she did not confess her fear.

"That clump of bushes," murmured Macie as she went along the town in the direction of her home in company with her uncle, a gentleman of some means, and much less ability. "The police are searching for the revolver, but they will not go so far as that clump of bushes yet. And those bushes hide a deep well, unused because the water became foul. Is it possible?"

With that extraordinary determination that comes to many of the seeming frail girls and women in times of trial—with the determination and courage that have made the name of the British women resound throughout the world in the troublesome times of war and the equally great dangers of peaceful cities—Macie went to work. She might have told the police and let them do the work, but she was possessed by an indefinable desire to do it herself, if it did not prove to be beyond her strength. That actuating desire was born of a sentiment which she recognised later.

She deemed it advisable to wait till dusk before venturing on her hazardous mission, but so soon as the daylight began to fail, she was off. Her easy-going, somewhat simple-minded uncle left her much to her own devices and she was often out at parties, so there was no difficulty. When well on her road, she began to reflect that it would have been better to have brought Jim, the odd man, or have told someone.

"No matter!" she told herself impatiently. "I have set out on the errand now, and I'll go through with it!"

It was quite dark when she came within sight of the clump of bushes; or, more correctly, it would have been within seeing distance if there had been a moon, but it was very dark. Macie knew where she was and made her way cautiously and unerringly to her destination.

"The old rope was still hanging from the stiffened windlass a few weeks ago," she muttered, "so I hope it is there still! Will it bear my weight, I wonder? If it hadn't been for the superstition of the people about here, that rope would have been appropriated before it reached its present condition, but the belief is that it is risky to have anything to do with the old well. It is a fact that three men lost their lives in the attempt to purify it!"

Digitized by Google

Superstition is not good in a general way, but Macie was grateful for the prevalence of that sentiment in the minds of those who lived in the neighbourhood, for it gave her the chance she desired. She penetrated the clump with unusual caution, for she fancied she might light on some other evidence in connection with the attempt on John Poole. Arrived at the well, she felt along the broken wall that surrounded the mouth and passed her hand along the windlass; the rope was still hanging!

She had dressed herself in a short, tight-fitting skirt, which she wore for gymnasium exercises and this left her tolerably free. In a moment she was seated on the crumbling wall and was pulling up the rope to ascertain if it were long enough to reach the bottom. This fact was ascertainable by examining the lower end of the rope; if it were frayed to any extent, it would suggest that it had been worn away. To her delight she found that the hook was still attached to the end, proving that it was entire.

"It remains now to prove whether it is strong enough to bear me or not!" she soliloquised. "It feels rather rotten, but it may hold. H'm! I shall have to risk it!"

It was a curious scene, this night scene in the clump of bushes! Some of the shrubs had grown to a length which made them bow over towards the well, thus forming something in the nature of a shelter.

Macie realised the risk she ran; if the rope snapped, she would fall a terrible way into the hollow that yawned below her, she would be so injured that she would lie at the bottom and drown or, if the well chanced to be dry, she would lie there huddled up till death came to release her from pain! Nevertheless, she set her lips firmly and prepared for the descent into the depths!

She had allowed the lower end of the rope to fall down the shaft; there was nothing more to unwind from the windlass; so she gripped the decaying line and gently swung herself off the wall that protected the mouth of the well.

It was a queer sensation, that of finding herself dangling between sky and earth, so to speak, but she resolutely banished all uncanny thoughts from her mind and went down, hand under hand, and feet twined loosely round the rope for support. When about half-way down, her heart gave a great bound; her hands had passed over a weak spot in the rope, where the strands were half worn through, and she realised that as she went lower and consequently increased the weight on this weak point, it might break!

At length, however, her feet touched something liquid and cold, and she knew that she had reached the water. Was it deep? Was there any ledge on which she could rest? At the same time she became conscious of an odour that might well prove stifling before she could accomplished her task.

"I must lose no time!" she cried, half aloud. "I must search quickly for the missing revolver and ascend, or I shall remain here for good!"

She swung her legs about and was rewarded by feeling a ledge to the right side of her; in a moment she was standing on it, holding the rope gingerly as a slight support. She unhooked from her belt a small acetylene lamp, but to light it she was forced to release her hold on the rope and seat herself on the ledge, with her feet in the water. In less than a minute she had the lamp alight, showing a bright glare wherever she directed its rays.

There was no trace of a weapon on the ledge which, as she could now see, ran along the side and round to the opposite end of the well, where a hollow cavity, big enough for two persons had been scooped out either by the hand of man or the action of the water.

"That will be a far better position from which to make a search!" she cried joyfully. "I must get there!"

It was not a matter of much difficulty to shuffle round to that side. There she was able to lie nearly flat on her face and grope about in the water with her right hand. She felt the bottom; there was only a foot of water—if the loathsome

The Wisdom of Gladstone.

THE late Mr. Gladstone used frequently to remark how careless his friend, John Bright, was of his health. It was generally believed that Mr. Bright never sought medical advice; but this was not quite correct, for the great Liberal orator one day astonished Sir Andrew Clark with his presence in that well-known physician's consulting room.

And yet Mr. Bright lived to be seventy-eight; so that we see, in spite of his alleged carelessness in matters of health, he lived to be an old man, and overlapped the average term of life. Mr. Gladstone almost climbed up into the nineties—but then Mr. Gladstone was all his life keenly watchful of his health and wisely safeguarded it. Even if Mr. Bright had made a better record than Mr. Gladstone, still the latter's practice would have been right and the former's wrong. It is the general average that tells the story.

In the autumn of 1889 (the year Mr. Bright died) Mrs. M. A. Bathurst, of Yelden, Higham Ferrers, began to realise that her health was failing. She felt low and weak without knowing why. She lost all relish for food, and often after her meagre meals endured much pain at the chest and sides, a tendency which increased until eating changed from a pleasure to a dreaded necessity. After a year this misery was intensified by an attack of acute rheumatism. "My legs, ankles, and knees were stiff and painful, and the joints swollen," wrote Mrs. Bathurst on October 5th, 1898, "so that I had great difficulty in getting about. I tried many medicines, internal and external, but obtained no more than slight temporary relief from the best of them until my attention was called to Mother Seigel's Syrup. That remedy completely rid me both of indigestion and rheumatism, so that I now live and work in comfort."

As it is sometimes alleged against rapid cures that their good effects are not lasting, we would again refer to the case of Mrs. Bathurst in proof that, however true this may be of many other medicines, it is certainly not true of Mother Seigel's Syrup. "Six years have now passed," writes Mrs. Bathurst, on March 24th, 1904, "since I was cured of indigestion and rheumatism by Mother Seigel's Syrup, and there has been no return of either complaint. My appetite is good, and I have no need to exercise special care as to what I eat. In fact, my general health is excellent, though I still take a dose of the Syrup now and again as a safeguard against a return of the rheumatism."

Mrs. Bathurst's precaution would have commended itself to Mr. Gladstone, who, in matters of health, would leave nothing to chance.

INDIGESTION

AND SLEEPLESSNESS

"Indigestion reduced me from a strong, healthy man almost to a shadow," says Mr. Alfred Clapham, of Windmill Lane, Cheshunt.

Dispelled by

"There was always a feeling of oppression at my stomach; and I suffered much from headache, want of appetite, and sleeplessness. From this wretched condition Mother Seigel's Syrup rescued me, after numerous other medicines had failed."

MOTHER SEIGEL'S SYRUP.

Price 1/1½ and 2/6 per Bottle.

Digitized by Google

fluid could be so called !—in the well, and she was able to pass her hand over the greater part of the bed.

Nevertheless, the search was a long one ; she had to crawl along the ledge on hands and knees and place herself in several awkward positions before she could be sure that she had groped over the whole of the bottom of the well. She was feeling faint from the odour, and still no result !

It often happens that, just as we are giving up in despair, we attain our object ; it was so with Macie. Her hand struck something at the very moment that she was withdrawing it from the water after the final attempt. She drew it forth and saw a neat six-chambered revolver !

" Are there any marks on it ? " she asked herself.

Quickly she examined it in the bright light of the lamp. She uttered an exclamation of surprise and disappointment ; the revolver bore the initials of John Poole ! His own revolver had been taken from him and used against him ! This weapon afforded no clue to the would-be murderer ! Unless John Poole spoke, Basil Cartwright might suffer, and there was no certainty even that Poole could have recognised his assailant !

" The man he brushed against in the darkness must be the man who threw this in here," she murmured. " But who was it ? In the absence of Poole's evidence, Basil Cartwright will be regarded as the perpetrator. Oh, if I could find out who it was ! "

Had she been able to pierce the darkness which veiled the mouth of the well, she would have seen that man peering down at her, an evil light on his face. He was invisible to her, while he could see a figure with a lamp in the depths without being able to recognise it.

Macie hooked the lamp, still burning, to her belt and, gripping the rope, began the ascent. The fateful weapon was stuck securely in her belt close to the lamp, and the evil-faced man at the top saw it as she came nearer and nearer to the outer world. He smothered a horrible oath and drew a large jack knife, with a formidable blade, from an inner pocket.

" I ain't going to have no meddling with my business ! " he muttered savagely. " I don't want to send any more people home afore their time, but this one has got to go ! "

Leaning over the mouth of the well, he cried down it in a brutal tone :

" You needn't trouble to climb any higher, 'cos you're going down again, sharp ! I'm going to cut the rope, and serve you right for interfering ! I come here to get the swag, and I heerd yer down there. Well, down yer go again ! "

He slashed at the rope and his knife cut it through at the second slash. He chuckled fiendishly as he heard the fall, after which he listened intently for a while. It seemed to him that he waited five minutes, but it was in reality scarcely one. He heard nothing, he could see nothing ; satisfied that his work was well done, he moved off, muttering that he would leave the swag there for another day, as it would be safer not to have it in his possession.

And what had happened in the old well? Macie's heart had stood still with horror on hearing the voice, which she recognised as that of a suspicious character in the neighbourhood ; then the exact position flashed upon her mind and she slid down the rope again with alacrity. If the rascal had cut through the rope at the first slash, Macie would have been killed, but the short interval between the two slashes saved her ; she was near the bottom when the rope was severed and she fell into the water. Her lamp knocked against the ledge, and that was the noise heard by the man at the top.

Macie clutched the ledge and remained quiet, lest the ruffian should hurl something down on her. She waited for several minutes before daring to move, but at the expiration of that time she dragged herself to the cavity at the side and scrambled on it.

She was in darkness, the lower half of her body was drenched and she was helpless at the bottom of the well. What hope was there for her ? She might lie there and die ! She had been foolish to undertake such a task ! Yet, no ! As she lay there she understood why she had done it ; she loved Basil Cartwright and if he were to die—— But what was life to her in any case ? Marriage with Poole would be odious ; he had forced her to this engagement by the unmanly use of a threat to reveal what was only a tomboyish piece of fun but which might prejudice her in the eyes of others if it were made known in the manner hinted at by Poole ! She detested him, but she had been frightened into it. She blamed herself now for not having had more courage. And if Poole died ?

For a moment the idea seemed to give her pleasure ; she was only human, and it must be remembered that Poole had treated her shamefully by using this threat to tarnish her name ! However, she crowded back the unworthy thought, and she also remembered that Poole's death might be Basil's undoing.

" I must get out of this ! " she cried desperately. " Poole must live and he must say who his assailant was. He will know ! I am sure that Basil is innocent ; this adventure proves it, and I will use my influence over Poole if he once recovers consciousness ! "

Macie had found a piece of iron hooping, and with this she began to scoop out hand and foot holes in the side of the well-shaft. This was far more easy than she had anticipated, and she made good progress. She often had to descend to the ledge and rest, and she had to tie a handkerchief round her mouth and nostrils to insure air of slightly greater purity ; but at last, after working nearly all night, she was able to grasp the top of the wall at the mouth and drag herself out.

She lay on the ground near the well for nearly an hour, recovering strength ; it was daylight. As she rose to her feet she touched a paper, and an examination showed that it must have been dragged from the miscreant's pocket when he pulled out his knife. That paper made her brain reel, for on it were written a few lines which proved that John Poole and this ruffian, Dennis Carter, were in league and that they were the authors of the burglaries committed in the district !

She saw it all ! By reason of his social position, Poole could get the desired information and plans of houses ; in fact, more than one burglary had been committed while he was a guest at the house ! His income was largely derived from the proceeds of these robberies ! Carter was his tool, and they had probably quarrelled over the division of the booty. Carter had wrested the revolver from Poole and shot him ; he, Carter, had thrown the weapon down the well and had hidden the " swag " near by, but in some way he had dropped that pearl close to O'Grady's cottage !

Notwithstanding her condition, Macie went straight to the police headquarters and lodged her information ; even while the inspector was wondering whether it could all be true or Macie was suffering from mental derangement, a messenger brought the further information that Poole had recovered consciousness sufficiently to make a brief statement ; that statement was rather disconnected, but it confirmed Macie's story.

" Thank Heaven ! " cried Macie, and then she fainted.

The denouement followed quickly. A police officer hunted for the swag in the clump of bushes and found it. Carter was arrested and Basil Cartwright released. Poole having relapsed into insensibility again, died two days later without ever recovering consciousness again.

Carter was sentenced to a long term of penal servitude for manslaughter, for his counsel contended that he had shot the other in a struggle and without premeditation. Macie was the heroine of the town, and when she married Basil Cartwright the inhabitants made a general holiday of the wedding day.

G. Brewster.

SHE : " But if you say you can't bear the girl, why did you propose ? " He : " Well, her people have always been awfully good to me, and it's the only way I could return their hospitality."

" Do you believe," a lady asked, " that a genius can possibly be a good husband ? " " Well," was the modest reply, " I would prefer not to answer that question, but my wife ought to be able to tell you ! "

Digitized by Google

MISCELLANEOUS ADVERTISEMENTS

Will be inserted in this column at the rate of 6d. per line of 8 words or part thereof All advertisements should be addressed to Advertisement Manager, "Short Stories," 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., 11 days prior to date of appearance.

Great Clearance Sale. Full List Post Free on application.

9/6. Lady's 18 carat Gold-cased Keyless Watch, jewelled movement, exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also fashionable long Watch-guard, 18-carat gold (stamped) filled, elegant West End design. Two together, sacrifice, 9/6, worth £3 3s. Approval before payment.

9/6. Field, Race or Marine Glass, £4 4s., military binocular, 40 miles' range, 10 achromatic lenses, saddler-made sling case. Sacrifice, 9/6. Approval before payment.

9/6. Magnificent £3 3s. ½-plate Hand Camera; takes 12 plates, time and snapshot shutter, with developing and printing accessories; sacrifice, 9/6. Approval.

10/6. Lady's magnificent £5 5s. solid gold, hall-marked diamond and emerald doublet Half-Hoop Ring; large lustrous stones; sacrifice, 10/6. Approval willingly.

E. C. Davis. Pawnbroker and Jeweller, 26 Denmark Hill, Camberwell, London.

Teeth Bought. Gold and Platinum. Banker's reference.—Apply, Teeth by Instalments Institute, 48 Edgware Road, W.

Art.—Work at home, tinting prints, post-cards, etc.; easily acquired; good prices.—Addressed envelope, Art Company, 6 Gt. James Street, London, W.C.

8-inch Portrait Enlargement, post free, 2/-. Copied from any sized Photo, Cabinet preferred. Your own Photo returned uninjured.—Smart Studio, Great Heath, Coventry.

"Swimming," by Montague Holbein, the celebrated Channel Swimmer, is a splendid book for those who wish to become good swimmers. Price 1/2 from the Publisher (S. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Old Artificial Teeth Bought.—Call or forward by post; full value per return, or offer made.—Messrs. O. Browning, Manufacturing Dentists, 133 Oxford Street, London. (Established 100 years.)

"Small Gardens, and How to Make the Most of Them," by Violet Biddle, is just the book for those desirous of procuring the best possible results from their gardens. Post free for 1/2 from the Publisher (S. G. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"Cricket," Edited by G. L. Jessop, contains practical instructions as to how to play the game by K. S. Ranjitsinhji, C. B. Fry, G. L. Jessop, and others. Price 1/2, post free, from the Publisher (C. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Photography.—"How to Take and Fake Photographs," by Clive Holland, contains all information required by the beginner. Price 1/2, post free, from the Publisher (P. Dept.), 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Eczema and all Skin Eruptions.—A victim who was cured after 5 years' suffering will gladly send full particulars of an inexpensive guaranteed Cure on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Address: F. M. Paciderma, 3 Swallow Street, Piccadilly, London.

Rabbits.—For Sale, Four Pure-bred Himalayans, of the Duchess of Sutherland's strain, only 3/6 per pair.—Address, J. H. Cave, 127 Queen's Road, Wimbledon.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST

FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN Complete with All Fittings and Carriage Paid.

Rustless Roman Rims & Hubs.

CASH OR 12 MONTHLY PAYMENTS of

£8 0 0 „ 15/- ea.
8 8 0 „ 15/10 „
9 0 0 „ 16/8 „
9 10 0 „ 17/6 „

JUNO Motor Cycles, 3 H.P., £34, or Monthly payments.

JUNO Two-Speed Gear Cycles £12 12s., or 12 Payments of 23/4 each. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories; over 130 pages and Hundreds of Illustrations, sent post free.

Metropolitan Machinists' Co. Ltd., S.S. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C.; and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

Icilma.

ICILMA Natural Water, Soap, and Cream can alone give a clear, healthy, complexion, proof against hard water, sun, wind, smoke, or dust. ICILMA vitalises the skin and preserves it from blackheads and irritations. Cooling and refreshing. Cures immediately nettlerash, mosquito, and insect bites. (Samples Soap and Cream, 2d.) Icilma (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

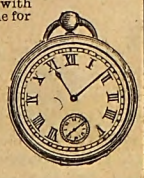
2/6 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD.

Our warranted Timekeeper, with guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent, post free, to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/6 and four stamps extra for postage. During this month we give absolutely free a Mexican Silver Watch Chain. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.



GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS, 89 Pimlico Road, London, S.W.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

Of all Chemists, or Post Free for P.O. only for 1/3, 2/10, and 4/7 from the Sole Proprietors:

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Mfging. Chemists, Nottingham, Eng.

EARN A BICYCLE

distributing circulars and taking orders from sample machine furnished by us. Active Agents wanted in each district. Large profits easily made. Highest grade fully warranted

British Made Cycles LATEST MODELS £2-10 to £6

New Departure Coaster Hubs, Best Makes Tyres, and best British made equipment throughout.

200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES all makes, good as new, £1 to £2-10

Great factory clearing sale at half factory prices. We send on approval and allow Ten Days' Free Trial on every cycle. Money with carriage charges refunded without question if not perfectly satisfactory. Write at once for free catalogues and our special offer.

Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonos half prices.

MEAD CYCLE CO. Dept. 449 85-97, Paradise Street, Liverpool, 19, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

MOTH IN BLANKET

"Ruination"

KEATING'S POWDER

"Preservation"

TINS 3D. 6D. & 1S. BELLOWS 9"

REDUCE YOUR BOOT BILLS ONE HALF

BY USING

BLAKEY'S BOOT PROTECTORS

INSIST UPON "BLAKEY'S"

SPECIAL OFFER FREE TRIAL. 500 New £12 Free Wheel 1904 Cycles. Cash, £3 10s. to £5 15s. Above on approval willingly. Motor Cycles, 2¾ h.p., £32, or £2 Monthly.

6/- TO 20/- MONTHLY DEREHAM ROAD CYCLE CO., NORWICH

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

GIVEN AWAY

With the Grand Summer Double Number of

HOME NOTES

(No. 546)

Published June 24.

A PAPER PATTERN of this

LINEN SKIRT.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

A Good Cycle

At a FAIR price is cheaper than a poor Cycle AT ANY price. Buy the best and avoid risks.

"CENTAURS," "COVENTRY CHALLENGE," "HUMBERS," "PREMIERS," "ROVERS," "SWIFTS," SINGERS,' &c.

Their names guarantee their quality.

FROM 8/- MONTHLY.

A HIGH-GRADE COVENTRY CYCLE FOR £6 On approval. Two Years' Warranty. Write for Lists (Free).

EDWARD O'BRIEN Ltd. (Dept. S3). World's Largest Cycle Dealers, COVENTRY.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Seeing a Lady Home.

THERE is no offence, whatever, "A. J. S. W.," in your seeing a young lady home, and, therefore, nothing to apologise about. The surest way to admit that you have done wrong would be to send such an apology, whereas your position should be that you have merely acted in a courteous way. If you have been in the habit of seeing her home rather too regularly, then, perhaps it is time you ceased to do so, as her parents do not seem to approve. Above all, do not get her into trouble over it.

Impressing Her Parents.

So, "EDWARD," you want to know the best way to make a good impression on your fiancée's parents on visiting them for the first time shortly. Of course, I shall be most happy to aid you. You say there is a father and mother, and several children, boys and girls ranging from twenty to two. Well, first of all, lay yourself out to make a good impression on the mother. This you will do in several ways. Let her see how devoted you are to the youngest child—the baby—and play a little with it, even if it does involve some loss of self-respect. Help mother lay the tea-table, and also, if necessary, to remove its contents after the meal. Cut the bread, hand the tea-cups, and pass things nicely. Manners are the first things an average mother looks at in a strange young man.

* * * * *

Having won the good graces of mother, give a look at father. Find out in what he is specially interested. If it is bagatelle, or whist, make out that it is one of your favourite hobbies, and implore him to give you a game. If you are wise you will contrive to let papa just beat you, after an exciting struggle. Don't play too well. If father gardens, you go and do a bit of gardening with him. Implore the elder of the young ladies to play the piano or sing, and express yourself in admiring terms. If you do either yourself, modestly offer to perform. On politics, slightly disagree with papa, but let him bring you round to his opinion in the end. That will impress him that you are an intelligent young fellow, with ideas of your own. Give little Tommy at least a penny, and be interested in his stamp collection. Don't take too much to eat or drink, or smoke more than a reasonable number of papa's cigars. Be devoted, finally, to your sweetheart, but don't monopolise the sitting-room, and ignore everybody else, in order to spend a while with her alone.

Too Young.

"A. McD."—The girl's parents are evidently against you because of your youth generally, and not merely because you are eighteen months her junior. I should advise you to accept matters for awhile, keeping on friendly terms with the family. When you get a little older, try again.

The Threatening Lover.

WHAT is the best way to deal with a suicidal lover? "MAUD" has grown very tired of a young man who has been trying to pay attentions to her for some time. She never really felt that she could love him, as her love is really in another quarter. This young man, now, has taken to threatening to kill himself. The other day he said: "If you refuse me I shall either drown myself, or go right to the bad. It is for you to decide."

* * * * *

That kind of young man must be dealt with very carefully. He would not in all probability carry out the more serious part of his threat, but it is quite possible that he might, for a little while, at any rate, go part of the way to the bad. You should save him from going even part of the way, and the best thing to do is not to refuse him with any suddenness. Allow him to continue his visits, and be as nice to him as you possibly can. If you can educate him by slow degrees into realising that your love for him is not of the extreme kind, and that by continuing to press his suit he is making himself rather foolish in the eyes of other people, and then take a long holiday yourself, not giving him any special address, the shock of rejection might be broken, and the distance he went towards either suicide or the bad might be not very far.

Cool Jealousy.

"My lover," writes "KITTY," "treats me coldly, and pays rather too much attention to my friend when she is with me. But if I speak to another man, he is very jealous. Does this show that he is tired of me? Is it well to let him know how much I love him, or should I act otherwise?"

* * * * *

I do not believe that a girl should make herself a slave to any man, "KITTY." If he pays too much attention to your friend, and is annoyed at your taking any notice of another young man, he is evidently trifling with your affections. Your best way to bring him back to you, would be to show yourself rather cool to him as long as he continues to pay attention to your friend. Let him see that flirtation is a game at which two can play, even if, on your own part, it is only a game.

Old Acquaintances.

"TEN years ago," writes "P. Q. R.," "I used to walk out with a young girl who lived in a cottage near my home. We were very great chums, and told each other everything we knew. Then I left the district, and though we corresponded at first, we soon got quite out of touch with each other. The other day, I was passing a concert hall, and my attention was attracted by the name of a singer—it was identical with that of the girl I had known. I went to the concert, and realised that it was she and no other. Now, would you advise me to claim her acquaintance again? While she has risen much in the world, and, perhaps has many admirers, I remain only a poor clerk."

* * * * *

Why not claim her acquaintance? She may have risen in the world, but if her heart was good when you knew her, she will not have altered now. She may, for all you know, have never met a man she really loved, as in such circles as those she moves in a woman may have many admirers, but no one lover. Ask to see her next time she performs, in the artists' room after the concert. And, take my advice, and don't talk over old times too much. It is a mistake old acquaintances too often make on meeting again, as little incidents of the long ago are sometimes best forgotten.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S HOME MANAGEMENT

Just the thing for those Commencing Housekeeping.

THIS WORK CONTAINS

Hundreds of Cookery Recipes

and all details regarding the Management of the Home.

FULLY ILLUSTRATED WITH COLOURED AND OTHER PLATES.

NOW APPEARING in FORTNIGHTLY PARTS

PRICE 7d. NET.

If you have not seen it send 7 stamps for a specimen part to

THE PUBLISHER,
17 HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

SAPON

THE IDEAL CLEANSER.

It REALLY does!
Does what?
It does itself!

that is to say, that if you follow the directions, Sapon does the washing while you take your ease.

SOAK,
SQUEEZE,
RINSE,
WRING.

That's all.

FREE TRIAL PACKET

on receipt of Post-card to SAPON Limited (Dept. 68), St. Swithin's Chambers, London.

There's a New Number of

The RAPID REVIEW

JUST OUT.

Get a copy and be up-to-date in everything.

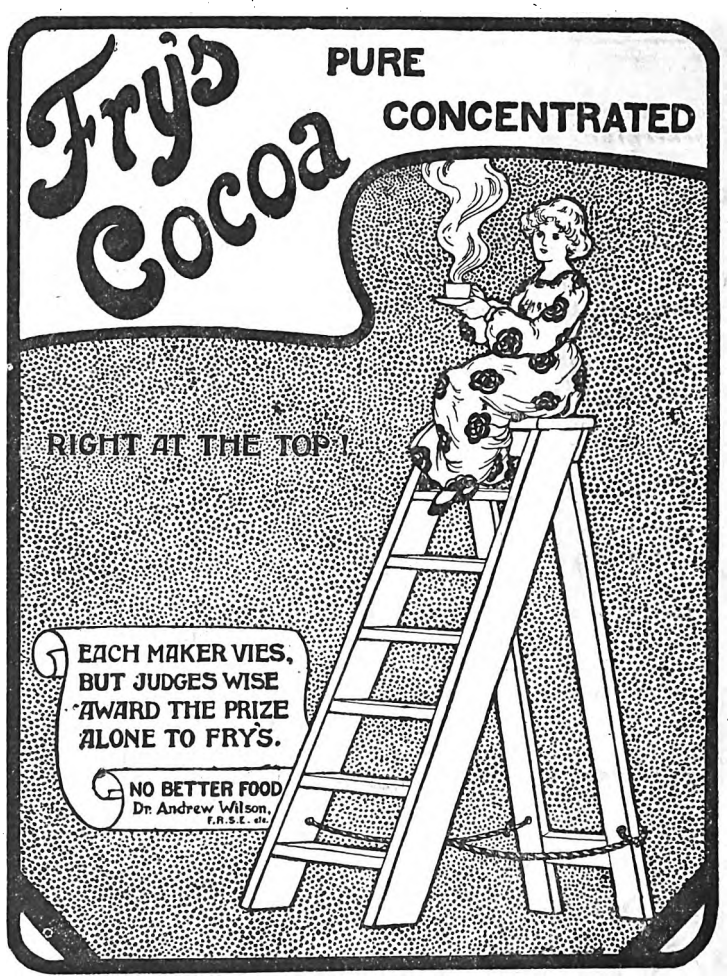
JUNE.

SIXPENCE.

Digitized by Google

"The Most Perfect Form of Cocoa."

—"Guy's Hospital Gazette."



"I have never tasted Cocoa that I like so well."

Sir CHAS. CAMERON, C.B., M.D.,
—Ex-President of the Royal College of Surgeons, Ireland.

THE OLDEST HOUSE IN THE TRADE.

ESTABLISHED 1728.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google